A considerable issue was raised in the litigation as to the meaning and extent of "a particular purpose". This issue was mainly debated in respect of the purchases from the fourth parties Kendall and Holland Colombo. If Grimsdale failed to recover against the fourth parties for the reason that no particular purpose had been made known to the fourth parties by Grimsdale, then Grimsdale argue that they should not be held liable to S.A.P.P.A. My conclusion is that S.A.P.P.A. did make known a particular purpose to Grimsdale, but I will revert to a consideration of s. 14 (1) when dealing with the claims against the fourth parties.

A separate issue arises, however, as between Grimsdale and S.A.P.P.A. There were three contracts between Grimsdale and S.A.P.P.A. They were oral. The judge found that there had been frequent prior transactions between them. There had been three to four deals a month during the previous three years. The practice had been that Grimsdale would send a contract note to S.A.P.P.A. either later on the day of an oral contract or on the day following. S.A.P.P.A. would expect to receive such a contract note. It was routine practice. The same practice was indeed followed when S.A.P.P.A. bought this type of material (cakes and meals) from London wholesalers. On the back of the contract notes there were certain terms or conditions. Mr. Golden who acted for S.A.P.P.A. knew that there were such conditions, though he had not read them. One term on the contract notes was as follows: "The buyer under this contract takes the responsibility of any latent defects". It was the contention of Grimsdale (a) that the terms or conditions on the contract notes were terms of or were incorporated into the relevant contracts of sale and (b) that the above quoted term operated, on the facts of the present case, to relieve Grimsdale from any liability to S.A.P.P.A. As to (a) the judge after considering the case of McCutcheon v. David Macbrayne, Ltd. (34) held that the conditions in the contract note were not incorporated into the contracts of sale. In agreement with all the members of the Court of Appeal (35) I consider that they were. Over the course of a long period prior to the three oral contracts which are now in question S.A.P.P.A. knew that when Grimsdale sold they did so on the terms that they had continuously made known to S.A.P.P.A. In these circumstances it is reasonable to hold that when S.A.P.P.A. placed an order to buy they did so on the basis and with the knowledge that an acceptance of the order by Grimsdale and their agreement to sell would be on the terms and conditions set out on their contract notes to the extent to which they were applicable. As to (b) I am in agreement with the members of the Court of Appeal (34a) that the term which I have quoted does not avail Grimsdale. In their contract of sale with S.A.P.P.A. there was an implied condition that the goods would be reasonably fit for the purpose of being used in compounds for pig and poultry rations. There was also an implied condition as to merchantability. There was also an implied condition that the goods supplied would correspond with their description. It is well settled law that clauses such as that now being considered must be clear before they can be held to exclude a condition of the contract. If the contracts between S.A.P.P.A. and Grimsdale are held, as I think they should be held, to include (inter alia) the condition as to fitness for the known particular purpose and also the term that the buyer takes the responsibility of any latent defects, the latter term should not be held to be inconsistent with or destructive of the former. The word "defects" relates prima facie to the quality of goods. Goods might be fit for a

(35) [1966] 1 All E.R. 309.

A known particular purpose and yet have certain defects. Any latent defects covered by the clause are such as do not prevent the goods being reasonably fit for their purpose. As the clause does not refer to the conditions which, being implied, are part of the contract between the parties and as, in my view, the clause does not either expressly or by necessary inference negative or cancel any of the conditions, it must be construed as referring to such latent defects as do not prevent compliance with the conditions. The clause cannot in any event affect the question of any liability of Grimsdale under the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926; there is a prohibition against contracting out of the provisions of the Act of 1926.

The implied condition under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as held by the judge was that the ground nut meal should be reasonably fit for the purpose of being used in S.A.P.P.A.'s compounds for pig and poultry rations. The compound food sold by S.A.P.P.A. was in fact given by Hardwicks to young pheasants and partridges. If such are not within the designation of "poultry", does that prevent S.A.P.P.A. from recovering damages? I think not. There was much evidence which showed that it was quite usual to feed poultry food to pheasants. There was evidence that turkey and pheasant rations are practically the same, and turkeys are within the description of poultry. Dealers in poultry foods would regard food for young pheasants as being within the "general umbrella" of poultry foods. In these circumstances if Grimsdale had given thought to the matter they would, I think, have considered that, if they supplied meal for use in a compound for poultry rations, it was reasonably likely that such poultry rations would be fed to pheasants or at least that such feeding to pheasants would be liable to happen (see Hadley v. Baxendale (36), and The Heron II, Koufos v. C. Czarnikow, Ltd. (37)).

In agreement with the judge and with all members of the Court of Appeal (38) I consider, therefore, that the condition implied by s. 14 (1) arose between the third parties and S.A.P.P.A. and in agreement with all the members of the Court of Appeal (38) that though the sold notes clauses were, in general, applicable the clause concerning latent defects did not avail the third parties to exempt them from liability.

I pass, then, to consider the position in regard to s. 14 (1) as between the third and fourth parties. Here the various contracts were in writing. They were on the printed standard form of the London Cattle Food Trade Association. I need not set out the dates and details of the contracts. They are recorded in the judgment of the judge. Lillico bought from Kendall. Grimsdale bought both from Kendall and from Holland Colombo. The finding of the judge was that Kendall on their own account and as brokers for Holland Colombo knew the particular purpose for which Lillico and Grimsdale respectively required the Brazilian ground nut meal "namely to re-sell in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry". He held that it was in the course of both Kendall's business and of Holland Colombo's business to supply Brazilian ground nut meal. The judge and DIPLOCK, L.J., held that liability under s. 14 (1) did not follow from those findings. They considered that no reliance on Kendall and Holland Colombo was being placed. SELLERS, L.J., and DAVIES, L.J., held that there was reliance.

The Act of 1893 was an Act for codifying the law relating to the sale of goods. If its provisions are clear, it should be possible to reach decision by reference only to the facts that arise in some particular situation. The law as it evolved before 1893 is revealed by a study of a number of notable decisions. The law since 1893 is in the terms of the statute. Many of the reported cases since 1893 are seen, when analysed, to be no more than decisions on the facts of a case whether the words of the section applied. I therefore limit my citations. In general there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality of goods which are supplied under a contract of sale nor as to their fitness for any particular purpose. There are, however, exceptions to this general rule. One exception arises in the following circumstances: (i) if the buyer makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required; that may be made known expressly or it may be made known impliedly, and (ii) if the buyer makes that known so as to show that he relies on the skill or judgment of the seller, and (iii) if the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the business of the seller (who need not necessarily be the manufacturer) to supply. In those circumstances (subject to one proviso) there will be an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for the purpose which has been made known.

In dealing with this part of the case the judge said:

"I am satisfied that Kendall on their own account and as brokers for Holland Colombo knew the particular purpose for which Lillico and Grimsdale respectively required the Brazilian ground nut meal, namely to re-sell in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry. It is established by Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (39), that if the particular purpose is made known by the buyer to the seller, then, unless there is something in effect to rebut the presumption, that in itself is sufficient to raise the presumption that he relies on the skill and judgment of the seller."

After a reference to some cases he said:

"It seems to me however that there are facts in this case which do rebut the presumption. Lillico, Grimsdale, Kendall and Holland Colombo were all members of the London Cattle Food Trade Assn. (Inc.)."

He then referred to what DIPLOCK, L.J., had said in Draper (C. E. B.) & Son, Ltd. v. Edward Turner & Son, Ltd. (40). He then proceeded:

"It was argued for Grimsdale that this comment was obiter but, even if it was, I respectfully agree with it. In these circumstances, notwithstanding the evidence of Mr. Waterfall, I am unable to accept that in any of these cases the buyers did rely upon the seller's skill and judgment and accordingly no condition can be implied under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, that the goods were reasonably fit for the said purpose."

I think that it is implicit from these passages that the judge was holding not merely that the sellers knew the particular purpose but that the buyers either expressly or impliedly had made known the purpose. It was because the learned judge was unable to hold that there was reliance that he did not hold in favour of the third parties under s. 14 (1). Mr. Waterfall (of Grimsdale) said in his evidence that in his dealings with Mr. McLeod (of Kendall) it was understood that Grimsdale were buying for wholesale distribution as animal feed for poultry and cattle; it was implicit that anything that Grimsdale bought or sold they bought and sold only for animal feeding stuffs. Mr. Waterfall said that Grimsdale would not trade with anyone they did not trust. I do not read the judge's judgment as doubting Mr. Waterfall's evidence generally but only as disagreeing with the conclusion that there was reliance on the skill and judgment of Kendall. Mr. McLeod had been market clerk with Kendall for seventeen years and had been in the trade for forty years. He explained that Kendall got to know what was being offered in the market; they found that Brazilian ground nuts "competed, with the duty, against Indian". He said "It is all a question of comparison of price and quality, taking level quality". So Kendall purchased Brazilian ground nuts and then sought purchasers in the market. Mr. McLeod had traded with Grimsdale and Lillico for years. When he sold to Grimsdale he would know that Grimsdale would buy in order to make various re-sales to compounders, who would in turn mix the ground nuts into food, some for cattle, some for poultry and some for birds. Mr. Brown (of Lillico) said that Mr. McLeod spoke of a nice line of ground nut extraction. Mr. Brown said that he placed great reliance on Kendall's integrity as brokers and he knew that Mr. McLeod would not offer him anything that he knew was rubbish.

There was I think ample evidence to warrant a finding that the buyers impliedly made known their purpose in buying. It was so that they could re-sell in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry. Was this a particular purpose? I have no doubt that it was. The degree of precision or definition which makes a purpose a particular purpose depends entirely on the facts and circumstances of a purchase and sale transaction. No need arises to define or limit the word "particular". If a buyer explains his purpose or impliedly makes it known so that, to put the matter in homely language, in effect he is saying "that is what I want it for, but I only want to buy if you can sell me something that will do", then it will be a question of fact whether the buyer has sufficiently stated his purpose. There is no magic in the word "particular". A communicated purpose, if stated with reasonably sufficient precision, will be a particular purpose. It will be the given purpose. Sometimes the purpose of a purchase will be so obvious that only one purpose could reasonably be in mutual contemplation. An only purpose or an ordinary purpose may therefore be a particular purpose (see Preist v. Last (41); Wallis v. Russell (42)). Sometimes a particular purpose will be made known expressly: sometimes it will be made known by implication.

E

If then Grimsdale and Lillico made it known (either expressly or impliedly) that they were buying the ground nuts in order to pass them on by way of re-sales to a number of people, who would use the ground nuts in making compound foods for cattle and poultry, that, in my view, was a particular purpose. No greater precision or elaboration of purpose was necessary. The law neither requires the use of any set formula nor the formal re-iteration of that which has been made clear.

H

The next question that arises is whether that particular purpose was made known so as to show that the buyers relied on the skill and judgment of the sellers. The object of stating or making known a particular purpose will usually be to ensure that the seller only sells something that is reasonably fit for the purpose. It was well established at common law (see Jones v. Bright (43)) and it would appear to be commonsense that, if a man sells something for a particular purpose, he undertakes that it will be fit for that purpose. A question of fact may arise, therefore, whether a particular purpose was made known in such a way or in such circumstances that showed that the buyers were relying on the sellers to show skill and judgment so that they would supply what was reasonably fit for the buyers' need. Again, there is no magic in any particular word in the section. In Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (44) coal was ordered by the plaintiff (shipowners) from the defendants (coal merchants); the coal was expressly ordered for a named steamship. The coal that was supplied was unsuitable for that ship. LORD SUMNER pointed out in his speech (45) that the words "so as to show" in s. 14 (1) are satisfied if the reliance is a matter of reasonable inference to the seller and to the court. The fact that the buyer in that case knew at the date of the contract that the seller's sources of supply of coal were limited did not negative the implication of a condition of reasonable fitness.

I

The matter was clearly put by LORD WRIGHT in Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (46) when he said (47):

(41) [1903] 2 K.B. 148.

(42) [1902] 2 I.R. 585.

"Such a reliance must be affirmatively shown; the buyer must bring home to the mind of the seller that he is relying on him in such a way that the seller can be taken to have contracted on that footing. The reliance is to be the basis of a contractual obligation."

LORD WRIGHT also pointed out (48) that reliance need not be total or exclusive. He re-echoed what LORD SUMNER had said in Medway Oil and Storage Co., Ltd. v. Silica Gel Corpn. (49). In the later case of Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (50) LORD WRIGHT said:

"It is clear that the reliance must be brought home to the mind of the seller, expressly or by implication. The reliance will seldom be express; it will usually arise by implication from the circumstances . . ."

He proceeded to point out that, when there is a purchase from a retailer, reliance by the buyer on the latter will in general be inferred from the fact that the buyer goes to the shop in the confidence that the tradesman has selected his stock with skill and judgment. The main inducement to deal with a good retail shop is the expectation that the tradesman will have bought the right goods of a good make.

My lords, the evidence points, in my view, to the conclusion that the contracts between the buyers and the sellers were on the basis that the buyers were relying on the skill and judgment of the sellers to supply goods that would be reasonably fit for the purpose which the buyers had made known to the sellers. Mr. McLeod (of Kendall) was concerned on the market with selling feeding stuffs for all farm stock. The feeding stuff which he sold was sold, without any reservation, as being fit to be fed to all stock on the farm. When he sold to Grimsdale (or to other comparable purchasers) he would expect that there would be many re-sales in small quantities to many compounders, who would mix the ground nuts into food, in some cases for cattle, in some cases for poultry and in some cases for birds. It was contended, however, that because the buyers and sellers were all members of the London Cattle Food Trade Association reliance by the buyers on the sellers' skill and judgment must be or should be ruled out. The judge expressed his concurrence with, and as I read his judgment was much influenced by, the view that fellow membership of the association negatives reliance. In C. E. B. Draper & Son, Ltd. v. Edward Turner & Son, Ltd. (51) DIPLOCK, L.J., (52) in observing that in that case it had not been argued that any warranty as to fitness was to be implied under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1893, added that he supposed that that was for the "good reason" that as both parties were members of the London Cattle Food Trade Association it could hardly be suggested that the buyers relied on the sellers' skill or judgment. That was a purely personal view expressed obiter in relation to a point not debated in the case. With respect I cannot agree that the fact that buyers and sellers are members of the trade association inevitably or generally brings it about that no reliance is placed on the skill or judgment of sellers. The contrary may well be the case. Nor does the fact that on arrival of the goods there will be or may be analysis of them, negative a reliance on skill or judgment. The cattle food market was, in SELLERS, L.J.'s phrase, "an informed market". Those who were selling would themselves have had to acquire. They would exercise their judgment and their skill in making their purchases. They would decide whether or not to buy from a new supplier or from a new source. They would decide whether to acquire some new variety. The buyers from them might have added confidence because they would feel that they could rely on a fellow member of their association. Such reliance might especially arise if a new line in some commodity was being sold. I agree with SELLERS, L.J., when he said (53):

A "It is a market in which a prospective buyer would be entitled to expect that if he bought a feeding stuff commodity he would receive that which he or his purchaser then could use as feeding stuff."

The contracts between the third and fourth parties, which were on the printed form of contracts of the association, contained a clause (cl. 10) under the heading of "Latent Defects" which was in these terms:

B "The goods are not warranted free from defect, rendering same un-merchandiseable, which would not be apparent on reasonable examination, any statute or rule of law to the contrary notwithstanding."

Whatever may be the effect of this clause, I think it cannot be construed as negating the implication of a condition under s. 14 (1) nor a defeating a claim for damages when there is an election to treat a breach of a condition implied by s. 14 (1) as a breach of warranty (see the judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in Wallis Son & Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (54)). The words in cl. 10 are wholly inapt to exclude a condition of the contract. They do not refer to a condition. One does not exclude a condition by excluding or purporting to exclude a warranty. In Clarke v. Army and Navy Co-operative Society (55), SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R., expressed the view (56), though perhaps obiter, that the words "no warranties are given with the goods sold by the society except on the written authority of one of the managing directors or the assistant manager" would not exclude a condition implied by s. 14 (1). In Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Mangnese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (57), LORD WRIGHT having referred (58) to Wallis Son & Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (59) and to Baldry v. Marshall (60) said (61):

E "The principle of these authorities is that though a condition is deemed to be and can be treated as a warranty, if it is not availed of to reject the goods, still it remains a condition; once a condition always a condition. Hence apt and precise words must be used to exclude it; the words guarantee or warranty are not sufficiently clear."

F It was contended in the alternative that the existence of cl. 10 in the contract was a factor which could lend support to the view that the buyers (third parties) were not placing reliance on the skill or judgment of the sellers (fourth parties). I cannot accept this. If cl. 10 does not refer to conditions, it cannot affect a condition which arises because the buyers make known to the sellers their particular purpose in circumstances which show that they do rely on the seller's skill or judgment. As it was common ground that Brazilian ground nut extractions were goods of a description which it was in the course of the sellers' business to supply, I think that, for the reasons which I have set out, it was established that there was an implied condition that the goods to be supplied would be reasonably fit for the particular purpose which was made known, i.e., the purpose of re-selling in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry.

H The next question is whether the goods which were supplied were reasonably fit for the purpose made known. There was ample evidence to support the conclusion that they were not.

I Liability was also claimed both as between the defendants and the third parties and as between the third and fourth parties under the provisions of s. 14 (2) of the Act of 1893. The respective sellers did deal in goods of the description of Brazilian ground nut extractions. The respective buyers did buy by description.

There was therefore an implied condition under s. 14 (2) that the goods should be of merchantable quality. No question arises under the proviso to the subsection. Even if the goods had been examined by the respective buyers the defects in the goods would not have been revealed. So the issue which arises is whether the goods were of "merchantable quality". By "the goods" I mean the goods which were received by the respective buyers. When considering s. 14 (2) there need not be the circumstance that goods will have been asked for by a buyer in order to satisfy or to meet some stated purpose. Some goods which are bought by description may be capable of being used in many different ways. It can happen, therefore, that, if a buyer just orders goods generally by description, he may want them for only one or possibly for more than one of several uses. It would not be reasonable to require the seller to deliver goods which would do for all the possible purposes. If the buyer wants goods that are suitable for each one of several purposes, he must make that clear to the seller and make it clear that he is relying on the seller to let him have goods that would be suitable for each one of the purposes. If the buyer merely orders goods by description, all that he can expect is that he will get goods that correspond with the description and goods of such a quality that they could be used for one of the purposes for which such goods are normally used. In the old case of Gardiner v. Gray (62) LORD ELLENBOROUGH said (63).

"He cannot, without a warranty, insist that it shall be of any particular quality or fineness, but the intention of both parties must be taken to be, that it shall be saleable in the market under the denomination mentioned in the contract between them. The purchaser cannot be supposed to buy goods to lay them on a dunghill."

Sometimes there may only be one use for an article. The provisions of sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) of s. 14 will overlap. As LORD WRIGHT said (64) in Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (65):

"... whatever else 'merchantable' may mean, it does mean that the article sold, if only meant for one particular use in ordinary course, is fit for that use; 'Merchantable' does not mean that the thing is saleable in the market simply because it looks all right; it is not merchantable in that event if it has defects unfitting it for its only proper use but not apparent on ordinary examination..."

In Niblett v. Confectioners Materials Co. (66) ATKIN, L.J., used the words (67): "No one who knew the facts would buy them in that state or condition; in other words they were unsaleable and unmerchantable." This passage brings out the point that in deciding whether goods are merchantable it has to be considered whether some buyer or buyers could reasonably be contemplated who would wish to buy goods which were in the actual condition of the goods tendered and who had knowledge of defects in them which might be hidden. The goods must of course comply with the description. If, therefore, goods of the contract description are tendered and if the tendered goods though having certain defects are reasonably capable of being put to a use for which a buyer knowing of the defects would be likely to buy them, then they are of merchantable quality. This, I think, is what was indicated by LORD WRIGHT in his speech in the Cammell Laird case (68). I prefer his approach to that which was expressed by FARWELL, L.J., in Bristol Tramways, etc. Carriage Co., Ltd. v. Fiat Motors, Ltd. (69). In the earlier

A case of Canada Atlantic Grain Export Co., Inc. v. Eilers (70), LORD WRIGHT had said (71):

B “It seems to follow that if goods are sold under a description which they fulfil, and if goods under that description are reasonably capable in ordinary use of several purposes, they are of merchantable quality within s. 14 (2) of the Act [of 1893] if they are reasonably capable of being used for any one or more of such purposes, even if unfit for use for that one of those purposes which the particular buyer intended. No doubt it is too wide to say that they must be of use for some purpose, because that purpose might be foreign to their ordinary user.”

C If a buyer wants more than this he must get his seller to sell on the basis that the goods are reasonably fit for some stated purpose. The buyer may not fare so well if he cannot bring himself within s. 14 (1).

D In my view, the judge applied the correct tests when considering the question of liability under s. 14 (2). As I consider that s. 14 (1) was operative not only as between S.A.P.P.A. and the third parties but also as between the third and fourth parties liability rests as a result of breaches of the implied conditions arising under s. 14 (1). The question of liability under s. 14 (2) has to be approached on the assumption that no particular purpose was made known. The judge analysed the evidence carefully. He came to the conclusion that though the meal was unfit for use for one purpose (i.e. for use in a compound food for poultry) it could not be said that in the form in which it was tendered the meal was of no use for any purpose for which the meal (in its defective state) would normally be used; accordingly he could not hold that under its description it was unsaleable. The judge had a great deal of evidence to consider and as there was evidence which warranted his conclusion I do not think that it can be disturbed.

E Liability on the part of the respective sellers is also claimed by virtue of the provisions of s. 2 (2) of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926. By that subsection it is provided:

F “On the sale for use as food for cattle or poultry of an article included in the first column 1 of Sch. 1 or Sch. 2 to this Act there shall be implied, notwithstanding any contract or notice to the contrary, a warranty by the seller that the article is suitable to be used as such, and does not, except as otherwise expressly stated in the statutory statement, contain any ingredient included in Sch. 3 to this Act.”

G It is necessary to consider, in the first place, the position as between the S.A.P.P.A. and the third parties. In my view, s. 2 (2) applied. The sales of Brazilian ground nut meal were made for the purpose for which the defendants required the meal, i.e. to be compounded into feeding stuffs for various kinds of poultry and pigs. It is said, however, that as the meal would not normally be given as food in its neat stage but would only be an ingredient in what was later to be used as food, the meal was not an “article” which was sold for use as food. The question that arises was thus formulated in the Court of Appeal (72): “Does the Act apply to a substance which is sold for the purposes of re-sale as an ingredient in some compounded food and not as a foodstuff itself?”

H On this question there has been a division of opinion. The trial judge and I SELLERS, L.J. answered the above question in the affirmative, while DAVIES and DIPLOCK, L.J.J. answered it in the negative. In support of the negative view it was contended that the compounders (S.A.P.P.A.) were free to select the ingredients for their compounds and the percentages of their inclusion, but that Lillico and Grimsdale would not know nor be concerned to know how the compounds were to be composed. Kendall and Holland Colombo, it was submitted, would be even further removed from any knowledge or control over the compounds into which the ground nut extractions would be introduced. It was further submitted that the Act of 1926 draws a distinction between an "article" and its "ingredients" (see s. 1 (1) (c) s. 2 (2), s. 2 (4), s. 2 (5), s. 7 (1), s. 20 (2) and (3) and Sch. 3 and Sch. 5) and that accordingly the warranty given by s. 2 (2) is limited to the sale of an "article" which is intended to be used in its existing state (and as the same article) as food for cattle and poultry.

It would appear that many of the articles set out in the schedules of the Act of 1926 are generally used as ingredients in some compound. This would suggest that the warranty was to apply both to any articles used as food in their existing state and to articles which would go into a compound which would be used as food. The articles were, in my view, sold with a warranty that they would be suitable to be used as food for cattle or poultry: that would cover use as food for cattle or poultry in a form which a reasonably competent user would adopt. They would be so used if used in a compound food for cattle or poultry, provided always that the compound was made in a reasonable or normal or recognised manner. I agree, therefore, with SELLERS, L.J. that the warranty applies whether the use as food is with or without admixture with other articles or substances.

It is submitted, however, that s. 2 (2) does not apply to any c.i.f. contract of imported goods. The various contracts between the fourth and third parties were contracts for the sale of goods on c.i.f. terms. Thus for example there was a contract (on printed form No. 6 of the London Cattle Food Trade Association) made between Kendall and Grimsdale on Mar. 28, 1960. It was for five hundred tons of Brazilian ground nut extractions at a specified price "cost, freight and insurance to London". Shipment was to be made in Santos during April, 1960. There was a provision as to quality. There was the latent defect clause already noted. There were express provisions relating to sampling and analysis. Payment was to be made by cash in London not later than thirty days from date of bill of lading or on arrival of steamer at destination, whichever was the earlier, of ninety-eight per cent. of the provisional invoice amount in exchange for documents; the small balance to be settled on rendering final invoice. There was a provision whereby buyers and sellers agreed that for the purpose of proceedings, either legal or by arbitration, the contract should "be deemed to have been made in England and to be performed there": exclusive jurisdiction (in the terms of cl. 26) was given to the English courts and disputes were to be settled according to the law of England. In fact the contract was made in England between trading concerns carrying on business in England. In accordance with the requirement of the contract the shipping documents were taken up and paid for in London.

It is alternatively submitted that s. 2 (2) does not apply to any c.i.f. contract where the property in the goods has passed before the goods have crossed the ship's rail on discharge. A further alternative submission is that s. 2 (2) does not apply to any c.i.f. sale (on contract form No. 6) whether the property in the goods has passed before or after the goods have come within the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. Reliance was placed on the decision in Draper's case (73) to the extent that it decided that s. 2 (2) does not apply to sales under c.i.f. contracts where the property in the goods passes at a time when the goods are outside the territorial limits of the United Kingdom.

My lords, these submissions require a study of the provisions of s. 2 (2) in its context in an Act which clearly was intended inter alia to prevent unsuitable food being given to cattle or poultry. When s. 2 (2) refers to a sale of an article, I think, the reference is to a sale which takes place within the United Kingdom. Reading the Act of 1926 as a whole the provisions mainly relate to transactions which take place at a time when the articles referred to in the schedules are

- A within the United Kingdom, but I do not think that the Act of 1926 is limited so as to relate only to such transactions. The Act of 1926 by s. 24 gives exemption in the case of a certain, rather limited, class of sales. If s. 2 (2) applies to sales which are not exempted, I see no justification for ignoring it, even if it is thought that some of the provisions of some sections of the Act of 1926 do not or may not apply to sales which are covered by the words of s. 2 (2).
- B In Draper's case (74) it was held that the sale of goods under a c.i.f. contract (in the form now being considered) took place where the goods were when the property in them passed. That meant that in the case of goods being carried across an ocean the sale would take place at the place on the ocean where the moving ship happened to be at the moment when, on payment, documents were handed over. The judge was bound by this decision and accordingly
- C became bound to investigate the positions of the various ships at the respective dates of payment with the remarkable result that warranties applied to goods in those cases where payment was made (and the documents received) after a ship was within territorial waters but that warranties did not apply if a ship was not within territorial waters. I cannot think that Draper's case (74) was correct in so deciding.
- D The opening words of s. 2 (2) are "on the sale". In my view, the subsection applies to any sale made within the territorial limits of the United Kingdom. That was fully recognised in Draper's case (74), but in that case the court pointed to the distinction between a contract for sale and a sale and held that the sale (as opposed to the contract for sale) took place where the goods happened to be at the time of payment. Even on that somewhat refined approach, I would
- E not agree with the conclusion. Section 1 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 provides that "a contract of sale of goods" may be either (a) a contract whereby the seller transfers the property in goods to a buyer: such a contract of sale is called a sale; or (b) a contract whereby the seller agrees to transfer the property in the goods to a buyer at some future time or subject to some condition to be fulfilled: such a contract of sale is called an agreement to sell. An agreement to
- F sell becomes a sale when the time elapses or the conditions are fulfilled subject to which the property in the goods is to be transferred. These provisions must be considered in relation to a contract for the sale of goods on c.i.f. terms. Where there is a contract for the sale of goods on c.i.f. terms, a seller may either arrange for the shipment of goods (of contract description and quality) on a ship bound for the destination stated in the contract or he may buy (when afloat)
- G goods which have been so shipped and, in accordance with the terms of the contract, he must tender the shipping documents to the purchaser. While on the voyage the goods are at the purchaser's risk but one of the shipping documents which the purchaser will receive will be a policy of insurance. The incidence of the risk is not linked with the passing of the property. Such a contract for the sale of goods is, therefore, implemented by the seller by the transfer by him
- H of the proper documents. The general nature of c.i.f. contracts has frequently been defined (see the judgment of KENNEDY, L.J. in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clements Horst Co. (75), approved in the House of Lords (76) the speech of LORD WRIGHT in Ross T. Smyth & Co., Ltd. v. T. D. Bailey Son & Co. (77), the speech of LORD PORTER in Comptoir d'Achat et de Vente du Boerenbond Belge S/A. v. Luis de Ridder Limitado, (78). It can, of course, happen that at
- I the time when payment is made in exchange for documents the goods have already been lost. In his speech in Ross T. Smyth & Co., Ltd.'s case (77) LORD WRIGHT pointed out (79) that that did not mean that a c.i.f. contract was a sale of documents not goods. The contract—

"contemplates the transfer of actual goods in the normal course, but, if the goods are lost, the insurance policy and bill of lading contract—that is, the rights under them—are taken to be, in a business sense, the equivalent of the goods."

If the word "sale" in s. 2 (2) is being regarded as the transaction which brings about a transfer of property, then in the present case there was such a transaction when, on payment in London, there was receipt of the documents in London. The sale was therefore in London. Nothing happened on the various ships. The particular location of a particular ship was an entirely irrelevant circumstance. The transaction which consisted of making payment in exchange for the documents was effective to pass the property. The delivery of a bill of lading operated as a symbolical delivery of the goods that it covered (see Sanders v. Maclean (80)). If there were a sale in England of a chattel which was in a foreign country there might be questions whether there were provisions of the local law which would affect the passing of property. No such points here arise.

If, therefore, the technical approach of the Court of Appeal in Draper's case (81) is followed and if the word "sale" in s. 2 (2) is considered by reference to s. 1 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, then the parties made "a contract of sale" of goods, which was called "an agreement to sell" until such time as the conditions were fulfilled subject to which the property in the goods was to be transferred, but which became a "sale" when those conditions were fulfilled. On this basis there was an agreement to sell which was made in England by parties carrying on business in England who made conditions to be fulfilled in England. Those conditions were fulfilled in England and the contract of sale (or agreement to sell) then became a sale. It became a sale in England. There was the further consideration (if it advances the matter) that the goods were destined for England. It seems to me, therefore, that s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1926 was applicable.

The same result is reached by a slightly different approach. The word "sale" in s. 2 (2) may reasonably be considered to be referring to a contract of sale or an agreement to sell. A warranty is in its nature a contractual term. In s. 14 (1) and (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the implied conditions are referable to a contract of sale. An implied warranty under s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1926 would seem, therefore, to be something implied in a contract of sale. The various contracts (which begin with the words "We have this day sold") were all made in England between parties who were in England. The implied warranty would, therefore, arise at the time of and be a term of the contract of sale, although it would only be effective when the contract became a sale. In my opinion, therefore, the provisions of s. 2 (2) applied and there was a warranty in the terms of the section. I do consider that in this case dependence need be placed on cl. 26 of the contract to reach this conclusion.

I do not find it necessary to express any final conclusion in regard to the questions whether various other sections of the Act apply in the case of this or other c.i.f. contracts. A question may arise whether every seller under a c.i.f. contract must give the prescribed statutory instrument. The obligation is to give one to the purchaser on or before delivery. In the case of a c.i.f. contract a seller will not be making actual delivery of the goods; he will have handed over documents which will entitle the holder of them to obtain the goods from the master of a ship. But delivery in s. 1 may cover delivery of documents. As SELLERS, L.J. pointed out, shippers and exporters are not unaccustomed to meeting the requirements of importing countries in respect of such matters as certificates of origin or licences in respect of goods shipped. I see no special difficulty in the application of s. 1. Much discussion took place as to the applicability of s. 5 and the keeping of a register in cases of c.i.f. contracts. I consider

- A that the provisions of s. 5 and, indeed, those in various other sections are primarily referable to sales in this country of goods which had arrived in this country prior to such sales. There are certainly difficulties in applying the section in the case of many sales on c.i.f. terms. Seller A might sell on c.i.f. terms to B: if B paid A and received the shipping documents, he might sell on c.i.f. terms to C: C after payment to B and receipt of the shipping documents from B might sell to D, who after payment and receipt of the shipping documents might present a bill of lading to the master of the carrying ship and receive the goods. Section 5 (2) refers to "The seller of an article . . . so delivered or consigned". That is a reference to sub-s. (1) which refers to "an article delivered or consigned direct from a quay or a ship to a purchaser". The section is not wholly clear, but it would appear to denote a seller who delivers or consigns to a purchaser direct from a quay or a ship. In the illustrations that I have mentioned the respective sellers would hardly seem to be sellers who deliver or consign to a purchaser direct from a quay or a ship. Furthermore, the respective sellers, in the above illustrations, would not necessarily know the date of delivery from ship to purchaser and could not enter such date in a register so as to comply with s. 5 (2) (a).

- D Without endeavouring to express an opinion as to various possible situations that may arise, I consider that the words of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1926 are clear and that the warranty specified did in this case arise. It was a warranty that the Brazilian ground nut extraction was suitable for use as food for cattle or poultry. There is no definition of "poultry" in the Act of 1926. Are partridges and pheasants included within the word? The competing contentions in regard
- E to this matter are comprehensively contained in the judgments now under consideration. I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by doing more than to state the conclusion which I have reached, which is that partridges and pheasants are not within the description of "poultry".

- Was the warranty broken? In my view, it was. The ground nut extraction was not suitable for use as food for cattle and poultry. What, then, was the
- F measure of damages for the breach? The problem is the same as that which arises if the damages are claimed in this case for breach of the condition implied under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. When the sellers decided to sell they must be taken to have known (for they either knew or are not excused if they did not) that if they sold there would be (a) a condition implied by statute that what they sold would be reasonably fit for the particular purpose for which
- G it was being bought, i.e., as between the fourth and third parties, that it was being bought to re-sell in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry; and (b) a warranty implied by statute that what they sold would be suitable for use as food for cattle or poultry. The circumstance that in one case there could be no contracting out makes no difference. In either case, if there is a breach, the measure of the damages that flow is to be determined
- H by an application of recognised legal principle. The evidence showed that it was normal and reasonable to give poultry food to young partridges and pheasants, and the contracting parties must have contemplated that it was reasonably likely that what was sold as fit for poultry would be fed to young partridges and pheasants. I think, therefore, that the damages as claimed did flow from the breach.

- I For the above reasons I would in each case hold the sellers liable both under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 and under s. 2 (2) of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926.

LORD GUEST: My Lords,

Section 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Different considerations may apply according as to whether the question arises as between S.A.P.P.A. and Grimsdale, on the one hand, or as between Grimsdale and Kendall and Holland Colombo, on the other hand.

Section 14 (1) provides as follows:

"Where the buyer, expressly or by implication, makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name, there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose:"

I have little doubt that the Court of Appeal (82) were right in holding that S.A.P.P.A. were entitled to recover from Grimsdale in respect of Grimsdale's breach of warranty under s. 14 (1). S.A.P.P.A.'s representative, Mr. Golden, made known to Grimsdale the particular purpose for which the Brazilian ground nut meal was required, namely, for use in compounds for pig and poultry rations. S.A.P.P.A. was the compounder and the trial judge was, in my view, entitled to draw the inference that S.A.P.P.A. relied on Grimsdale's skill and judgment. Brazilian ground nut meal was of a description which it was in the course of Grimsdale's business to supply. There was a breach of the warranty because it was not reasonably fit for the purpose.

In the case of S.A.P.P.A. and Grimsdale there was a verbal contract followed on the next day by a sold note which contained a condition in the following terms:

"Sellers not accountable for weight, measure or quality after delivery from ship, mill or granary. The buyer under this contract takes the responsibility of any latent defects."

In the course of dealing between the parties the practice was that on each occasion when a deal was effected between Mr. Golden on behalf of S.A.P.P.A. and Mr. Thearle on behalf of Grimsdale the sold note invariably followed the verbal contract. All the judges in the Court of Appeal (82) expressed the view that the conditions in the sold note were incorporated in the contract between the parties. I agree with this conclusion. HAVERS, J., held that the sold note was not incorporated in the contract by reason of some observations by LORD DEVLIN in McCutcheon v. David Macbrayne, Ltd. (83) when he said (84):

"Previous dealings are relevant only if they prove knowledge of the terms, actual and not constructive, and assent to them. If a term is not expressed in a contract, there is only one other way in which it can come into it and that is by implication. No implication can be made against a party of a term which was unknown to him. If previous dealings show that a man knew of and agreed to a term on ninety-nine occasions, there is a basis for saying that it can be imported into the hundredth contract without an express statement. It may or may not be sufficient to justify the importation—that depends on the circumstances; but at least by proving knowledge the essential beginning is made. Without knowledge there is nothing."

The rest of the members of the House did not concur in this obiter dictum of LORD DEVLIN and there is nothing, in my view, in McCutcheon's case (83) to conflict with the decisions of the Court of Appeal (82). In McCutcheon's case (83) there was a verbal contract for the carriage of a motor car by sea, but the course of dealing between the parties differed from previous occasions in that on the relevant occasion a risk note was not, as before, signed by the consignor of the motor car. In the present case S.A.P.P.A. by continuing to conduct their business with Grimsdale on the basis of the sold notes, which contained the

A relevant condition, and by not objecting to the condition must be taken to have assented to the incorporation of these terms in the contract. The remaining question is whether the clause applies so as to exempt Grimsdale from liability. Exemption clauses must be construed strictly (Adamastos Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Anglo Saxon Petroleum Co., Ltd. (85)) and the exception must be expressed in sufficiently clear words. I cannot find that condition 17 is in sufficiently clear terms to exempt Grimsdale of responsibility.

B Grimsdale and Kendall and Holland Colombo.

In this situation I am content to follow the Court of Appeal (86) to this extent, that the purpose for which Grimsdale required the meal was made known to Kendall and Holland Colombo, namely for re-sale in smaller quantities for compounding as a food for cattle and poultry and that this purpose was sufficiently specific to come within the meaning of "particular purpose", under s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1893. In the Irish case of Wallis v. Russell (87) it was held that on a sale of fresh crabs to a customer the purpose indicated for which the goods were required was for human consumption and that this was a particular purpose within s. 14 (1). PALLES, C.B. said (88):

D "So much for the first ground of limitation relied upon. I come now to the second—on the meaning of 'particular purpose'. As to that I have but little to say. The well-known judgment of BEST, C.J. in Jones v. Bright (89), points out the distinction between two classes of warranty, or, strictly speaking, of warranty and condition, that are dealt with in the two sub-sections under consideration: 1, fitness for a particular purpose; 2, that the goods shall be of a merchantable quality. Where no purpose is mentioned, there is a warranty, or condition, as the case may be, that the goods are, in the words of BEST, C.J. 'fit for some purpose' or, in other words, merchantable as such; where a particular purpose is mentioned, the warranty or condition is that they shall be reasonably fit for that purpose. I think that that distinction, which has been established by the course of legal decision for a century, shows that the words 'particular purpose' in a case of this description have a technical meaning; that it is not so much particular purpose as distinct from general purpose; but it is purpose stated to the seller, as distinct from absence of purpose stated to the seller. In the absence of purpose stated, the warranty is that the article shall be fit for some purpose—in other words, merchantable; where the purpose is stated, the warranty is that it shall be fit for that purpose. I cannot doubt that the purpose of using for human food is a 'particular purpose' within the meaning of the sub-section."

The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of PALLES, C.B.

H While it may be clear that the particular purpose for which the goods were required was made known to the supplier, the difficult question arises in connexion with the subsequent part of s. 14 (1). The particular purpose must be made known "so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment". I have difficulty in acceding to what I understand to be the views of the rest of your lordships on this point. In Manchester Liners v. Rea, Ltd. (90), the fact that the particular purpose was made known to the seller was sufficient to raise the inference that the buyer relied on the seller's judgment and skill. In Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills (91), LORD WRIGHT said (92):

I "The first exception, if its terms are satisfied, entitles the buyer to the benefit of an implied condition that the goods are reasonably fit for the purpose for which the goods are supplied, but only if that purpose is made known to the seller 'so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment'. It is clear that the reliance must be brought home to the mind of the seller, expressly or by implication. The reliance will seldom be express: it will usually arise by implication from the circumstances: thus to take a case like that in question, of a purchase from a retailer the reliance will be in general inferred from the fact that a buyer goes to the shop in the confidence that the tradesman has selected his stock with skill and judgment: the retailer need know nothing about the process of manufacture; it is immaterial whether he be manufacturer or not; the main inducement to deal with a good retail shop is the expectation that the tradesman will have bought the right goods of a good make; the goods sold must be, as they were in the present case, goods of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply; there is no need to specify in terms the particular purpose for which the buyer requires the goods which is none the less the particular purpose within the meaning of the section, because it is the only purpose for which any one would ordinarily want the goods."

It must depend on the circumstances of each case whether that inference can fairly be drawn. In Cammell Laird Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (93) LORD WRIGHT said (94):

"But the more difficult question remains whether the particular purpose for which the goods were required was not merely made known, as I think it was, by the appellants to the respondents, but was made known so as to show that the appellants as buyers relied on the sellers' skill and judgment. Such a reliance must be affirmatively shown; the buyer must bring home to the mind of the seller that he is relying on him in such a way that the seller can be taken to have contracted on that footing. The reliance is to be the basis of a contractual obligation."

I can well understand that, where the sale is by a manufacturer or a retailer to a customer, the inference can easily be drawn; but Grimsdale and Kendall and Holland Colombo were all dealers on the London Cattle Food Market buying and selling goods of the same description possibly on the same day, certainly from day to day. The section may apply to dealers inter se as Shields v. Honeywell and Stein, Ltd. (95) shows. There is, however, an air of unreality, in my view, in the idea that either of these dealers relied on the other's skill and judgment. It may well be that they trusted each other's honesty, as one of them said, but that is not the same thing as relying on each other's skill and judgment to select goods suitable for the particular purpose for which they were required. There is, in my view, great force in the judgment of DIPLOCK, L.J., in the Court of Appeal (96) when he analyses his reasons for saying that the implied warranty in s. 14 (1) did not apply to ordinary sales between dealers on the London Cattle Food Trade Market, and I respectfully agree with his conclusion.

In the case of Grimsdale and Kendall and Holland Colombo the latent defect clause is in the following terms:

"LATENT DEFECT—The goods are not warranted free from defect, rendering same unmerchantable, which would not be apparent on reasonable examination, any statute or rule of law to the contrary notwithstanding."

A long line of authority has decided that an exemption from breach of warranty will not exempt for breach of condition (see Wallis, Son & Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (97); Baldry v. Marshall (98)). I agree with the Court of Appeal (99) that the latent defects clause does not exempt Kendall and Holland Colombo.

As an addendum to these remarks I wish to mention a Scottish case which

A was referred to in argument (Flynn v. Scot (100)). This decision appears to run counter to the principle in *Wallis v. Both were cases of the sale of secondhand motor cars.

B Section 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

The judges in the courts below are unanimous that the goods were not proved to be of unmerchantable quality under s. 14 (2). The same considerations affect the issue as between S.A.P.P.A. and Grimsdale and as between Grimsdale and Kendall and Holland Colombo. HAVERS, J., having examined the authorities

C came to the conclusion that the test which fell to be applied to the question of merchantability was that of LORD WRIGHT expressed in Canada Atlantic Grain Export Co., Inc. v. Eilers (103), and in Cammell Laird Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (104) when he used these words (105):

“What sub-s. 2 now means by ‘merchantable quality’ is that the goods in the form in which they were tendered were of no use for any purpose for which such goods would normally be used and hence were not saleable under that description.”

D Applying these principles the judge found as a fact that the Brazilian ground nut meal as compounded had been used without harm for older cattle and that there was still a market for it on the continent in large quantities. He further found that it did no harm to breeding hen pheasants. For these reasons he was unable to

E find that the meal was of no use for any purpose for which it would normally be used and that accordingly it was not unmerchantable. The basis of his decision was adhered to unanimously by the Court of Appeal (106).

Two criticisms were made of the judge’s decision. It was said that by applying the wrong test his decision was vitiated and that his finding was invalidated by his reliance on certain inadmissible factors. So far as the proper test is concerned

F there is, in my view, considerable force in the criticism first advanced. The test under s. 14 (2) must be whether the article is saleable in the ordinary market for such goods under that description. The test put forward by LORD WRIGHT (105) may be one factor or one guide in the determination of merchantability, but it cannot be the determining factor since purpose is not the sole test of merchantability and the test omits all reference to price. If the test of unmerchantability is

G that the article is fit for no use, few goods would be unmerchantable because use can always be found for goods at a price. The case of Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (107) decided in the Privy Council was on appeal from the High Court of Australia. Section 41 of the South Australian Sale of Goods Act, 1895, was in similar terms to the United Kingdom Sale of Goods Act, 1893. In the High Court, DIXON, J., expressed the test in this way (108):

H “The condition that goods are of merchantable quality requires that they should be in such an actual state that a buyer fully acquainted with the facts and therefore knowing what hidden defects exist and not being limited to their apparent condition would buy them without abatement of the price obtainable for such goods if in reasonably sound order and condition and without special terms.”

I He then referred to certain English cases which it is unnecessary to quote. It appears to me that this is a preferable test to apply. Even assuming, however, that the trial judge applied the wrong test it does not, in my view, invalidate his decision. On the basis of the test applied by DIXON, J., his decision can still stand. There is no evidence that the price at which the goods were sold after the defect had been discovered was other than the ordinary price for the goods and the onus was on the buyer to prove unmerchantability. There was thus, in my view, evidence to justify the judge's finding. A

The second criticism which was made was that the judge took into consideration the fact that when the goods were sold after the defect was known, it was discovered that they could be safely fed to some animals at a limited rate of inclusion. It is clear that the quality of the goods has to be assessed at the time of the trial when the latent defect has become known; but it is said one must not, in ascertaining the condition of the goods and their merchantability, attribute the knowledge that they would not be harmful if compounded at a low rate of inclusion. This is, in my view, to approach the true situation with blinkers. The defect as ultimately discovered must be taken with its qualifications. It is not possible to stop half way and say "We know there is a defect" without proceeding to say "Although there is a defect we know it can be cured by a limited rate of inclusion". The defect was thus of only a limited character and did not in that state detract from the merchantability of the goods. I would, therefore, hold that the judge was entitled to view the matter in the state of knowledge at the date of the trial, namely, that the goods were saleable for a limited purpose at a limited rate of inclusion. The latent defect clause cannot exempt either suppliers or the dealers. B C D

The position under the Act of 1926 is affected in relation to Grimsdale and Kendall and Holland Colombo on the question whether the Act covers goods delivered in the United Kingdom under c.i.f. contracts. The Court of Appeal (109) considered themselves bound by the decision in C. E. B. Draper & Son, Ltd. v. Edward Turner & Son, Ltd. (110) where the Court of Appeal decided that the Act of 1926 could apply to c.i.f. contracts, but that whether it did so depended on the fortuitous circumstance whether the goods at the time of sale had reached the United Kingdom or the territorial waters thereof. This led HAVERS, J., into making fine distinctions as between the various cargoes. It is right to say that the Court of Appeal (109) viewed the decision in Draper's case (110) as leading to whimsical and illogical distinctions and, if they had been free to do so, would have reached a different result, but they felt themselves bound by the decision (see SELLERS, L.J. (111)). I agree with the criticisms of the decision in Draper's case (110). This House is free to consider the matter afresh. I have found the arguments whether the Act of 1926 applies to c.i.f. contracts to be finely balanced on either side. I see the force of the suggestion made by counsel for Grimsdale that the Schedules to the Act of 1926 contain a number of substances which normally reach this country from overseas and to refuse the protection of the Act of 1926 to these goods might go very largely to defeat some of its purposes. If, however, the Act of 1926 is to apply to c.i.f. contracts, these must somehow be fitted into the framework of the Act of 1926. I take the description of a c.i.f. contract from Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Co. (112) where HAMILTON, J., used the following words (113): E F G H

"A seller under a contract of sale containing such terms has firstly to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract; secondly to procure a contract of affreightment, under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract; thirdly to arrange for an insurance upon the terms current in the trade which will be available for the benefit of the buyer; fourthly to make out an invoice as I

A described by BLACKBURN, J., in Ireland v. Livingston (114) or in some similar form; and finally to tender these documents to the buyer so that he may know what freight he has to pay and obtain delivery of the goods, if they arrive, or recover for their loss if they are lost on the voyage."

(See also Manbré Saccharine Co. v. Corn Products Co. (115).) It is clear that the delivery of the goods is effected symbolically by the tendering of the documents in this country, but the c.i.f. seller does not make delivery of the goods in this country. Counsel for Grimsdale put forward several possibilities as to the test in the application of the Act of 1926 to a c.i.f. contract, but ultimately he conceded that there were really only two effective possibilities—first that the Act did not apply to any c.i.f. importations into this country or that it applied where the sale was completed by the delivery in the United Kingdom. In the light of the decisions to which I have referred it is impossible, in my view, to say that delivery on a c.i.f. contract takes place in the United Kingdom. An argument was advanced that s. 26 (2) of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926, supplied the deficiency. Section 26 (2) is in the following terms:

D "An article consigned to a purchaser shall not for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be delivered to him until it arrives at the place to which it is consigned whether the consignment is by direction of the seller or the purchaser."

This section does not, in my view, have that result as the goods in a c.i.f. contract are not consigned to a purchaser.

E There are, however, other reasons why, in my view, the Act of 1926 cannot apply to a c.i.f. contract. The general tenor of the Act is that it is to apply to goods within the United Kingdom for use in this country. The administrative provisions stress the domestic nature (see s. 11 (1), s. 12 (1), s. 15 and s. 27 (1)). The scheme of the Act of 1926 is that under s. 1 the seller of articles mentioned is bound to give the purchaser, before delivery or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, a statutory statement giving certain particulars. This statutory statement then has the effect, under s. 2 (1), as a warranty that the particulars contained in the statutory statement are correct. There follow in s. 4 and s. 5 the provisions regarding criminal liabilities. Section 4 provides that any article mentioned when prepared for sale or consignment for use as food for cattle or poultry shall be marked in the prescribed manner. Section 5 contains a sanction in the case of an article delivered or sent direct from a ship or quay to a purchaser for the particulars in the statutory statement being true. Section 7 provides that it is an offence to sell or offer or expose for sale for use for food for cattle or poultry any article which contains a deleterious ingredient. Proceedings for this offence cannot be instituted unless the article was sampled by the inspector in accordance with the Act on the premises where it was exposed or offered for sale. These sections, in my view, lead to two conclusions: (i) the Act of 1926 was intended to deal with fertilisers and feeding stuffs in the United Kingdom for use in this country, and (ii) that in order to secure the proper application of the Act of 1926 the civil and criminal liabilities are intended to go hand in hand. I reach the conclusion that the Act of 1926 does not apply to c.i.f. importations.

Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926: Are pheasants "poultry"?

I This is a pure question of statutory construction. "Poultry" is not defined in the Act of 1926 although "cattle" is and includes a wide variety of animals which ordinarily would not be so denoted (s. 26 (1)). In the absence of indications to the contrary words of a statute must be interpreted according to the ordinary and natural meaning of the words used. None of the dictionary definitions of "poultry", apart from that contained in WESTER'S THIRD NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY (1961) includes pheasants as poultry. In the ordinary use of words, poultry would not, in my view, comprehend pheasants or other game. Certain evidence was led that in the poultry food trade, poultry was understood to include pheasants. The judge, in my view rightly, rejected such evidence. In any event it was of little assistance to him. All that it amounted to was that there was not in the animal food trade a separate food for pheasants. They came under the general umbrella of poultry food. It is said, however, that in view of the method of rearing young pheasants, which is similar to young chickens, Parliament must have intended that pheasants would be comprehended by the term "poultry". The process of rearing is described in detail in the evidence. It is sufficient to say that wild hen pheasants are caught in the woods and after the laying season their eggs are put into an incubator. After the pheasants have hatched out they are put in an electric brooder. Thereafter when the chicks are strong enough they are let out and eventually at the age of about five or six weeks let out wild into the fields and woods. The difficulty about S.A.P.P.A.'s construction that "poultry" includes pheasants is that it involves that a wild hen pheasant, until caught, is not poultry, but when it is caught it becomes poultry. The chicks remain poultry after having hatched out but cease to be poultry when they are let out wild. Such an artificial and illogical construction of "poultry" does not appear to me to be justified. It would mean that while pheasants were fed with meal in the field the Act of 1926 did not apply, but when the birds came within the pheasantry the food would have to comply with the Act of 1926. The essential difference between the pheasants involved in this case and poultry is that poultry are normally reared for table use, while these pheasants are reared not for table use but for sporting purposes. The case of R. v. Garnham (116) was founded on by S.A.P.P.A.'s counsel as showing a distinction between young pheasants hatched under a hen and wild pheasants. While the young pheasants were within the confines of the farmyard they were not game and as being the property of the farmer could be the subject of larceny (see R. v. Head (117)). These cases were not, however, concerned with the question whether young pheasants were poultry. I can find nothing in the Act of 1926 to indicate that the ordinary and natural meaning of the word "poultry" was not intended. The majority of the Court of Appeal (118) were right, in my view, in holding that pheasants are not poultry within the Act of 1926.

Remoteness of Damage.

The final question is whether, assuming that pheasants are not "poultry" within the meaning of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926, damages can be recovered as against the vendors for breach of the statutory warranty contained in s. 2 (2). The question of liability falls to be decided on the principle of whether, in the terms of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 53 (2), the loss directly and naturally in the ordinary course of events resulted from the breach, in other words are the damages too remote. The goods were sold for use as food for poultry; the goods were unfit for use as food for poultry. There was thus on this argument a breach. Can it be an answer to a claim that when fed to young pheasants it killed them? In my view, a reasonable and competent seller would have realised that it might be fed to young pheasants even though the seller did not know positively that it would be fed to pheasants.

On the whole matter I would allow the appeal of Kendall and Holland Colombo, but I would dismiss the appeal of Grimsdale as against S.A.P.P.A.

LORD PEARCE: My Lords, young pheasants on the Hardwick Game Farm were killed or stunted through eating food which was compounded and supplied by Suffolk Agricultural and Poultry Producers Association, Ltd. ("S.A.P.P.A."). Nobody has doubted that the Hardwick Game Farm had a good cause of action or that S.A.P.P.A. were right in admitting it. The question is, how far that loss can be handed on to the various merchants up the line of supply. The claims are

- A based on breaches of condition or warranty under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926.

The damage came from a latent toxin in Brazilian ground nut meal which S.A.P.P.A. used as an ingredient in their compound food. They had bought the meal from Grimsdale (and from Lillico who have not appealed from the judgment against them and have therefore passed out of the picture). Grimsdale

- B have been held liable under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, in that the meal was not reasonably fit for the purpose, but not liable under s. 14 (2) since the meal was held to be merchantable. Grimsdale bought the meal from Kendall who have likewise been held liable under s. 14 (1) but not under s. 14 (2). Kendall appeal against this liability, Grimsdale are content to accept their own liability, so long as they can hand it on to Kendall. If, however, Kendall succeed in disclaiming liability, then Grimsdale in turn seek to disclaim their own liability to S.A.P.P.A.

- When Grimsdale orally sold to S.A.P.P.A., it was in the course of Grimsdale's business to sell cattle and poultry feeding stuffs to the manufacturers of compound feeding stuffs. (Judgment of HAVERS, J. (119).) Grimsdale knew that the meal was "liable to be used in the " manufacture of compound feeding stuffs for cattle or poultry ". They were further aware that S.A.P.P.A. "only compounded feeding stuffs for poultry, pheasants and pigs" and "did not compound feeding stuffs for cattle". It was held that the particular purpose was made known so as to show that S.A.P.P.A. relied on Grimsdale's skill and judgment. It has been held unanimously by the trial judge and the Court of Appeal (120) that the condition of fitness implied by s. 14 (1) has been proved and that the meal was not fit for the purpose for which it was supplied. In my opinion, that view is right; and it is clear that the injury to the pheasants was well within the range of damages recoverable. Therefore, whether or not Grimsdale can hand on their liability to Kendall, they cannot avoid liability themselves.

- The only matter on this point which has given rise to real difficulty is the question whether Grimsdale were protected by the latent defect clause in the conditions of sale printed on the contract note which they sent to S.A.P.P.A.: "The buyer under this contract takes the responsibility of any latent defects". The trial judge held that these printed conditions did not apply to this oral sale of meal. In so doing he relied on a dictum of LORD DEVLIN in McCutcheon v. David Macbrayne, Ltd. (121). That case was, however, different from the present case. For there was no contractual document in that case. The carrier orally accepted goods for transport without importing written conditions. On some previous dealings with the plaintiff's agent the carrier had imported conditions by a written contract. On such occasions the carrier could have relied on the ticket cases and had the benefit of the conditions, although the consignor was not aware of their extent. Since, however, he did not import any written terms on the particular occasion in question, he could not get the benefit of unknown conditions which were not imported into the transaction. The ordinary course of business was therefore no help to the carrier, since the transaction did not follow the ordinary course; and in that case the plaintiff's agent, acting in good faith, was unaware that the carrier was intending to import written conditions.

- In the present case, S.A.P.P.A. had regularly received more than a hundred similar contract notes from Grimsdale in the course of dealing over three years. I They knew of the existence of the conditions on the back of the contract note. They never raised any query or objection (HAVERS, J. (122)). The court's task is to decide what each party to an alleged contract would reasonably conclude from the utterances, writings or conduct of the other. The question, therefore, is not what S.A.P.P.A. themselves thought or knew about the matter, but what they should be taken as representing to Grimsdale about it or leading Grimsdale to believe. The only reasonable inference from the regular course of dealing over so long a period is that S.A.P.P.A. were evincing an acceptance of, and a readiness to be bound by, the printed conditions of whose existence they were well aware although they had not troubled to read them. Thus the general conditions became part of the oral contract. A

On the other hand, although S.A.P.P.A. must in general be bound by the printed conditions (so far as applicable) in their oral purchases from Grimsdale, these wide and varied conditions had to be adapted to the particular transaction in each case and some of them were obviously inapplicable. Those which are capable of applying do not carry the same weight and precision as they might have done had they been part of a written contract in which they had been deliberately inserted in a special context. The court has to find out, as best it may, what the parties should be taken to have intended. There is no doubt that there was an implied condition between the parties that the meal in question was suitable as an ingredient in feeding stuff for cattle or poultry, unless it was effectively excluded. Is one to deduce that at the same time they were agreeing that if it contained a concealed poison which rendered the meal unfit, the condition was to be abrogated to that extent by the general conditions? Was the resulting composite condition intended to be that the meal was fit in so far only as it looked fit, and that if its unfitness was hidden, it need not be fit? In my opinion, that is not a satisfactory or necessary effect of the latent defects clause, nor does the clause necessarily abrogate in part the condition as to fitness. The goods might have had defects of quality which did not make them unfit for their purpose. It is to these defects that the clause should be read as applicable. If it was intended to cut down the condition as to fitness in respect of all latent defects, the clause should have said so in clear and unambiguous terms, referring expressly to the condition which it was limiting. For the same reasons I would not read it as limiting the condition as to merchantability. B C D E

The more difficult question is whether Grimsdale's purchase from Kendall contained under s. 14 (1) or 14 (2) conditions which were broken.

There is in this contract also a "latent defects" clause: F

This clause is confined to questions of merchantability. It certainly cannot affect the implied condition as to fitness. Moreover, there is a consistent body of authority from the early years of this century which has construed exclusions narrowly and declined to accept exclusions of warranty as sufficing to exclude conditions. (See Clarke v. Army and Navy Co-operative Society (123); Wallis Son & Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (124); Baltry v. Marshall (125); Barker (W.) Junior & Co., Ltd. v. Agius (Ed. T.), Ltd. (126), and Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (127).) On these authorities I do not think that the clause protects Kendall against an implied condition as to merchantability. G H

When Kendall sold to Grimsdale they were aware that the purpose of Grimsdale was "to re-sell in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry" (HAVERS, J. (128)). If, therefore, a condition resulted under s. 14 (1) from that knowledge, the food must be fit both for cattle and poultry. Fitness for one coupled with unfitness for the other would not suffice.

The judge and the Court of Appeal (129) held that the purpose of Grimsdale was a "particular purpose" within s. 14 (1). It was argued that such a purpose was too wide and had not enough particularity to constitute a particular purpose. I do not accept this contention. Almost every purpose is capable of some sub- I

- A division, some further and better particulars; but a particular purpose means a given purpose, known or communicated. It is not necessarily a narrow or closely particularised purpose (see BENJAMIN ON SALE (8th Edn.) p. 630: "A particular purpose is not necessarily distinct from a general purpose"). A purpose may be put in wide terms or it may be circumscribed or narrowed. An example of the former is to be found in Bartlett v. Sydney Marcus, Ltd. (130) where the purpose
- B was that of a car to drive on the road. See also Baldry v. Marshall (131) ("a comfortable car suitable for touring purposes"). A somewhat narrower purpose was to be found in Bristol Tramways, etc. Carriage Co., Ltd. v. Fiat Motors, Ltd. (132) ("an omnibus for heavy traffic in a hilly district"). The less circumscribed the purpose, the less circumscribed will be, as a rule, the range of goods which are reasonably fit for such purpose. The purpose of a car to drive on the
- C road will be satisfied by almost any car so long as it will function reasonably; but the narrower purpose of an omnibus suitable to the crowded streets of a city can only be achieved by a narrower range of vehicles. This, however, is a question of fact and degree. LORD HERSCHELL said in Drummond v. Van Ingen (133):

"Where the article may be used as one of the elements in a variety of other manufactures, I think it may be too much to impute to the maker of this common article a knowledge of the details of every manufacture into which it may enter in combination with other materials."

In general it would be wrong to say, as was suggested in argument, that a wide purpose is unfair to the seller because it purports to require fitness for every conceivable subdivision of purpose within the main purpose.

- E I would expect a tribunal of fact to decide that a car sold in this country was reasonably fit for touring even though it was not well adapted for conditions in a heat wave; but not, if it could not cope adequately with rain. If, however, it developed some lethal or dangerous trick in very hot weather, I would expect it to be found unfit. In deciding the question of fact the rarity of the unsuitability would be weighed against the gravity of its consequences. Again, if food was
- F merely unpalatable or useless on rare occasions, it might well be reasonably suitable for food; but I should certainly not expect it to be held reasonably suitable if even on very rare occasions it killed the consumer. The question for the tribunal of fact is simply "were these goods reasonably fit for the specified purpose?"

- "To re-sell in smaller quantities to be compounded into food for cattle and poultry" was, therefore, a particular purpose within s. 14 (1). If a particular
- G purpose is made known, that is sufficient to raise the inference that the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment unless there is something to displace the inference. There is no need for a buyer formally to "make known" that which is already known. See Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (134); Cammell Laird & Co., Ltd. v. Manganese Bronze and Brass Co., Ltd. (135); Mash and Murrell, Ltd. v. Joseph Emanuel, Ltd. (136) (a sale from one merchant to another). The
- H reliance need not be exclusive. Partial reliance will suffice.

- The judge considered that the inference that the buyer relied on the seller's skill and judgment was displaced by the fact that Grimsdale and Kendall were members of the same association, the London Cattle Food Traders Association. I do not, with respect, accept this view. The whole trend of authority has inclined
- I towards an assumption of reliance wherever the seller knows the particular purpose; and where there are several subsales and the purpose is obvious, the liability is frequently passed up the line. To cut the chain of liability at one particular point is not fair unless there is some cogent reason for doing so. In the present case I see no grounds for holding that Kendall were in any relevantly different position from Grimsdale. The fellow-membership of the C.F.T.A. was irrelevant. One member may rely on another member just as much as he relies on an outside trader. The fellow-membership may even increase his reliance. A Reliance is not excluded by the fact that the seller may not himself have seen the goods he sells. In Bigge v. Parkinson (137) where it was implied that stores for troops in India must be fit for their purpose, SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., B said (138):

“Where a person undertakes to supply provisions, and they are supplied in cases hermetically sealed, but turn out to be putrid, it is no answer to say that he has been deceived by the person from whom he got them.”

The seller, not the buyer, is aware of the provenance of the goods and has chosen to acquire them for disposal. It would, therefore, be not unreasonable that the buyer should rely on the seller's “knowledge and trade wisdom” to use a phrase quoted in Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (139), by EVATT, J., from Ward v. Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., Ltd. (140). Moreover WALTON, J., in Preist v. Last (141) refers to the buyer's reliance that the seller will not sell him “mere rubbish”. This expression is echoed in the evidence in the present case where Mr. Brown of Lillico said that they relied on Kendall “not to sell what they knew was rubbish”. C D

It is argued that the width of the purpose should prevent one from inferring that there was reliance. I do not think so. The compounders of food for cattle and poultry need healthy ingredients, as the sellers knew. The parties were not considering what admixture of healthy ground nut meal would be good for particular animals or birds, but whether assuming a certain quantity of ground nut meal would be a fit ingredient, the goods delivered would be healthy or harmful ground nut meal. It was reasonable that the buyer should rely on the seller to deliver ground nut meal which would, as ground nut meal, be a healthy and not a harmful ingredient in a compound. E

In my opinion, there was on the circumstances of this case sufficient to establish reliance by Grimsdale on Kendall and a resulting condition. F

The condition did not mean that the food was fit, however strange or unsuitable the proportions of the compound might prove to be. It meant that the food was fit if compounded reasonably and competently according to current standards. Goods are not fit if they have hidden limitations requiring special precautions, unknown to the buyer or seller. The ground nut meal delivered was plainly not fit for the purpose of reselling in smaller lots to compounders of food for cattle and poultry. It was highly toxic. It is beside the point that Kendall were unaware of the proportions in which it was to be compounded. It was unfit for use in the normal range of proportions. The evidence shows that ten per cent. was included in the feeding stuff for pheasants. This was not abnormal. When the toxicity had been discovered and investigated the recommendation of a reputable working party was that not more than five per cent. of meal with a high toxicity should be included even in cattle rations and none should be included in rations for birds. Moreover, while its toxicity was unknown, the meal was thereby far more harmful and dangerous. Even had the buyer known of its toxic qualities, it was not fit for compounding for poultry. For a compounder's business is to mix healthy foods in suitable compounds. It is quite unsuitable that he should get toxic meal which can only be used by inserting it in quantities so abnormally small that the dilution of other compounds removes its lethal effect. All the courts below have held rightly, without any dissent, that this meal was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was supplied by Kendall to Grimsdale. G H I

A Kendall are therefore liable in breach of the condition under s. 14 (1). The resulting damage was injury to young pheasants who ate the compound. Was this too remote? Although the intention of the compounders to use the meal in compounds for pheasants was not known, the meal would be harmful for the known particular purpose which was compounding into food for cattle and poultry since it would be harmful to poultry. The use of poultry compounds
 B for rearing pheasants was a generally known use. In my opinion, the damage was in the natural course of events and also was within the contemplation of the parties. Kendall are therefore liable for it.

Were these goods merchantable? Merchantability is concerned not with purpose but with quality. The judge found that the ground nut meal was of merchantable quality and the Court of Appeal (142) has upheld this finding.

C That finding does not, as it happens, affect the result of the case. Therefore, no purpose could be served by a detailed investigation of the complicated evidence and considerations involved; but in my opinion the judge arrived at this conclusion on an erroneous view of the principles applicable. He found (143) that the goods

D “were capable in their ordinary user of being ultimately compounded into food for cattle (including a wide variety of animals under that description) or into food for poultry (including a wide variety of birds under that description). As compounded into food for cattle, certainly older cattle, it has been used without harm, though some of it has been injurious to calves and pigs. There was at any rate a limited market in this country after the troubles arose in 1960, inasmuch as B.O.C.M. sold some of their Brazilian
 E ground nut meal which they had left on their hands for food for cattle but not for poultry. Again on the other hand since the trouble in 1960, the London cattle food trade market has not imported any ground nut meal into this country from Brazil and . . . the word ‘Brazilian’ as applied to ground nut meal in this country is a dirty word. As a compound food for F poultry quantities of it have been proved to be lethal to very young birds, such as day-old ducklings, turkey poult, and pheasant chicks and poults, and injurious to chickens in a much less degree. The plaintiffs’ breeding hen pheasants, however, suffered no ill effects. Though the meal was unfit for use for one purpose as a compound food for poultry, I cannot find that the meal in the form in which it was tendered, was of no use for any purpose for which the meal would normally be used and hence was unsaleable under that description.”
 G

The words which I have underlined come from LORD WRIGHT’s opinion in Cammell Laird v. Manganese Bronze (144). He used similar expressions in Canada Atlantic Grain Export Co., Inc. v. Eilers (145) where he upheld a finding of merchantability with which he was obviously out of sympathy and in Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (146). HAVERS, J., preferred these dicta to the definition of FARWELL, L.J., in Bristol Tramways etc., Carriage Co., Ltd. v. Fiat Motors, Ltd. (147) that a merchantable article is

H “. . . of such quality and in such condition that a reasonable man acting reasonably would, after full examination, accept it under the circumstances of the case in performance of his offer to buy that article whether he buys for
 I his own use or to sell again. . . .”

The latter definition has been amplified by DIXON, J. in Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (148), where he said (149):

"The condition that goods are of merchantable quality requires that they should be in such an actual state that a buyer fully acquainted with the facts and, therefore, knowing what hidden defects exist, and not being limited to their apparent condition would buy them without abatement of the price obtainable for such goods if in reasonably sound order and condition and without special terms. (See Bristol Tramways, etc., Carriage Co., Ltd. v. Fiat Motors, Ltd. (150); Jackson v. Rotax Motor and Cycle Co. (151); Morelli v. Fitch & Gibbons (152); H. Beecham & Co., Pty., Ltd. v. Francis Howard & Co., Pty., Ltd. (153).)"

In my opinion, the definition of FARWELL, L.J., as amplified by DIXON, J. is to be preferred to that of LORD WRIGHT which has, I think, the following weakness. The suggestion, without more, that goods are merchantable unless they are of no use for any purpose for which they would normally be used and hence would be unsaleable under that description may be misleading, if it contains no reference to price. One could not say that a new carpet which happens to have a hole in it or a car with its wings buckled are of no use for their normal purposes and hence would be unsaleable under that description. They would no doubt, if their price was reduced, find a ready market. In return for a substantial abatement of price a purchaser is ready to put up with serious defects, or use part of the price reduction in having the defects remedied. In several classes of goods there is a regular retail market for "seconds", that is, goods which are not good enough in the manufacturer's or retailer's view to fulfil an order and are therefore sold off at a cheaper price. It would be wrong to say that "seconds" are necessarily merchantable.

DIXON, J. was clearly right in saying (154) that in order to judge merchantability one must assume a knowledge of hidden defects, although these do not manifest themselves or are not discovered until some date later than the date of delivery which is the time as at which one must estimate merchantability (see also ATKIN, L.J. in Niblett, Ltd. v. Confectioners Materials Co., Ltd. (155): "No one who knew the facts would be willing to buy them in that state or condition; in other words they were unsaleable and unmerchantable"). What additional after-acquired knowledge, however, must one assume? Logic might seem to indicate that the court should bring to the task all the after-acquired knowledge which it possesses at the date of trial; but I do not think that this is always so. For one is trying to find what market the goods would have had if their subsequently ascertained condition had been known. As it is a hypothetical exercise, one must create a hypothetical market. Nevertheless the hypothetical market should be one that could have existed, not one which could not have existed at the date of delivery. Suppose goods contained a hidden deadly poison to which there was discovered by scientists two years after delivery a simple, easy, inexpensive antidote which could render the goods harmless. They would be unmarketable at the date of delivery if the existence of the poison was brought to light, since no purchaser could then have known the antidote to the poison. Hypothesis is no reason for complete departure from possibility. One must keep the hypothesis in touch with the facts as far as possible; but I do not think that the point is important on the present facts.

In the present case, if on the day of delivery one had immediately compounded from it and fed the mixture from it to turkeys or young chickens or young pheasants, it appears from the evidence that the birds would have died. One would then have had to label the goods for the market "This food contains toxin so that if compounded in normal proportions it is fatal to turkeys, young chickens, or young pheasants or ducklings". Also, I think, "the nature of

A and strength of the toxin are unknown". I find it hard to believe that there was on the date of delivery a market for it so labelled without abatement of price, even without the addition of the last sentence. On such evidence as there is it seems unlikely.

There is a further important point which the judge, I think, disregarded. The above argument is on the basis that the goods had a label setting out the courts' after-acquired knowledge of their toxin; but goods sold as fit for food and containing toxin of which no mention is made are quite different from goods which are labelled with a warning. Food which will be consumed by humans generally may be merchantable even though it will be dangerous to young children, provided, but only provided, that clear warning of that fact is given (or that the fact is so universally known that a warning is unnecessary). Food which was thought to be innocuous and whose normal purpose was for general consumption by cattle and poultry would be a hidden trap if, unknown to the buyers, it was lethal when used on some classes of its potential consumers. Thus the absence of a warning was in itself a serious defect, which can make goods unmerchantable even though they would have been merchantable if sold with due notice of the hidden defect. On this point it is irrelevant to consider whether, D with a warning, it would have found buyers at the price. In my opinion, the real question for the court to consider is whether this ground nut meal with its particular toxicity but without any warning to buyers was merchantable as ground nut meal, which normally was fit for consumption by cattle and poultry without discrimination.

In arriving at his finding on merchantability, the judge erroneously left out E of account both the trap element and the question of price and as a result of that, I think he arrived at a wrong decision on the point.

The question of liability under the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1926, presents several problems. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal (156) that pheasants are not poultry within the meaning of the Act of 1926. I cannot, however, agree that food sold for use as an ingredient is outside the intention of s. 2 (2). Food is sold for use as food for cattle or poultry whether it is to be fed neat to them or to be compounded into a mixture which will be eaten by cattle or poultry. To exclude ingredients from the Act of 1926 would seriously weaken its effectiveness; and I find no sufficient indications in the Act of 1926 to justify excluding from the ambit of s. 2 (2) food sold for compounding, which would come within a natural interpretation of the words of the section. No such discrimination was made in G. C. Dobell & Co., Ltd. v. Barber and Garrett (157). (see the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J. (158)). See also Pinnock Brothers v. Lewis and Peat, Ltd. (159).

The more difficult question is whether the Act of 1926 applies to c.i.f. contracts. Both sides contend that C. E. B. Draper & Sons, Ltd. v. Edward Turner & Sons, Ltd. (160) is unsatisfactory and neither seeks to support it. I agree with them H that the reasons on which it is based are wrong. The Act of 1926 cannot have intended to allow the existence of a warranty to depend on the fortuitous position of a ship on the ocean at the moment when the documents are taken up. That would be too whimsical a test. The words of the Act of 1926 do not compel one to such a conclusion.

I do not accept the hypothesis which underlay the judgments in Draper's case I (160) namely, that the sale occurs in the place where movable goods are at the moment when the property passes. If one Englishman in London sells to another Englishman in London some movable goods which he owns abroad, I do not accept that the sale takes place abroad. I would rather incline to the view that it takes place in England, where the contract takes effect and the property passes from vendor to purchaser; but I do not think that an exploration of this problem will show what the Act of 1926 intended. The c.i.f. contract is unlike other sales of goods. It is completed when the bill of lading is transferred (in this case in London) and this constitutes constructive delivery. The legal situation is clearly analysed in the judgment of KENNEDY, L.J. in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Co. (161). The situation of the goods is irrelevant. A

Moreover, I doubt if the differentiation between sale and agreement for sale in Draper's case (162) is justified for the purpose of the Act of 1926. It is more likely I think that sale is intended to include an agreement to sell. (See Lambert v. Rowe (163) where there is quoted the complaint of CROMPTON, J. in Stretch v. White (164) that the justices "enchanted by the niceties of the law of sale" are "too reconcite in their law by far" for the construction of the Act there in question.) Section 7 of the Act of 1926 confirms this. It creates an offence in a person who sells or offers or exposes for sale. It seems likely that an agreement for sale must have been included, had it not been intended that it should be covered by the word "sells". Moreover, the appropriate occasion for the importation of a warranty under s. 2 (2) would be the contract or agreement for sale and under that subsection it would be more appropriate to read "sale" as including agreement for sale. B C D

The general intention of the Act of 1926 does not give any certain guidance on whether s. 2 (2) was intended to apply to c.i.f. contracts. Obviously the Act of 1926 intended to protect the English farmer in his purchases of food for his animals. It could have intended to do this by merely providing warranties at the bottom end of the chain of food purchases. Or it could have intended to keep the English market throughout clean from harmful foodstuffs, which would be an equally sensible and more reliable way of achieving the ultimate end in view. In the latter case it may have intended to take precautions, as soon as it could in practice do so, against harmful food imported into the market from abroad. All the indications seem to point in this direction. E

The words of s. 2 (2) contain no limitation in this respect. "On the sale for use as food for cattle or poultry . . . there shall be implied, notwithstanding any contract or notice to the contrary, a warranty by the seller . . ." Prima facie this would apply to every contract in this country. In the present case one has the following facts. The contract was made in England between two parties who carried on business in England. The contracts were governed by English law. The documents were taken up and paid for in London. The goods came to England; and it was English animals who would eat the food. Why, therefore, asks counsel for Grimsdale and Lillico, should s. 2 (2) not apply to this particular case, wherever the line may be drawn in cases which have different ingredients? F G

The most powerful argument against applying s. 2 (2) to c.i.f. contracts is the difficulty of also applying the criminal provisions. For instance, it is clear that the enforcement by county councils and county boroughs (s. 11), and the sections relating to samples (ss. 12-18) are simply directed to goods in this country. Moreover in s. 5 there seems good ground for assuming that the criminal responsibility goes no further back than sales ex-ship or ex-quay. That section makes it clear, however, that the Act of 1926 intends to catch the goods as soon as they leave the ship since it applies in the case of articles delivered or consigned ex-ship or quay to a purchaser. A further difficulty is caused by cases where it might seem absurd to apply even s. 2 (2) to c.i.f. contracts, e.g. (to take an extreme example) where both parties are foreigners abroad or the goods having come H I

(164) (1861), 25 J.P. 485.

A here from one foreign country are to be sold by a foreigner to another foreign country.

Admittedly there is a link between the criminal provisions and s. 2 (1). Section 2 (2), however, is a purely civil warranty. It is stated in explicit terms; and I cannot find from the terms of the criminal sections sufficient grounds for cutting down the express words of the civil warranty, more especially since
B it is far from clear what is the exact extent of any resulting limit. At common law there is delivery of the goods when the bill of lading is handed over. Prior to that there is no delivery. By s. 26 (2), however,

C “An article consigned to a purchaser shall not for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be delivered to him until it arrives at the place to which it is consigned, whether the consignment is by direction of the seller or the purchaser.”

Although the language of the section is not very happy the goods bought by Grimsdale might be considered goods “consigned to a purchaser” when the documents were taken up under the contract of sale. If so, they were deemed to D be delivered in London.

Since, therefore, prima facie s. 2 (2) applies to all English contracts and all its ingredients are English, in my opinion s. 2 (2) applies and there was a statutory warranty. It may be that different ingredients might give rise to other considerations some of which have been explored in argument, but I do not find it necessary to consider them in the present case.

E The statutory warranty under the Act of 1926 was broken in that the food sold for the use of cattle or poultry was not suitable to be used as such. Grimsdale suffered damage in that they became liable in damages to S.A.P.P.A. They are entitled to recover this damage unless it was too remote. On the facts it was not too remote. The considerations are precisely the same as those under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. I see no ground for limiting the statutory warranty
F under the Act of 1926 or treating it differently from warranty under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It was not a warranty that if used by cattle or poultry only it would do them no harm. It was a warranty that the food sold was suitable for use as food for cattle or poultry. That warranty has the same effect as an express warranty (G. C. Dobell & Co., Ltd. v. Barber and Garrett (165), per G LAWRENCE, J.). Once that warranty was broken the purchasers were entitled to normal damages. The mere fact that the statute allowed no contracting out of the warranty produced no abnormal limitation on damages. Nor is there anything to be deduced from other parts of the Act of 1926 which would indicate that it intended any such limitation.

I would therefore dismiss the appeals.

H LORD WILBERFORCE: My Lords, the findings of HAVERS, J. at the trial unequivocally established that the death and stunting of the plaintiffs' (Hardwick's) pheasants was caused by the presence of the toxin “aflatoxin” in part of the ground nut extractions sold by Kendall and Holland Colombo to Lillico and Grimsdale, resold by the latter to Suffolk Agricultural and Poultry
I Producers Association, Ltd. and used by S.A.P.P.A. in the compound feeding stuffs supplied to Hardwick. The presence of this toxin was not known to, and in the state of expert knowledge at the relevant time could not have been reasonably detected by any of the sellers, but it is agreed that this circumstance does not affect their liability. On this set of facts, the appropriate remedy of the plaintiffs, and of the successive buyers up the chain of supply against their respective sellers would, one would think, naturally arise under the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuff's Act, 1926, a piece of legislation passed to deal specifically with this type of situation. This has in fact been invoked, but since a claim under the Act of 1926 involves a number of separate ingredients as to each of which some doubt exists, a parallel set of claims has also been made under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and moreover—to complicate the issues further—under both s. 14 (1) and s. 14 (2) of the Act of 1893. I shall deal first with these and I shall do so as they arise between the parties to the main appeal, namely, as between Grimsdale and (in so far as they are involved) Lillico as buyers and Kendall or Holland Colombo as sellers. Inasmuch as Kendall, or their representative acted, for all relevant purposes, for Holland Colombo, it is fortunately not necessary to distinguish between the two sellers.

The buyers' claim is based, in the alternative, on s. 14 (1) or on s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and there is nothing surprising about this. These two subsections, together with sub-s. (3), state exceptions to the general rule supposed to exist at common law, of caveat emptor, a rule of which little now remains. They cover the main situations in which most buyers find themselves: either (s. 14 (2)) a buyer goes to a seller who deals in goods of a particular description and makes his purchase with nothing said or implied on either side: in that case the condition of "merchantability" arises. Or (166) a buyer, who wants goods for a particular purpose, makes this known to the seller, so as to show that he relies on his skill and judgment, in which case the narrower condition of fitness arises.

The words in which these simple situations, and their legal consequences, are described are plain, untechnical words. They are contained in an Act which is supposed (and generally thought with success) to codify this branch of our law. It should be possible to apply them directly to the given situation without the use of fact to fact analogies and fact from fact distinctions drawn from reported cases. Many of these were cited in the lengthy argument in this House, but I shall not refer to them because there is really no controversy as to what, relevantly, they show. They demonstrate, as one would assume, that both subsections are readily and untechnically applied to all sorts of informal situations—such as retail sales over the counter of articles whose purpose is well known—and are applied rather more strictly to large scale transactions carried through by written contracts. Further, that the legal consequences stated by the subsection may arise from the use of informal words, or without any words from a course of practice or through common knowledge. They confirm, too, that "particular" in s. 14 (1) is not used in contrast to "general" or so as to require a quantum of particularity, but more in the sense of "specified" or "stated". The word takes its colour from those that follow: the "particularity" must be such as to show to the seller the extent and manner in which his skill and judgment is relied on.

That the "fact to fact" approach is not merely circuitous but perilous is well shown in the present case. The sales here were from Kendall to Grimsdale (or Lillico) both members of and traders on the London Cattle Food Trade Association. Now in C. E. B. Draper & Son, Ltd. v. Edward Turner & Son, Ltd. (167) the Court of Appeal was concerned with another contract between members of the same association. The learned trial judge, after an examination of the evidence, which clearly disposed him towards a finding that the condition of fitness under s. 14 (1) ought to be implied, felt himself bound to hold otherwise because of observations in Draper's case (167); and when the present case reached the Court of Appeal (168) much of the argument, and some of the difference of opinion which emerged, was related to the effect of the earlier

- A decision. This approach has led to some confusion. To treat Draper's case (169) as deciding, either expressly or by implication, that s. 14 (1) does not apply to sales on a market, is to convert a decision on fact into a rule of law and to ignore the fact that not all sales, even on a given market, not to mention sales on different markets, bear the same character, or involve the same incidents.
- B There may be sales as between dealers, engaging in the same kind of activity where, nothing being said or implied, the conclusion ought to be that the parties stand on a level footing, neither relying on the skill or judgment of the other. There may equally be sales where, either, the two parties are fulfilling different functions, or they are requiring the goods for different purposes, and where some reliance is expressed or implied. What is necessary first, and probably last, is
- C to find out the nature and circumstances of the bargain. Such difficulty as there is in the present case arises from the fact that, no doubt because the parties were so largely preoccupied with other difficult issues, the evidence as to the relevant sale is exiguous. There is enough, in my opinion, however, to support the conclusion, to which I think HAVERS, J. would have arrived "unaided" by Draper's case (169), that there was a particular purpose made known to
- D Kendall so as to show that their skill and judgment was relied on.

As regards the relationship of the parties, it was shown that, in relation to the Brazilian ground nut extractions, Kendall were acting as shippers, Grimsdale as wholesalers. These shipments in 1960 were, it appears, among the earliest shipments of extractions of Brazilian origin; they were arranged by Kendall, and by them communicated to Grimsdale. This, to my mind, creates an initial area

E of responsibility on the part of Kendall.

Then was there a particular purpose made known to Kendall so as to show reliance? The purpose for which the goods were required and the knowledge of it was found by the learned judge in the following terms (170):

- "I am satisfied the Kendall on their own account and as brokers for
- F Holland Colombo knew the particular purpose for which Lillico and Grimsdale respectively required the Brazilian ground nut meal, namely to resell in smaller quantities to be compounded with food for cattle and poultry."

- He went on to say that if the particular purpose is made known that raises a presumption of reliance, but that in this case the presumption was rebutted by
- G common membership of the London Cattle Food Trade Association—a conclusion supported by Draper's case (169). In the Court of Appeal (171), DIPLOCK, L.J. who agreed with him on this point went further in attaching importance, where sales take place on an international commodity market on the terms of a standard printed contract, to maintaining uniformity of obligation as between seller and buyer.

- H With this general proposition I entirely agree. On many commodity markets, where business or speculative dealings take place between persons on the market, it would no doubt be true that each buyer relies on his own judgment and it would be wrong to seek to impose on sellers an implied condition based on reliance. To do so would impede the play and working of the market and would be in opposition to commercial reality. That does not mean, however, that in
- I individual cases the possibility of reliance may not exist. If the buyer can show that a particular purpose was made known so as to show reliance, the condition may attach: and, because the transaction takes place in the context of a market, between two persons of generally equal competence and knowledge and on the basis of a standard contract which incorporates no such condition and the terms of which may indeed suggest that no such condition applies, the buyers' task may not be an easy one. In seeking to discharge it, it is not sufficient merely to show that the seller knew of the purpose. Of course he may. Business men do not work in a vacuum, they know their trade and their customers and they are not to be saddled with conditions merely because they are competent and knowledgeable. The purpose must be made known so as to show reliance. Was it, then, so here? The finding of the judge quoted above does not in its terms go as far as this, though I note that the following passage contains the phrase "if the particular purpose is made known" which suggests that he thought that it was. So we must look at such evidence as there is. On the sellers' side Mr. Macleod's evidence was that, without any detailed knowledge of the precise mixtures or proportions in which the extractions would be used, he knew they were going into the compound trade where they would finish up inside the turkey or the duck, that food was sold without reservation as fit to be fed to all stock, that a firm like Grimsdales would split it up for the country trade. On the buyers' side Mr. Waterfall, a director of Grimsdale, said that they had never bought Brazilian ground nut extractions before and that they got on to them because they were offered by Kendall, they were chased by Kendall. Mr. Brown, Lillico's representative, said that Mr. MacLeod told him that Kendall had a nice line of ground nut extractions and that he placed great reliance on their integrity and knew that they would not sell anything he knew was rubbish. This, taken together with the evidence as to the respective roles of Kendall on the one hand and Grimsdale and Lillico on the other, I think is so far sufficient to establish the required degree of reliance.

There remains, however, the point that the parties entered into a written contract on the London Cattle Food Trade Association's form No. 6 and this contained (cl. 10) a latent defect clause in the following terms:

"The goods are not warranted free from defect rendering same unmerchantable which would not be apparent on reasonable remuneration, any statute or rule of law to the contrary notwithstanding."

The appellants relied strongly on this clause. They had the support of DIPLOCK L.J. (172) who thought it offended common sense to believe that the buyer was prepared to accept total unmerchantability from latent defect, but not a more limited unsuitability.

While I feel the force of this, I think that the difficulty to which this clause gives rise disappears when one considers the way in which the bargain was made. This standard contract exists in order to regulate the normal situation of dealing on a market inter pares where no particular purpose is made known. In this situation, as I have suggested above, s. 14 (2) is the statutory provision which normally operates, and so the clause is inserted to exclude it. Then, in relation to an individual bargain a particular purpose is made known: this attracts s. 14 (1). Is, then, the fact that, in a different situation (viz., no particular purpose stated), the buyer accepts the risk of unmerchantability, relevant to the question whether the condition as to fitness (implied under s. 14 (1)) is to be introduced? I think not. The question of course remains whether the contractual cl. 10 excludes the new special condition. As to this see below (i). I come, therefore, on balance to the conclusion that the buyers (Grimsdale and Lillico) were entitled to rely on the implied condition as to fitness imported by s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

The remaining questions under this heading I would deal with as follows:

(i) The implied condition is not excluded by cl. 10 of the standard contract. The reasons for this are classical, and on it I agree with the judgments of SELLERS, L.J. (173) and DAVIES, L.J. (174).

- A (ii) The condition (treated as a warranty) was broken by the sellers because, as the judge found and there was evidence in support, the food was unfit for use as a compound food for poultry.
- (iii) The buyers are entitled to damages whether or not "pheasants" are in this context to be included in the description "poultry". This follows on normal principles and is one point on which no difference of opinion exists in the courts below.
- B (iv) The further question whether the buyers could recover under s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, on the ground of unmerchantability does not, in my view, arise. On the interpretation of the subsection, however, I agree with the views expressed by my noble and learned friend, LORD PEARCE.
- C I next come to the separate question whether the buyers are entitled to damages under the statutory warranty contained in s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1926. I shall deal briefly with all of the points arising under this Act except one, which is said to involve questions of general importance and on which the learned judges below have differed. I wish to make clear that this is a separate and independent ground of decision and not subsidiary or obiter to that under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.
- D (A) Whether "pheasants" are "poultry" within the meaning of the Act of 1926. This question, though emotive, is a short one and I shall answer it shortly. In common or dictionary parlance pheasants are clearly not poultry (see the judgments in the Court of Appeal (175)), but to rest there might attract a charge of literalism, so one must relate this question to the purpose of the Act of 1926. If the normal meaning is to be extended, that must be on one of two grounds.
- E The first might be that the Act of 1926 is intended to apply to all domesticated birds, so that a pheasant reared and fed in captivity is, during that period, to be regarded as poultry, becoming "game" when released. This solution involves the difficulty that it would include as poultry a large class of other birds which can never have been intended, such as parrots or budgerigars. Then, alternatively,
- F can it be said that the Act of 1926 is intended to protect all birds fed with a view to table consumption? This definition would commend itself to Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Beeton and the statutory intention reflected by it would be intelligible if anthropocentric; but it will not meet the present case. For Hardwick's business was that of a game farm and their pheasants were reared for sale to landowners. Their ultimate fate might not differ from that of their cousin, the common fowl,
- G but the business of producing the two species is too widely different for both to be within the Act of 1926. On this I agree with DAVIES, L.J. (176) and DIPLOCK, L.J. (177).
- (B) Does the Act of 1926 apply to substances not intended to be fed to animals or poultry, but to be used as ingredients in a compound food? In my opinion clearly yes. I am content to agree in this with the reasons given by SELLERS,
- H L.J. (178).
- (C) Is the statutory warranty broken although the animals killed or injured are not poultry? In my opinion, yes. While, with DIPLOCK, L.J. (162), I appreciate that the warranty is statutory and that the seller cannot contract out of it, it still is a warranty, imported as such into the contract of sale, and I can see no reason for not applying the normal rules as to damages to its breach. I agree
- I on this with SELLERS, L.J. (178).
- (D) The final question, as stated by the Court of Appeal (175) is whether the Act of 1926 applies to sales under a c.i.f. contract. More precisely I think that the question should be whether the statutory warranty which arises under s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1926 ought to be imported into the contract of sale (c.i.f. London) between Kendall or Holland Colombo and Grimsdale made on form No. 6 of the London Cattle Food Trade Association, but I recognise that in seeking to answer this question it may be necessary to enlarge the enquiry and consider both other provisions in the Act of 1926 and c.i.f. contracts of sale generally. HAVERS, J., and the Court of Appeal (179) answered this question in the negative considering that they were bound by the previous decision in the Court of Appeal in Draper's case (180) though two of the learned lords justices expressed some doubts with regard to it.

In Draper's case (180) the contract was, as here, made in England between two English companies on the printed form No. 6 of the London Cattle Food Trade Association. This form of contract is described as a "contract for imported feeding stuffs and meals" and is expressed to be governed by English law. The question there arose as to the liability of the sellers (fifth parties) to the buyers (fourth parties) under the statutory warranty (s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1926) in respect of contamination of the goods and it may be noted that the buyers had, in that case, re-sold on c.i.f. terms, to other parties (the third parties) before the goods arrived in the United Kingdom. LYELL, J., held that the warranty should be implied. He pointed out that there is no express limit on the class of contracts to which s. 2 (2) applies and said that, whatever limitation might have to be made with respect to contracts for the sale of goods in one foreign country to another foreign country, he could see nothing in the section which would exclude a contract between an English buyer and seller for the sale of goods to be shipped to an English port. To me this argument seems persuasive.

The Court of Appeal (179), however, took the opposite view. LORD DENNING, M.R., in his judgment did not decide that the section could not apply to c.i.f. contracts as such; on the contrary, he clearly thought that it might do so. His reasoning that the subsection was not applicable was based on a construction of the words "on the sale" which he interpreted to mean "on the transfer", or passing, of the property in the "goods". The next step was to hold that the transfer, or passing of the property in the goods, takes place where the goods are at the time, so that if they are outside the United Kingdom (including territorial waters) the subsection does not attach. DIPLOCK, L.J., adopted a similar process of reasoning.

This argument was not supported by counsel for the appellants and I cannot think that it is sound. Even if one accepts that the section is distinguishing between the "sale" and the "contract of sale", and is referring by the former words to the passing of the property, I cannot find satisfaction in the statement that the transfer of the property takes place where the goods are, or that the property passes there. In the case of a c.i.f. contract of sale, what takes place between seller and buyer, by way of completion of the contract, is a transfer of the bill of lading, which, "in fact and in law represents the goods" and which transfer is a constructive delivery of the goods; see the judgment of KENNEDY, L.J., in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Co. (181) which was approved by this House (182). No other delivery or transfer takes place. This constructive delivery takes place, if locality is relevant, where the transfer of documents occurs. Physical delivery of the goods occurs when the buyer takes the goods from the master of the ship—but this delivery is not delivery by the seller but delivery by and under the contract of affreightment from the buyer's bailee. No doubt the contract of sale generally becomes a sale when the documents are handed over and the price is paid (s. 1 (4) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893). No doubt the risk passes when the documents pass, but to all these matters the physical situation of the goods is irrelevant; indeed the sale is just as effective though the goods may

The difficulty of applying the test of locality of the goods is vividly illustrated in the case under appeal, for it forced HAVERS, J., into a detailed investigation, in relation to each shipment of the locality of each ship at the moment when the documents were taken over, with the result that distinctions, which one can only describe as arbitrary, arose between different consignments according to whether
 B at the precise moment when documents passed the ship was on the high seas, in the port of destination, or in some other port. I think that DIPLOCK, L.J., really recognised this, for though he adhered to his former view that the subsection did not apply if the goods were on the high seas, he refused to accept the (one would think natural) converse that it did apply if the goods were in territorial waters, introducing in that case an additional test of whether property passed before the
 C goods had passed the ship's rail.

My lords, rather than this enchantment by the niceties of the English law of sale of goods (I borrow from CROMPTON, J.) I think that a simpler approach is called for. I do not think that s. 2 (2) in its introductory words "on the sale" is making a technical distinction between the sale and the contract. It is, after D all, introducing a warranty the impact of which is on the contract of sale; it operates by adding, compulsorily, a term to the contract. The natural prima facie inference should be that it applies to all contracts governed by, i.e. the proper law of which is, English law. One may test this by comparison with the statutory warranties under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Nobody disputes that they should (the facts so admitting) be introduced into this contract—and that
 E must be because the proper law of the contract is English law. Why, then, should the same not be true of this statutory warranty? The only difference is that the parties may contract out of one but not of the other, but that difference does not seem a relevant distinction.

One starts, then, from the inference that the subsection applies to all English
 F contracts, but one must next consider—recalling the reservations made by LYELL, J., in Draper's case (184)—whether there should be some additional requirement such as that the place of performance should be in this country. To do so would at least fit in both with the evident purpose of the Act of 1926 which must be concerned with the quality of foodstuffs for animals in the United Kingdom, and with the wording of s. 2 (2) which refers to sale for use as food for cattle and
 G poultry (se. as I would read it, in the United Kingdom). In order to answer this, I think it desirable to look at those subsections of the Act of 1926 which impose criminal liabilities, for though there is no necessary reason why, in an Act which both imposes penalties and creates a civil liability, the scope of the two remedies should be exactly the same (for in relation to the latter it is evidently desirable that the chain of responsibility under the statutory warranty should be carried H as far as possible up the chain of supply) there are some linkages between the two parts, particularly through those provisions which require the seller to furnish a statutory statement (see ss. 1, 2, 5, 8 (2)). Section 5 of the Act of 1926 is the provision which most directly appears to deal with imported goods. It relates to articles delivered or consigned direct from a ship or quay to a purchaser. From
 I this it appears fair to deduce that the Act of 1926, in both its parts, is intended to apply to sales ex-ship or ex-quay. From this in turn it ought to follow that the Act of 1926 should apply to sales c.i.f. (U.K.) where the goods are in fact delivered ex-ship to a purchaser and in that case s. 26 (2) would appear to meet the difficulty, that under a c.i.f. contract "delivery" takes place by documents, by extending the date of "delivery" until the article reaches the purchaser. The obligation to keep a register in this case falls without difficulty on the seller, and the rest of the machinery provisions as to sampling and analysis, etc., follow. The terms of the standard contract itself are, in fact, well designed to ensure that the seller, after his ship arrives in the U.K., has access to all information necessary to meet his statutory obligations. On the other hand, if the provisions of the Act of 1926 are to be applied a stage further back, e.g. to a sale on documents while the goods are in transit to a buyer who does not take delivery of the goods, difficulties may arise in working the machinery of the Act. The goods in the present case were delivered ex-ship to the buyers (Grimsdale) for use in the United Kingdom, so that on the minimum view the Act of 1926 would, in my opinion, apply. As regards other cases, of c.i.f. sales at earlier stages, or sales made otherwise than on the standard (No. 6) contract I would, as at present advised, find some difficulty in seeing how the statutory warranty can be said to arise.

On the second appeal, between Suffolk Agricultural and Poultry Producers Association and Grimsdale, I am of opinion:

(1) That the implied condition under s. 14 (1) arose. This is an a fortiori case as compared with that discussed above. All the learned judges below were of the same opinion.

(2) That the conditions contained in the sold note became incorporated in the contracts. I agree with SELLERS, L.J. (185) and DIPLOCK, L.J. (186) that McCutcheon v. David Macbrayne, Ltd. (187) relates to a very different situation and that in the present case the course of dealing was evidently and plainly such as to import the conditions.

(3) That the latent defect clause contained in the sold notes is not apt to exempt the third party sellers from liability. I agree on this with my noble and learned friend, LORD PEARCE.

In the result both appeals should, in my opinion, be dismissed.

SELVEY v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Dilhorne, Lord Hodson, Lord Guest, Lord Pearce and Lord Wilberforce), February 20, 21, 22, 26, 27, 28, 29, March 4, May 9, 1968.]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Character of accused—Imputation on character of prosecution witness—Discretion over allowing accused to be cross-examined as to his previous convictions—Whether any general rule to exclude such evidence where defence necessarily involved such imputations—Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), s. 1, proviso (f) (ii).

C

At the trial of the appellant on a charge of buggery with a young man ("the complainant"), the defence proceeded on the basis that the complainant was a male prostitute soliciting the appellant, an innocent man. The appellant gave evidence that the complainant had offered for money to have sexual connexion with the appellant, and that the complainant said that he had sexual connexion with another man that day for money. The complainant was cross-examined on these matters. The trial judge at his own instance ruled, in the absence of the jury, that the appellant could be cross-examined as to his previous convictions involving indecency. These convictions were put to the appellant in cross-examination. He refused either to admit or to deny them. In summing-up the trial judge treated that as tantamount to an admission. On ultimate appeal, the points of law certified for appeal being (i) if the making of the imputation was necessary for the proper development of the defence, was the cross-examination permitted by the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 1, proviso (f) (ii)*, and (ii) was there a general rule as to the exercise of the judge's discretion as stated in R. v. Flynn†?

Held: (i) the cross-examination of an accused as to previous convictions or bad character was permissible under s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, if the nature and conduct of his defence involved imputations on a prosecution witness, notwithstanding that the imputations were a necessary part of the accused's answer to the charge (see p. 508, letter D, p. 513, letters B and G, p. 518, letter D, p. 527, letter G, and p. 528, letter H, post).

H

(ii) a trial judge had a discretion to refuse to permit cross-examination of an accused as to previous convictions, even though such cross-examination was permissible under s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) of the Act of 1898, but there was no rule that the discretion should be exercised by excluding cross-examination if the accused's defence necessarily involved the imputations that had been made (see p. 510, letters B and F, p. 514, letter H, p. 519, letter H, p. 527, letters F and H, and p. 528, letter H, post); in the present case the discretion had not been wrongly exercised by allowing the cross-examination (see p. 510, letter I, to p. 511, letter A, p. 520, letter H, and p. 528, letters E and H, post).

Per VISCOUNT DILHORNE and LORD HODSON: (i) in defence to a charge of rape an accused can raise and conduct a defence based on alleged consent without rendering himself subject, by virtue of proviso (f) (ii), to cross-examination as to previous convictions or bad character (see p. 506, letter E, p. 508, letter E, p. 513, letter D, p. 519, letter G, and p. 524, letter D, post).

(ii) a statement in evidence that amounts to no more than a denial of the charge though emphatically expressed, should not be regarded, for the purposes of proviso (f) (ii) as involving imputations on the character of the prosecutor or a prosecution witness (see p. 508, letter F, p. 512, letter G, p. 519, letter G, p. 521, letter F, post).

R. v. Rouse ([1904] 1 K.B. 184) approved.

Per VISCOUNT DILHORNE: it is desirable that a warning should be given when it becomes apparent that the defence is taking a course which may expose the accused to cross-examination as to previous convictions or bad character (see p. 510, letter I, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellant, Wilfred George Selvey, by leave from the decision of the Vacational Court of Appeal (Criminal Division), (LORD DENNING, M.R., WIDGERY and MacKENNA, JJ.), judgment being given on Nov. 12, 1967 (reported [1968] 1 All E.R. 94), dismissing his appeal against his conviction at Nottingham Assizes on Mar. 26, 1967, before STABLE, J., and jury of buggery. The points of law, certified to be of general public importance, involved in the decision were:—(i) If the making of the imputation is necessary for the proper development of the defence, is the cross-examination permitted by the Act (Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 1 (f) (ii))? (ii) Is there a general rule as to exercise of the judge's discretion as stated in R. v. Flynn*? The facts are set out in the opinion of VISCOUNT DILHORNE.

J. N. Hutchinson, Q.C., and R. D. L. Du Cann for the appellant.

B. Caulfield, Q.C., and J. J. Deave for the respondent.

Their lordships took time for consideration.

May 9. The following opinions were delivered.

I VISCOUNT DILHORNE: My Lords, the appellant was convicted at Nottingham Assizes on Mar. 26, 1967, of having committed buggery with a young man named McLaughlin on Jan. 26, 1967. He was sentenced by STABLE, J. to four years' imprisonment. At one time the appellant and McLaughlin lived in the same lodgings. The appellant moved to another lodging house, and during the afternoon of Jan. 26, after they had met in the street, the appellant and McLaughlin went to the appellant's room and it was there that McLaughlin said the offence was committed. In the course of his cross-examination by counsel for the appellant, McLaughlin was asked the following questions and gave the following answers: A

" Q.—Did you then ask [the appellant] if he would give you a £1? A.—No, sir, I did not ask for any money.

Q.—Did you tell him that you had been with another man that afternoon and earned £1? A.—No, sir. Q.—Did you not then say to him ' If you give me £1, you can get on the bed with me? '. A.—No, sir. Q.—Did you not tell him further that you wanted £1 to buy some clothes? A.—No, sir." B

McLaughlin was then asked if certain photographs of an indecent character which he had said had been shown to him by the appellant were not in fact his. He said that they were not. Later the following questions were put to him and he gave the following answers: C

" Q.—I suggest to you, Mr. McLaughlin, that nothing of the sort happened in [the appellant's] room at all. A.—Not true, sir. Q.—And that an incident of this nature had taken place earlier that afternoon, with another man? A.—Not true. Q.—And that because [the appellant] would not give you £1, you are blaming him for your condition. A.—Not true." D

McLaughlin was examined by a doctor on the afternoon of Jan. 26 shortly after the offence was alleged to have been committed and in the doctor's opinion his condition showed that he had been recently the passive partner in an act of buggery.

The appellant in the course of his evidence in chief swore that McLaughlin had asked him for the loan of a pound to buy some clothing, that McLaughlin had said that he was prepared to go on the bed and that he had already earned £1 " by going with a fellow and having sexual connections ". The appellant said that he had told McLaughlin that he was not interested and he denied that he had committed the offence. E

At the end of the appellant's cross-examination, STABLE, J. asked him the following questions: F

" You are asking the jury, are you not, to disbelieve this young man, because, as you say, he told you that he had been bugged that day and bugged by somebody else? That is what you have told the jury?

A.—That is correct.

Q.—You are asking the jury to disbelieve him because he is that sort of young man? G

A.—Yes."

STABLE, J. then suggested to counsel for the Crown that there should be a discussion in the absence of the jury. After the jury had retired, STABLE, J., expressed the view that the appellant's defence had gone further than a denial that anything immoral had happened and had alleged that the incident was blackmail operation, and that it had involved an attack on McLaughlin's character. It was not until after the judge expressed this view that counsel for the prosecution applied for leave to put to the appellant his previous convictions. STABLE, J., gave him leave to do so, but intimated that he should confine his questions to sexual convictions. H

It appears from the shorthand note that the appellant was under the impression that the judge had stated that he was blackmailing. He denied that and asked for a retrial and intimated that he was not going to take any further part in the proceedings. I

When the jury returned to the court, STABLE, J., told them that, as it had been suggested that the evidence of McLaughlin should not be believed as he was a man of bad character, they were entitled to hear the record of the appellant. He told them then that they would not decide the case " purely on matters of character " and that they would deal with the case on the evidence that they

A had heard, but at least they would not go into the jury room having heard what was put to McLaughlin "without knowing anything about the previous record of the man by whom those charges are now brought".

Counsel for the Crown then put to the appellant that he had been convicted of indecent assault on two boys of eight and six in 1956. The appellant said that he did not know and, in reply to a question from the judge, that he was not willing to co-operate in view of what the judge had said to prosecuting counsel. He was presumably referring to the reference to blackmail. Counsel for the prosecution then put to him that he had been convicted on Mar. 1, 1960, of an indecent assault on a boy of eight and later of an indecent assault on a boy of eleven: that he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment on Aug. 1, 1961, for persistently soliciting for an immoral purpose and on June 1, 1964, to six months' imprisonment for persistently importuning male persons. The appellant's answer to these questions was that he was not speaking and had nothing to say.

None of the appellant's previous convictions was in fact proved but in his summing-up the judge proceeded as if they had been. In this summing-up, there occurs the following passage:

D "Before I pass from that, members of the jury, 'Do not give a man a bad name and hang him', do you follow? You would have been in a perfectly hopeless position, if you had to try this case with the idea that that young man was a sort of male prostitute, carrying about filthy photographs on him, and the man in the dock was a man, so far as you knew, of unblemished character. It is obvious you would have had a perfectly false picture before you. As I say 'Do not give a dog a bad name and hang him on that'. Deal simply and solely with the evidence relating to this particular charge."

and at the end of the summing-up, he said:

F "There it is, members of the jury: the young man says: 'Yes, it was done to me.' [The appellant] says: 'I really did not do anything indecent to that young man.' There was evidently some indecent attack which was initiated by the young man and, says [the appellant], he went beyond that. 'He tried to blackmail me, or get a pound out of me'. The suggestion is that, because he failed to get the pound, in revenge, he has gone round to the police and put this false story up against [the appellant]."

G The appellant's appeal to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (1) was heard by LORD DENNING, M.R., WIDGERY and MACKENNA, JJ., and dismissed on Nov. 12, 1967. Dealing with the point that the judge ought to have warned the jury that the appellant's previous convictions had not been proved, LORD DENNING pointed out (2) that, when the appellant's previous convictions were read out after conviction, the appellant did not dispute them and said that the jury were quite entitled to treat the appellant's attitude as tantamount to an admission, and that, even if the judge should have warned the jury, there was no miscarriage of justice and the court would have applied the proviso. I agree with LORD DENNING.

H The main ground of the appeal before the Court of Appeal (1) was, as it was before your lordships, that the judge was wrong in allowing the appellant to be cross-examined in relation to his previous convictions. It was contended I that an accused person might, without losing the protection of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, ask a prosecution witness all questions that are necessitated by the proper conduct of his defence and that, so long as the nature or conduct of the defence is relevant to an issue upon the facts of the case, the accused does not lose the protection of the Act of 1898. The terms of s. 1 of the Act of 1898 are as follows:

(1) [1968] 1 All E.R. 94.

(2) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 98.

"1. Every person charged with an offence, and the wife or husband, as the case may be, of the person charged, shall be a competent witness for the defence at every stage of the proceedings, . . . Provided as follows:— . . .

(e) A person charged and being a witness in pursuance of this Act may be asked any question in cross-examination notwithstanding that it would tend to criminate him as to the offence charged. (f) A person charged and called as a witness in pursuance of this Act shall not be asked, and if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he has committed or been convicted of or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged, or is of bad character, unless— (i) the proof that he has committed or been convicted of such other offence is admissible evidence to show that he is guilty of the offence wherewith he is then charged; or (ii) he has personally or by his advocate asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to establish his own good character, or has given evidence of his good character, or the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution; or (iii) he has given evidence against any other person charged with the same offence . . . "

Counsel for the appellant contended that the word "character" in para. (f) meant general reputation, and he based his argument on R. v. Rowton (3). In that case it was held that where evidence of good character had been given on behalf of the accused, evidence of his bad character might be given in reply; that the evidence whether for the defence or for the prosecution must be confined to evidence of general reputation; and that the individual opinion of a witness founded on his own experience and observation was inadmissible.

This argument was first advanced in 1927 in R. v. Dunkley (4). In the course of his judgment in that case LORD HEWART, C.J., said (4):

"... it is not difficult to suppose that a formidable argument might have been raised on the phrasing of this statute, that the character which is spoken of is the character which is so well known in the vocabulary of the criminal law, namely, the general reputation of the person referred to; in other words, that 'character' in that context . . . bears the meaning which the term 'character' was held to bear, for example, in R. v. Rowton (3) . . . Nevertheless when one looks at the long line of cases beginning very shortly after the passing of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, it does not appear that that argument has ever been so much as formulated. It was formulated yesterday. One can only say that it is now much too late in the day even to consider that argument, because that argument could not now prevail without the revision, and indeed to a great extent the overthrow, of a considerable number of decisions."

In Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (5), VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., posed the question whether character referred to the good reputation which a man may bear in his own circle, or to a man's real disposition as distinct from what his friends and neighbours think of him. He said (5) that he was "disposed to think that in para. (f) (where the word 'character' occurs four times) both conceptions are combined". This passage from his speech in this case was cited by LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST in Malindi v. Reginam (6) and was clearly accepted by their lordships as correct.

What has to be considered in this case is not what evidence can or cannot be given to establish a man's character, but whether the nature or conduct of the defence involved imputations on the character of the witness, McLaughlin.

(6) [1966] 3 All E.R. 285 at p. 291; [1967] A.C. 439 at p. 461.

- A In my opinion, the questions put to him and the evidence given by the appellant clearly involved imputations on his character, and, if it were right to interpret "character" in the statute as meaning general reputation, also imputations on his general reputation. Counsel for the appellant further contended that the appellant had been trapped by the judge into making imputations by the questions put by the judge at the end of his cross-examination. I do not think
- B that this was the case. The imputations were first made in the cross-examination of the witness McLaughlin and then repeated by the appellant in his evidence in chief. The questions put by the judge at the end of his cross-examination did no more than remove all possible doubt whether the appellant was seeking to discredit McLaughlin on the ground that he was "that sort of young man".

- I propose now to turn to counsel for the appellant's main contention, that
- C the section did not permit of cross-examination of the accused as to character if the imputations were a necessary part of his answer to the charge. He contended that it was unsatisfactory that the liability of the accused to be subjected to such cross-examination should depend on the exercise by the trial judge of discretion, on his estimation of what was fair and what was not. Counsel for the Crown contended that, despite the observations in a number of cases, a
- D judge had no discretion to refuse or permit cross-examination of the accused as to character if the conditions prescribed by the section were satisfied. I propose to consider first the construction and interpretation to be given to the section and then to consider counsel for the Crown's argument as to discretion. This case is the latest—one dare not say the last—of a large number of cases that have come before the courts on the interpretation of the section.
- E Most of them were cited by counsel for the appellant. I do not propose to refer to all of them but it is, I think, necessary to refer to a good number.

The first case cited was R. v. Rouse (7). In that case LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., refused to regard the accused's answer in cross-examination to a question whether a prosecution witness's evidence was invented, that it was a lie and the witness a liar, as anything more than a denial of the charge, and DARLING, J., said (8):

- F "Merely to deny a fact alleged by the prosecution is not necessarily to make an attack on the character of the prosecutor or his witnesses. Such a denial is necessary and inevitable in every case where a prisoner goes into the witness box, and it is nothing more than a traverse of the truth of an allegation made against him; to add in cross-examination that the prosecutor is a liar . . ."

- G In R. v. Sheean (9), a rape case, JELF, J., said that when a man in the accused's station of life used such terms as "he is lying" and "it is a lie", or even stronger expressions, all that is generally meant is a denial of the truth of the case for the prosecution and not a real reflection on the character of a witness. So the first question that has to be considered is whether what has been said amounts
- H in reality to more than an emphatic denial of the charge (see also R. v. Jones (10) per LORD HEWART, C.J.; R. v. Clark (11) per LORD GODDARD, C.J.). If it does and in fact involves an imputation on the character of the prosecutor or a witness for the prosecution, does the section permit such cross-examination of the accused, even when the imputation is a necessary part of the presentation of the defence?

- I There is a number of judicial observations to the effect that it does not. In R. v. Bridgwater (12) LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said that:

"... raising a defence, even in forcible language, is not of necessity casting imputations on the character of the prosecutor or his witnesses. No doubt imputations may be cast on their character quite independently of the defence raised, either by direct evidence or by questions put to them in cross-examination."

In R. v. Sheean (13), a rape case, JELF, J., said (14):

"Where a prisoner in order to clear himself upon a charge to which consent is a good defence in law, alleges that the prosecutrix did so consent, it would in my view be a total subversion of the Act to say such allegation exposes him to cross-examination as to previous charges made against him. To so hold would be to put an impediment in the way of a prisoner denying upon his oath, that what he did was done with the consent of the prosecutrix, when if the jury believed she did so consent, he would be entitled to an acquittal. Of course if the prisoner goes out of his way to make an attack on the prosecutrix based on matters outside the substance of the charge upon which he is being tried, it is otherwise."

Support was also given for this view in the important case of R. v. Preston (15). There the accused had alleged impropriety in the conduct of an identification parade by a police officer and so had made imputations on his character. It was held, nevertheless, that cross-examination of the accused as to his previous convictions was not permissible as what had happened at the identity parade was relevant to his defence. CHANNELL, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal, said in relation to the words in the section "the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution." (16):

"It appears to us to mean this: that if the defence is so conducted, or the nature of the defence is such, as to involve the proposition that the jury ought not to believe the prosecutor or one of the witnesses for the prosecution upon the ground that his conduct—not his evidence in the case, but his conduct outside the evidence given by him—makes him an unreliable witness, then the jury ought also to know the character of the prisoner who either gives that evidence or makes that charge, and it then becomes admissible to cross-examine the prisoner as to his antecedents and character with a view to showing that he has such a bad character that the jury ought not to rely upon his evidence. That is the general nature of the enactment and the general principle underlying it."

In R. v. Wright (17) it was, however, held that the accused's statement that he had been bribed to make a confession was an imputation on the character of the police officer involved, and cross-examination of the accused as to character was permitted even though the making of the imputation "might be the" (accused's) "only way of defending himself". On the other hand in R. v. Westfall (18) HAMILTON, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal held that an accusation by the accused that the constable who had arrested him had acted in an improper manner was not such as to entitle the prosecution to cross-examine him as to character. He said (19):

"Such questions often have to be asked if the evidence is to be properly tested. Instead of being an attack on the character of a witness with the view of showing that he is unreliable, they are an endeavour to elicit the facts in connection with the very matter with which the prisoner is charged. It was not such an attack as comes within the meaning of the section."

I do not see that it is possible to reconcile these two decisions. If R. v. Westfall (18) was rightly decided, then R. v. Wright (17) cannot have been, and vice versa.

Two months later the whole problem was reviewed in R. v. Hudson (20) by (13) (1908), 21 Cox, C.C. at p. 561.

A the Court of Criminal Appeal which, in view of the importance of the case, consisted of five judges presided over by LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. It was then said that the decisions in R. v. Bridgwater (21), R. v. Preston (22) and R. v. Westfall (23) might well be supported on grounds which did not touch the question raised in that case, but that they could not be treated as laying down a general rule. LORD ALVERSTONE said (24):

B “We think that the words of the section ‘unless the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations’, &c., must receive their ordinary and natural interpretation, and that it is not legitimate to qualify them by adding or inserting the words ‘unnecessarily’, or ‘unjustifiably’, or ‘for purposes other than that of developing the defence’, or other similar words.”

C This case was followed by R. v. Watson (25) when PICKFORD, J., said (26):

D “It has been held that to say that a witness for the prosecution was telling lies is not an imputation within the meaning of the section. There have also been observations in some cases that seem to imply that where the cross-examination is only a necessary part of the defence it is not within the section. Those cases were considered by this Court in [R. v.] Hudson (27) . . . the remarks to which I have referred were certainly held not to be of general application.”

After quoting the passage from the judgment of LORD ALVERSTONE in R. v. Hudson (24) set out above, he said (26): “That is a considered judgment and that is the principle we have to apply.”

E If at that time it was thought, as PICKFORD, J., appears to have thought, that the decision in R. v. Hudson (27) had finally settled the controversy as to the meaning of the section, that belief was destroyed by the judgment in R. v. Biggin (28), where despite what was said in R. v. Hudson (27) the EARL OF READING, C.J. (29) appears to have treated the passage of CHANNELL, J.’s judgment set out above as still good law and of general application. Also in R. v. Roberts (30) DARLING, J. (31) cited the same passage of CHANNELL, J.’s judgment and, following that, drew a distinction between the conduct and the evidence of a witness. In 1944 in R. v. Turner (32) the question again arose whether the allegation that a woman had consented to the intercourse which was the subject of a charge of rape rendered the accused liable to cross-examination as to his previous convictions. HUMPHREYS, J., delivering the judgment of a court of five judges said (33):

H “. . . it must be conceded that to allege of a woman that she permitted a man other than her husband to have intercourse with her would be regarded by most persons as an imputation on her character. In the same way in former times one of the deadliest insults which could be offered to a gentleman was to call him a liar . . . but, if an accused person refers to a witness for the prosecution as a liar, it does not follow that he is making an imputation on his character so as to render himself liable to cross-examination to character: see R. v. Rouse (34) . . . On a charge of rape the Crown has to prove two things, intercourse and the non-consent of the woman. For centuries the law has jealously guarded the right of an accused person to put forward at his trial any defence open to him on the indictment without running the risk of his character, if a bad one, being disclosed to the jury. It would be strange indeed if the Act of Parliament which allowed him, in most cases for the first time, to give evidence on oath had virtually deprived him of that right in the case of one serious felony by enacting that he could only do so at the risk of having his character exposed. What is commonly referred to as the defence of consent in rape is in truth nothing more than a denial by the accused that the prosecution has established one of the two essential ingredients of the charge. It is and must be the prosecution which introduces the question of consent or non-consent. Can the legislature have intended to penalise the accused who avails himself of the right to give evidence conferred by statute by enacting that he may be cross-examined as to previous convictions if he denies one, though not if he only denies the other, of the two ingredients of the crime. In our opinion, this is one of the cases where the court is justified in holding that some limitation must be put on the words of the section since to decide otherwise would be to do grave injustice never intended by Parliament."

Counsel for the Crown argued that this case was wrongly decided. He contended that their ordinary meaning should be given to the words of the section and that Parliament had intended to provide that, if the accused attacked a prosecution witness in a certain manner, the protection given by the statute would be lifted and the accused would be attacked in the same manner.

In my opinion R. v. Turner (35) and R. v. Sheean (36) were both rightly decided. HUMPHREYS, J., did not define the limitation which he thought must be put on the terms of the statute in precise terms, but I think that it is apparent from what he said that the limitation was as to the meaning to be attached to the words "the nature or conduct of the defence" by treating the traversing of an issue raised by the prosecution, the mere denial of an allegation made by the prosecution, even if that denial necessarily involved, as did the allegation of consent in a rape case, an imputation on character as not coming within those words. Applying this test to the facts of this case it cannot, in my opinion, be said that the questions put to McLaughlin and the appellant's evidence were just a traverse or denial of an issue raised by the prosecution. However necessary it may have been to make those imputations if the appellant was to have any hope of acquittal, they were additional to a denial that the conduct alleged had taken place in the appellant's bedroom.

In Stirland's case (37) LORD SIMON, L.C., in formulating certain principles in relation to the section said (38):

"An accused is not to be regarded as depriving himself of the protection of the section, because the proper conduct of his defence necessitates the making of injurious reflections on the prosecutor or his witnesses."

and he cited R. v. Turner (35) for this proposition. In R. v. Jenkins (39) SINGLETON, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal, pointed out that the decision in R. v. Hudson (40) had not been criticised and in this case that decision was followed. In relation to the above statement of LORD SIMON, L.C., in Stirland's case (38) he said (41):

"It does not appear to us that the LORD CHANCELLOR [VISCOUNT SIMON] in using those words had in mind any idea of upsetting or weakening that which had been said in this Court in [R. v.] Hudson (40). If that had been the

- A desire of the House of Lords it would have been so stated. It is not. The House of Lords in that case had not to consider the words of the subsection which had been discussed before us at all, and Hudson's case (42), in consequence, was not referred to . . . We cannot think that it was intended in any sense in the House of Lords in Stirland's case (43) to overrule the decision of this court in Hudson's case (42)."
- B The problem then came before the Scottish courts. In O'Hara v. H.M. Advocate (44) the Lord Justice Clerk (LORD THOMSON) after reviewing the authorities came to the conclusion that the net result was that the Court of Criminal Appeal "adheres to Hudson (42) with certain modifications in cases of rape and subject to the discretionary power of the presiding judge". He said that in his judgment the statute warranted a distinction being drawn between two sets of cases,
- C however difficult it might be to say on which side of the line any particular case fell. He said (45):

- "Broadly the two classes are (i) where the cross-examination is necessary to enable the accused fairly to establish his defence to the indictment albeit it involves an invitation to the jury to disbelieve the witnesses so cross-examined in so far as they testify in support of the indictment, and
- D (ii) where the cross-examination attacks the general character of the witness."

- This distinction was followed in Fielking v. H.M. Advocate (46), where cross-examination of the accused as to character was permitted on the ground that the allegations were "no part of the essence of the defence". The Lord Justice-Clerk's conclusion in O'Hara's case (47) that under the section cross-examination as to the accused's character was not permitted if the cross-examination involving imputations on the character of the prosecutor or his witnesses was necessary to enable the accused fairly to establish his defence seems to me to be a restatement of what was said by CHANNELL, J., in R. v. Preston (48) and by LORD SIMON in Stirland's case (43). If the statement of LORD ALVERSTONE in R. v. Hudson (42) that it is not legitimate to qualify the words of the statute by
- F adding or inserting the words "for any purpose other than that of developing the defence" be accepted, as it was in R. v. Jenkins (49), it does not seem to me that the Lord Justice-Clerk's classification can be right.

- In R. v. Clark (50), it was held that the accused's allegation that a statement he signed had been dictated by a police officer was not a mere denial that he had made the statement but involved an imputation on the character of a prosecution witness. LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court, cited the passage of CHANNELL, J.'s judgment in R. v. Preston (51) set out above and said (52): "This was an attack by the appellant, not on the evidence of the police inspector, but on his conduct outside that evidence." It was held that the cross-examination of the accused as to character was permissible. R. v. Jenkins (49) does not appear to have been cited. In R. v. Cook (53), the question
- H was reviewed again by the Court of Criminal Appeal and again it was held following R. v. Hudson (42) and R. v. Jenkins (49) that the words of the statute should be given their ordinary and natural meaning. It was also said that nothing was to be gained by seeking to strain the words of the section in favour of the defence.

- I This completes my review of the cases to which it is necessary, in my opinion, to refer on the question of the interpretation to be given to the section. It is apparent that over the years controversy has raged on whether the section A permits cross-examination of the accused as to character when the making of the imputations was necessary to enable the accused to establish his defence.

I agree with what was said in R. v. Hudson (54), R. v. Jenkins (55) and R. v. Cook (56), that the words of the section must be given their natural and ordinary meaning. Can this be reconciled with the decision in the rape cases, R. v. Sheean (57) and R. v. Turner (58), that an accused person charged with that offence B can without risking cross-examination as to his character allege that the woman consented to the intercourse, although that necessarily involves an imputation on her character? It may be possible to do so on the basis stated by HUMPHREYS, J., namely, that the issue of non-consent is one raised by the prosecution and so that contesting that is not something introduced by the defence. This appears to involve a limitation on the meaning given to the words "nature or conduct C of the defence". I do not think that in the light of what I am going to say later it is necessary to come to a final conclusion on this.

The cases to which I have referred, some of which it is not possible to reconcile, must in my opinion finally establish the following propositions:

1. The words of the statute must be given their ordinary natural meaning
(R. v. Hudson (54); R. v. Jenkins (55); R. v. Cook (56)). D

2. The section permits cross-examination of the accused as to character both when imputations on the character of the prosecutor and his witnesses are cast to show their unreliability as witnesses independently of the evidence given by them and also when the casting of such imputations is necessary to enable the accused to establish his defence (R. v. Hudson (54);
R. v. Jenkins (55); R. v. Cook (56)). E

3. In rape cases the accused can allege consent without placing himself in peril of such cross-examination (R. v. Sheean (57); R. v. Turner (58)).
This may be because such cases are sui generis (per DEVLIN, J., in R. v. Cook (59)), or on the ground that the issue is one raised by the prosecution.

4. If what is said amounts in reality to no more than a denial of the charge, expressed, it may be, in emphatic language, it should not be regarded as coming within the section (R. v. Rouse (60); R. v. Grout (61); R. v.
Jones (62); R. v. Clark (63)). F

Applying these propositions to this case, it is in my opinion clear beyond all doubt that the cross-examination of the accused was permissible under the statute.

I now turn to the question whether a judge has discretion to refuse to permit such cross-examination of the accused even when it is permissible under the section. Counsel for the Crown submitted that there was no such discretion and contended that a judge at a criminal trial had no power to exclude evidence which was admissible. He submitted that the position was correctly stated by BANKES, J., in R. v. Fletcher (64) when he said (65): G

"Where the judge entertains a doubt as to the admissibility of evidence, he may suggest to the prosecution that they should not press it, but he cannot exclude evidence which he holds to be admissible." H

A Since that case it has been said in many cases that a judge has such a discretion. In Christie v. Director of Public Prosecutions (66), where the question was as to the admissibility of a statement made in the presence and hearing of the accused, LORD MOULTON said (67):

B “In a civil action evidence may always be given of any statement or communication made to the opposite party, provided it is relevant to the issues. The same is true of any act or behaviour of the party. The sole limitation is that the matter thus given in evidence must be relevant. I am of opinion that, as a strict matter of law, there is no difference in this respect between the rules of evidence in our civil and in our criminal procedure. But there is a great difference in the practice. The law is so much on its guard against the accused being prejudiced by evidence which, though admissible, would probably have a prejudicial influence on the minds of the jury which would be out of proportion to its true evidential value, that there has grown up a practice of a very salutary nature, under which the judge intimates to the counsel for the prosecution that he should not press for the admission of evidence which would be open to this objection, and such an intimation from the tribunal trying the case is usually sufficient to prevent the evidence being pressed in all cases where the scruples of the tribunal in this respect are reasonable. Under the influence of this practice, which is based on an anxiety to secure for every one a fair trial, there has grown up a custom of not admitting certain kinds of evidence which is so constantly followed that it almost amounts to a rule of procedure.”

E In R. v. Watson (68), the first case when the exercise of discretion in relation to cases coming within the section was mentioned, PICKFORD, J., said (69):

F “It has been pointed out that to apply the rule [in R. v. Hudson (70)] strictly is to put a hardship on a prisoner with a bad character. That may be so, but it does not follow that a judge necessarily allows the prisoner to be cross-examined to character; he has a discretion not to allow it and the prisoner has that protection.”

In Maxwell v. Director of Public Prosecutions (71) and in Stirland's case (72), it was said in this House that a judge has that discretion. In R. v. Jenkins (73) SINGLETON, J., said (74):

G “If and when such a situation arises [the question whether the accused should be cross-examined as to character] it is open to counsel to apply to the presiding judge that he may be allowed to take the course indicated . . . Such an application will not always be granted, for the judge has a discretion in the matter. He may feel that even though the position is established in law, still the putting of such questions as to the character of the accused person may be fraught with results which immeasurably outweigh the result of questions put by the defence and which make a fair trial of the accused person almost impossible. On the other hand, in the ordinary and normal case he may feel that if the credit of the prosecutor or his witnesses has been attacked, it is only fair that the jury should have before them material on which they can form their judgment whether the accused person is any more worthy to be believed than those he has attacked. It is obviously unfair that the jury should be left in the dark about an accused person's character if the conduct of his defence has attacked the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution within the meaning of the section. The essential thing is a fair trial and that the legislature sought to ensure by s. 1 (f)."

Similar views were expressed in Noor Mohamed v. Regem (75) by LORD DU PARCQ, in Harris v. Director of Public Prosecutions (76), in R. v. Cook (77), in Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (78) and in other cases.

In the light of what was said in all these cases by judges of great eminence, one is tempted to say, as LORD HEWART said in R. v. Dunkley (79), that it is far too late in the day even to consider the argument that a judge has no such discretion. Let it suffice for me to say that in my opinion the existence of such a discretion is now clearly established.

Counsel for the Crown posed the question, on what principle should such a discretion be exercised. In R. v. Flynn (80) the court said (81):

"... where ... the very nature of the defence necessarily involves an imputation against a prosecution witness or witnesses, the discretion should in the opinion of this court, be as a general rule exercised in favour of the accused, that is to say, evidence as to his bad character or criminal record should be excluded. If it were otherwise, it comes to this, that the Act of 1898, the very Act which gave the charter, so to speak, to an accused person to give evidence on oath in the witness box, would be a mere trap because he would be unable to put forward any defence, no matter how true, which involved an imputation on the character of the prosecutor or any of his witnesses, without running the risk if he had the misfortune to have a record, of his previous convictions being brought up in a court while being tried on a wholly different matter."

No authority is given for this supposed general rule. In my opinion, the court was wrong in thinking that there was any such rule. If there was any such general rule, it would amount under the guise of the exercise of discretion, to the insertion of a proviso to the statute of the very kind that was said in R. v. Hudson (82) not to be legitimate.

I do not think it possible to improve on the guidance given by SINGLETON, J., in the passage quoted above from R. v. Jenkins (83), by LORD DU PARCQ in Noor v. Mohamed's case (75), or by DEVLIN, J., in R. v. Cook (77) as to the matters which should be borne in mind in relation to the exercise of the discretion. It is now so well established that on a charge of rape the allegation that the woman consented, although involving an imputation on her character, should not expose an accused to cross-examination as to character, that it is possible to say, if the refusal to allow it is a matter of discretion, that there is a general rule that the discretion should be so exercised. Apart from this, there is not I think, any general rule as to the exercise of discretion. It must depend on the circumstances of each case and the overriding duty of the judge to ensure that a trial is fair.

It is desirable that a warning should be given when it becomes apparent that the defence is taking a course which may expose the accused to such cross-examination. That was not given in this case, but the failure to give such a warning would not, in my opinion, justify in this case the allowing of the appeal.

In my opinion the cross-examination of the accused was permissible under

A the section and it cannot be said the judge exercised his discretion wrongly in allowing it to take place. As PICKFORD, J., said in R. v. Watson (84):

“ . . . in order to see if the conviction should be quashed, it is not enough that the court thinks it would have exercised its discretion differently. It is necessary to show that in law the cross-examination of the prisoner was inadmissible.”

B As DEVLIN, J., said in R. v. Cook (85):

“ It is well settled that this court will not interfere with the exercise of a discretion by the judge below unless he has erred in principle or there is no material on which he could properly have arrived at his decision.”

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

C LORD HODSON: My Lords, the points of law certified by the Court of Appeal (86) as being of general public importance are:

(i) If the making of the imputation is necessary for the proper development of the defence, is the cross-examination permitted by the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 1 (f) (ii)?

D (ii) Is there a general rule as to the exercise of the judge's discretion as stated in R. v. Flynn (87)?

Section 1 proviso (f) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, reads as follows:

“ A person charged and called as a witness in pursuance of this Act shall not be asked, and if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he has committed or been convicted of or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged, or is of bad character, unless—

E “ (i) the proof that he has committed or been convicted of such other offence is admissible evidence to show that he is guilty of the offence wherewith he is then charged; or

F “ (ii) he has personally or by his advocate asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to establish his own good character, or has given evidence of his good character, or the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution; or

G “ (iii) he has given evidence against any other person charged with the same offence.”

The prohibition in the first part of the section, though absolute in its terms does not prevent questions concerning his record being put to the accused in chief on the rare occasions when he wishes to volunteer evidence on the subject (see Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (88), per LORD REID (89)).

H The words which have caused difficulty in s. 1 (f) (ii) as taking away the shield provided by the prohibition are these, “ unless . . . the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution ”. The word “ character ” is used no less than four times in the section and one would naturally expect it to bear the same meaning throughout. At common law a witness could only be asked about the reputation of the accused and not about specific acts tending to show the real disposition of the accused. This was finally settled in 1865 by the Court of Crown Cases Reserved in R. v. Rowton (90).

cannot, however, be easily fitted into the common law conception of character as limited to general reputation. As LORD HEWART, C.J., pointed out in R. v. Dunkley (91), a case concerned with imputations on the character of a prosecution witness (92):

"... it is not difficult to suppose that a formidable argument might have been raised on the phrasing of this statute, that the character which is spoken of is the character which is so well known in the vocabulary of the criminal law, namely, the general reputation of the person referred to; in other words, that 'character' in that context and in every part of it, in the last part no less than in the first, in the third part no less than in the second, bears the meaning which the term 'character' was held to bear, for example, in R. v. Rowton (93)."

He concluded, however, that it was much too late to consider such an argument in the light of the long series of decisions.

In Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (94), VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., speaking of the first part of s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) said (95):

"There is perhaps some vagueness in the use of the term 'good character' in this connexion. Does it refer to the good reputation which a man may bear in his own circle, or does it refer to a man's real disposition as distinct from what his friends and neighbours may think of him?"

LORD SIMON was inclined to think that both conceptions were combined in s. 1, proviso (f).

In Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (96) LORD DENNING adopted LORD HEWART'S view, but LORD DEVLIN expressed the view that the meaning intended by the draftsman was "reputation" and nothing else.

Coupled with the word "imputation", a word which generally has an evil implication, it seems that to give the word "character" the limited meaning of general reputation would rob the section of any sensible meaning, for it would then be possible to argue that someone who swore that a policeman had extracted a confession from him by violence was not casting imputations on the character of a witness for the prosecution (see PROFESSOR CROSS'S book on EVIDENCE (3rd Edn.) p. 348).

The great difficulty lies in construing the word "imputation" in its context, and this has led to great conflict of judicial authority for the cases are not reconcilable on any recognisable principle. It has been accepted, and I do not quarrel with the acceptance, that to call the prosecutor a liar is not sufficient to deprive the accused of his statutory protection (R. v. Rouse (97)). This decision did not, however, prevent the Court of Criminal Appeal reaching the conclusion that an assertion that the prosecutor was such a horrible liar that his brother would not speak to him deprived the accused of protection (R. v. Rappolt (98)). In R. v. Jones (99) LORD HEWART, C.J., after saying that a clear line is drawn between words which are an emphatic denial of the Crown's evidence and words which attack the character or conduct of the witness, added (100):

"It was one thing for the appellant to deny that he had made the confession, but it is another thing to say that the whole thing was an elaborate and deliberate concoction on the part of the inspector."

A The line is a narrow one and the same judge in another case said (101) that it is not possible to lay down, even if it were desirable, as the authorities stand, a series of formulae or regulations on this matter (R. v. Dunkley (101)).

It was at one time considered that the accused only exposes himself to cross-examination on his record when the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve "unnecessary" or "unjustifiable" imputations on the character of

B the prosecutor or witnesses for the prosecution. The full Court of Criminal Appeal, however, disposed of this consideration in R. v. Hudson (102). The judgment of the court delivered by LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. contains this passage which should, I think, be accepted as correct. It reads (103):

C "We think that the words of the section, 'unless the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations', etc., must receive their ordinary and natural interpretation, and that it is not legitimate to qualify them by adding or inserting the words 'unnecessarily', or 'unjustifiably', or 'for purposes other than that of developing the defence', or other similar words."

Notwithstanding this clear statement there is an apparent anomaly in the rape cases, where it has long been consistently held that allegations by someone accused of rape to the effect that the prosecutrix had been guilty of gross indecency did not deprive him of his shield. This has not been doubted since the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Turner (104) in a judgment delivered by HUMPHREYS, J., affirmed by this House in Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (105). VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., there enumerated a proposition

E which he purported to found on R. v. Turner (104) that an accused is not to be regarded as depriving himself of the protection of the statute because the proper conduct of his defence necessitates the making of injurious reflections on the prosecutor or his witnesses. This would appear, on the face of it, to conflict with the injunction against adding words to the statute which the decision in R. v. Hudson (102) rightly condemns, and it may be that the rape cases may
F be best justified by the following extract from the judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., in Turner's case (104). He said (106):

"... the defence of consent in rape is in truth nothing more than a denial by the accused that the prosecution has established one of the two essential ingredients of the charge. It is and must be the prosecution which introduces the question of consent or non-consent."

G It is, I think, right to say that the full width of LORD SIMON's proposition has not been followed in the Court of Criminal Appeal in the sense of detracting from the validity of what was said in R. v. Hudson (102) (see R. v. Jenkins (107) where SINGLETON, J., giving the judgment of the court expressed the opinion that LORD SIMON in using those words had not in mind any idea of upsetting or weakening what had been said in R. v. Hudson (102)).

H It is unnecessary, in my opinion, to refer to all the cases in which the court of Criminal Appeal have considered the meaning of the word "imputation" in the section, but mention should be made of R. v. Cook (108) where the judgment of a full court was delivered by DEVLIN, J., who pointed out that the subsection as a whole makes it clear that it does not intend that the introduction of a person's previous convictions should be other than exceptional. He proceeded (109):

"The difficulty about its phraseology is that, unless it is given some restricted meaning, a person's bad character, if he had one, would emerge almost as a matter of course. Counsel for the defence could not submit that a witness for the prosecution was untruthful without making an imputation upon his character; a prisoner charged with assault could not assert that the prosecution struck first without imputing to him a similar crime. The authorities show that this court has endeavoured to surmount the difficulty in two ways. First, it has in a number of cases construed the words as benevolently as possible in favour of the accused. Secondly, it has laid it down that in cases which fall within the words the trial judge must not allow as a matter of course questions designed to show bad character; he must weigh the prejudicial effect of such questions against the damage done by the attack on the prosecution's witnesses, and must generally exercise his discretion so as to secure a trial that is fair both to the prosecution and to the defence."

I would emphasise that what was said in this case on the subject of the benevolent interpretation which has been given to the subsection relates to the early authorities decided before attention was directed to the exercise of the judge's discretion to secure a fair trial.

I now turn to the matter of discretion and shall have to refer to R. v. Cook (110) again in this connexion. It was argued on behalf of the appellant that there was a discretion in the court under the section but that the conception of fairness in the exercise of that discretion was too imprecise and he relied on the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Flynn (111) where it was said that where "... the very nature of the defence necessarily involves an imputation against a prosecution witness or witnesses the discretion should, in the opinion of this court be as a general rule exercised in favour of the accused, that is to say, evidence as to his bad character or criminal record should be excluded."

It was argued that to limit the effect of the subsection to the exercise of the judge's unfettered discretion had worked in practice in an unsatisfactory manner leading to great variations in practice. The operation of the proviso should not, therefore, normally depend on the discretion of the trial judge.

The appellant, it was submitted, did not in this case throw away his shield by his imputation against the prosecution witness that the witness carried indecent photographs about with him being a homosexual who had previously that day allowed himself to be buggered for money and was offering to submit to the accused for the same purpose, also for money.

I agree with the Court of Appeal (112) that to import the general rule referred to in R. v. Flynn (113) would be to place an unwarranted gloss on the words of the statute and to run counter to the decision in R. v. Hudson (114) where such a general rule was rejected, and rightly so. If there is a discretion to admit or exclude questions where imputations are made it cannot be right to fetter that discretion by laying down rules and regulations for its exercise. "Fair", as a word, may be imprecise, but I find it impossible to define it or even to attempt an enumeration of all the factors which have to be taken into account in any given case.

The Crown, on the other hand, has contended before your lordships that the trial judge has no discretion whether to admit or exclude evidence. The words of the section are plain and define the circumstances in which the accused throws

A away his shield. His protection having ceased, the statute clearly provides that his record may be put to the accused. Where then, he asks, is there room for discretion to be exercised to prevent this being done? The answer is twofold. First, there is a long line of authority to support the opinion that there is such a discretion to be exercised under this subsection. In the second place, which is I think more significant, there is abundant authority that in criminal cases B there is a discretion to exclude evidence, admissible in law, of which the prejudicial effect against the accused outweighs its probative value in the opinion of the trial judge.

It is true that the exercise of this discretion is not to be found until comparatively recent times. Under the subsection the matter was uncertain in the year 1913 when two conflicting decisions were given in the Court of Criminal C Appeal. In April of that year it was held that a trial judge has a discretion, with which the court will be slow to interfere, whether he will allow cross-examination as to character under s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) of the Act of 1898 (see R. v. Watson (115)). PICKFORD, J. pointed out (116) that the hardship on a prisoner with a bad character can be avoided, for it does not follow that a judge necessarily allows the prisoner to be cross-examined to character; he D has a discretion not to allow it and the prisoner has that protection. In June of the same year a court differently constituted came to the opposite conclusion (see R. v. Fletcher (117)). BANKES, J. thought (118) that a judge could go no further than suggest to the prosecution that they should not press it but he cannot exclude evidence which he held to be admissible. In your lordships' House in the next year in the case of Christie v. Director of Public Prosecutions E (119), LORD MOULTON, on the general question of a discretion to exclude admissible evidence, stated the position thus (120):

"The law is so much on its guard against the accused being prejudiced by evidence which, though admissible, would probably have a prejudicial influence on the minds of the jury which would be out of proportion to its true evidential value, but there has grown up a practice of a very salutary F nature, under which the judge intimates to counsel for the prosecution that he should not press for the admission of evidence which would be open to this objection, and such an intimation from the tribunal trying the case is usually sufficient to prevent the evidence being pressed in all cases where the scruples of the tribunal in this respect are reasonable. Under the influence G of this practice, which is based on an anxiety to secure for everyone a fair trial, there has grown up a custom of not admitting certain kinds of evidence which is so consistently followed that it almost amounts to a rule of procedure."

From this time onwards the position has been accepted that there is a discretion to exclude admissible evidence in all criminal cases notwithstanding the guarded H approach made by BANKES, J. (118) and LORD MOULTON (120) respectively.

In 1934 LORD SANKEY, L.C., in Maxwell v. Director of Public Prosecutions (121), stated baldly (122), in connexion with this section that the judge had a discretion under s. 1, proviso (f). In 1944 LORD SIMON, L.C. in Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (123) stated in general terms, though with reference to a statement as to the accused's past record, that all was subject to the judge's I discretion to disallow any questions which in the circumstances he thinks unfair.

In 1949 in Noor Mohamed v. Regem (124), LORD DU PARCQ, giving the judgment of the Board used words of general application in dealing with circumstances in which a prosecution might be entitled to give evidence of guilty intent. He said (125):

"It is right to add, however, that in all such cases the judge ought to consider whether the evidence which it is proposed to adduce is sufficiently substantial, having regard to the purpose to which it is professedly directed, to make it desirable in the interest of justice that it should be admitted. If, so far as that purpose is concerned, it can in the circumstances of the case have only trifling weight, the judge will be right to exclude it. To say this is not to confuse weight with admissibility. The distinction is plain, but cases must occur in which it would be unjust to admit evidence of a character gravely prejudicial to the accused even though there may be some tenuous ground for holding it technically admissible. The decision must then be left to the discretion and the sense of fairness of the judge."

In Harris v. Director of Public Prosecutions (126) the question was whether or not on an indictment of larceny evidence of previous larcenies of a similar kind (on which the accused was acquitted) should have been excluded from the consideration of the jury. LORD SIMON read the passage I have cited from Noor Mohamed's case (125) and prefaced his reading of it by saying (127):

"It is not a rule of law governing the admissibility of evidence, but a rule of judicial practice followed by a judge who is trying a charge of crime when he thinks that the application of the practice is called for."

The last two cases were followed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Kuruma Son of Kanu v. Reginam (128), where an illegal search of the accused disclosed unlawful possession of ammunition. LORD GODDARD, C.J., in giving the reasons for the dismissal of the appeal, said (129):

"No doubt in a criminal case the judge always has a discretion to disallow evidence if the strict rules of admissibility would operate unfairly against the accused."

In the same year in the Court of Criminal Appeal, LORD GODDARD, C.J., affirmed the duty to exercise discretion with regard to s. 1, proviso (f) (R. v. Clark (130)).

This line of authority has been followed consistently to the present time in cases which have been cited to your lordships. As recently as 1962 in Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (131) the existence of the general judicial discretion as vested in the judge not in the prosecution was affirmed in these words by LORD DENNING, M.R. (131):

"The judge was entitled in his discretion to exclude them [viz. questions] if he thought they were so prejudicial as to outweigh their probative value."

The discretionary principle of fairness to the accused has been adopted in Scotland (see Lawrie v. Muir (132)) and in Northern Ireland (see R. v. Murphy (133)).

I now refer again to R. v. Cook (134) in which the judgment, delivered by DEVLIN, J., pointed out (135) that the attempt to give a limited construction to the words of the subsection has led to decisions which are difficult to reconcile

A with one another and, now that it is clearly established that the trial judge has a discretion and that he must exercise it so as to secure that the defence is not unfairly prejudiced, there is nothing to be gained by seeking to strain the words of the subsection in favour of the defence.

If the word "imputation" is benevolently construed in favour of the defence so as to exclude imputations of little weight or of relatively minor significance B in proportion to the character of the accused as revealed by his record, the trial judge can in the exercise of his discretion protect the accused from too severe an application of the section. I do not myself think it profitable to endeavour to give clear directions as to what should be done in particular cases. This has been done in rape cases which may be explained, as HUMPHREYS, J., did in R. v. Turner (136) or simply treated as sui generis as DEVLIN, J., suggested in R. v. Cook (137). As PROFESSOR CROSS points out in his book EVIDENCE (3rd Edn.) C at p. 354, the conception of a discretion which must generally be exercised in a particular way may be juridically odd, but it has the merit of providing a practical solution to the problem. Perhaps this is the best justification for the practice which is sanctified by authority in the rape cases. I would not wish, however, to extend the list of categories. Discretion ought not to be confined save by the limits D of fairness. Sense of fairness is, after all (in the authorities), always treated as the equivalent of discretion.

In this case I agree with the Court of Appeal (138) that once one escapes from the idea of a general rule introduced by R. v. Flynn (139) there is no ground for saying that the judge was wrong in the exercise of his discretion. Imputations of a serious nature were made and the cross-examination was rightly admitted. E The failure to prove the convictions was not important having regard to the way the appellant answered the questions put to him in cross-examination. Further, I do not think that there is any substance in the suggestion that the appellant was in any sense trapped by the learned judge into making the imputations which he did. I do not think further that there was any material defect in the directions given to the jury on the question of the relevance of the admissions and the F absence of strict proof of the convictions.

I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD GUEST: My Lords, there can be few branches of the criminal law which have given rise to so many appeals as those concerning the application of s. 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898. The reason is not far to seek. Most G defences at a criminal trial involve questions as to the credibility or character of the prosecution witnesses; a great many accused persons have previous convictions, so a clash becomes inevitable. Under what circumstances, in regard to s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) of the Act of 1898, is the accused to be cross-examined as to his previous convictions, the ordinary rule being that evidence of his bad character is not admissible?

H A very great number of authorities was referred to. Some are inconsistent and not easy to reconcile. I propose to isolate only a few. The first reported case after the Act of 1898 was R. v. Rouse (140). For the accused to call a prosecution witness "a liar" was held not to involve an imputation on his character. This was merely an emphatic denial of the truth of the allegation against him.

I In R. v. Preston (141), a rather special case, there was a challenge of the police inspector's conduct of identification parade proceedings, but which did not form part of the defence. This was held in the circumstances not to involve an imputation on the character of the inspector. After quoting s. 1, proviso (f) CHANNELL, J., said (142):

(136) [1944] 1 All E.R. 599; [1944] K.B. 463.

(137) [1959] 2 All E.R. at p. 99; [1959] 2 Q.B. at p. 345.

(138) [1968] 1 All E.R. 94.

(139) [1961] 3 All E.R. 58; [1963] 1 Q.B. 729.

(140) [1904] 1 K.B. 184.

(141) [1909] 1 K.B. 568.

(142) [1909] 1 K.B. at p. 575.

"It appears to us to mean this: that if the defence is so conducted, or the nature of the defence is such, as to involve the proposition that the jury ought not to believe the prosecutor or one of the witnesses for the prosecution upon the ground that his conduct—not his evidence in the case, but his conduct outside the evidence given by him—makes him an unreliable witness, then the jury ought also to know the character of the prisoner who either gives that evidence or makes that charge, and it then becomes admissible to cross-examine the prisoner as to his antecedents and character with the view of showing that he has such a bad character that the jury ought not to rely on his evidence."

Thereafter the decisions were confusing and a full court was assembled in R. v. Hudson (143). On a charge of theft the defence was that the Crown witnesses had stolen the goods and that they had planted them on the accused, and the witnesses were asked questions to show that they had committed the theft. It was held that the words of s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) must receive their ordinary and natural interpretation and must not be qualified by adding or importing the words "unjustifiably" or "for purposes other than that of developing the defence" or other similar words. In that case the nature and conduct of the defence was held to be such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecution witnesses. In my view, this was the proper corrective for the confusion which the law had reached and the principle in this case should have formed the future guidance for the interpretation of the section.

No sooner, however, had this decision been given than we find expressions of opinion that the trial judge had a discretion in certain cases to mitigate the harsh or strict application of s. 1, proviso (f) (ii). The first mention of this occurred in R. v. Watson (144) where PICKFORD, J. (145) said that to apply the rule in R. v. Hudson (143) strictly would be to put a hardship on a prisoner with a bad character:

"That may be so, but it does not follow that a judge necessarily allows the prisoner to be cross-examined to character; he has a discretion not to allow it, and the prisoner has that protection."

In R. v. Jones (146) to suggest that a prosecution witness had fabricated evidence was an imputation on his character. LORD HEWART, C.J., said (147) there was a clear line between an emphatic denial of the evidence and an attack on the conduct or character of a witness which fabrication involved.

R. v. Turner (148), another full court case, has created difficulties. It was held that the defence of consent to a charge of rape was not an imputation on the character of the prosecutrix. The basis of the decision was that, as lack of consent was an element in the offence of rape which had to be proved by the prosecution, it was so closely connected with a denial of the charge as to form part of the defence and that some words of limitation must be put on s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) to prevent an injustice. It was said that this was in agreement with the uniform practice for the last thirty-five years. In Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (149), a case not concerned with s. 1, proviso (f) (ii), VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in the course of enumerating certain propositions said (150):

"4. An accused is not to be regarded as depriving himself of the protection of the section, because the proper conduct of his defence necessitates the making of injurious reflections on the prosecutor or his witness: R. v. Turner (148)."

A This observation was obiter.

The next landmark is R. v. Cook (151) where a full court was assembled. DEVLIN, J., giving the judgment of the court, after reviewing the authorities, said (152):

B "In our opinion the difficulties created by s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) are as a general rule best dealt with in accordance with the principle in R. v. Hudson (153) as applied in R. v. Jenkins (154). The attempt to give the words a limited construction has led to decisions which it is difficult to reconcile; now that it is clearly established that the trial judge has a discretion and that he must exercise it so as to secure that the defence is not unfairly prejudiced, there is nothing to be gained by seeking to strain the words of s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) in favour of the defence. We think, therefore, that the words should be given their natural and ordinary meaning and that the trial judge should, in his discretion, do what is necessary in the circumstances to protect the prisoner from an application of s. 1, proviso (f) that would be too severe."

D This decision might have been thought to lay at rest any confusion which had previously existed, but further confusion was occasioned by R. v. Flynn (155), another full court case. This is the case which has given rise to great difficulty in view of SLADE, J.'s statement that where the very nature of the defence necessarily involves imputations on the character of the prosecution witness, the trial judge should as a general rule exercise his discretion in favour of the accused. He based this judgment on R. v. Cook (151).

E Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (156) is long and complicated and it is unnecessary to do more than say that there is approval by LORD DEVLIN (157) of R. v. Turner (158) and LORD SIMON's fourth proposition in Stirland's case (159).

F And so we reach the present decision where the Court of Appeal (criminal division) (160) followed R. v. Hudson (153) and declined to say that R. v. Flynn (155) had laid down any general rule as to the exercise of the judge's discretion under s. 1, proviso (f) (ii).

G If I had thought that there was no discretion in English law for a judge to disallow admissible evidence, as counsel for the Crown argued, I should have striven hard and long to give a benevolent construction to s. 1, proviso (f) (ii), which would exclude such cases as R. v. Rouse (161) "liar", R. v. Rappolt (162) "horrible liar", Jones's case (156) "fabricated evidence", R. v. Turner (158) rape and other sexual offences, R. v. Brown (163) "self defence". I cannot believe that Parliament can have intended that in such cases an accused could only put forward such a defence at peril of having its character put before the jury. This would be to defeat the benevolent purposes of the Act of 1898 which was for the first time to allow the accused to give evidence on his own behalf in all criminal cases. This would deprive the accused of the advantage of the Act. I am not persuaded, however, by the Crown's argument and I am satisfied on a review of all the authorities that in English law such a discretion does exist. It was exercised for the first time in relation to this section in R. v. Watson (164). A Discretion as such has the general blessing of LORD MOULTON in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Christie (165) and thereafter it has been the uniform practice of judges to exercise it in this class of case. Discretion was recognised in this House in Maxwell v. Director of Public Prosecutions (166); Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (167); Harris v. Director of Public Prosecutions (168), and Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (169). Also in the Privy Council in Noor Mohamed v. Regem (170) and Karuma, Son of Kaniu v. Reginam (171). In face of this long established practice it is, in my opinion, now too late to say that the judge has no discretion. While I leave to others more versed than I am in English criminal law and practice to discuss the origin of this discretion I would assume that it springs from the inherent power of the judge to control the trial before him and to see that justice is done in fairness to the accused. B

I wish to say only this about the Scottish cases which were referred to in argument. The actual decision in O'Hara v. H.M. Advocate (172), followed as it was by Fielding v. H.M. Advocate (173), would appear to be correct and I respectfully adopt the reasoning of the Lord Justice Clerk (LORD THOMSON) in O'Hara's case (174). Whether the discretion in Scotland is exercised in relation to the admissibility of evidence or in relation to the disallowance of evidence is a matter of emphasis and may be open to doubt in view of Lawrie v. Muir (175). C

I find it unnecessary to say more on the principles on which discretion should be exercised. The guiding star should be fairness to the accused. This idea is best expressed by DEVLIN, J., in R. v. Cook (176). In following this star the fact that the imputation was a necessary part of the accused's defence is a consideration which will no doubt be taken into account by the trial judge. If, however, the accused or his counsel goes beyond developing his defence in order to blacken the character of a prosecution witness, this no doubt will be another factor to be taken into account. If it is suggested that the exercise of this discretion may be whimsical and depend on the individual idiosyncrasies of the judge, this is inevitable where it is a question of discretion, but I am satisfied that this is a less risk than attempting to shackle the judge's power within a straight jacket. D

On the facts of this case I have no doubt that the nature and conduct of the defence was such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecution witness. It was suggested to him that he had been to bed with another man that afternoon and earned a £1, and that he asked the appellant for a £1 to go to bed with him, and further that he had brought indecent photographs with him to the appellant's room where they were found by the police. These suggestions were denied by McLaughlin. These were clearly imputations on the character of the prosecution witness and would entitle the prosecution to cross-examine the appellant as to his previous convictions. It should be added that the evidence of the doctor was to the effect that the condition of McLaughlin was such as to be consistent with his having had sexual intercourse with someone on that day. So that it was relevant for the defence to establish that another man might have been responsible for McLaughlin's condition. However this may be there were, apart from this, the strongest imputations against McLaughlin's character. E

I would dismiss the appeal. F

A LORD PEARCE: My Lords, ever since the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, came into force there has been difficulty and argument about the application of the words in s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) "the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution".

B Two main views have been put forward. One view adopts the literal meaning of the words. The prosecutor is cross-examined to show that he has fabricated the charge for improper reasons. That involves imputations on his character. Therefore it lets in the previous convictions of the accused. The practical justification for this view is the "tit for tat" argument. If the accused is seeking to cast discredit on the prosecution, then the prosecution should be allowed to do likewise. If the accused is seeking to persuade the jury that the prosecutor behaved like a knave, then the jury should know the character of the man who makes these accusations, so that it may judge fairly between them instead of being in the dark as to one of them.

C The other view would limit the literal meaning of the words. For it cannot, it is said, have been intended by Parliament to make a man liable to have his previous convictions revealed whenever the essence of his defence necessitates imputations on the character of the prosecutor. This revelation is always damaging and often fatal to a defence. The high-water mark of this argument is the ordinary case of rape. In this the vital issue (as a rule) is whether the woman consented. Consent (as a rule) involves imputations on her character. Therefore in the ordinary case of rape, the accused cannot defend himself without letting in his previous convictions. The same argument extends in varying lesser degrees to many cases.

D The argument in favour of a construction more liberal to the accused is supported in two ways.

E First, it is said that character is used in the sense in which it was used in R. v. Rowton (177) where the full court ruled that evidence of good character must be limited solely to general reputation and not to a man's actual disposition; and no imputation on the prosecutor's general reputation is involved by allegations that he acted as a knave in matters relevant to the offence charged. So far as the meaning of "character" is concerned, there is much force in this argument. It would accord with the word "character" as used three times previously in the same subsection. (See the judgment delivered by Lord HEWART, C.J. in R. v. Dunkley (178), where the argument was described as formidable but was rejected (179)):

F "Nevertheless when one looks at the long line of cases beginning very shortly after the passing of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 it does not appear that the argument has ever been so much as formulated. One can only say that it is now much too late in the day even to consider that argument, because that argument could not now prevail without the revision, and indeed to a great extent the overthrow, of a very long series of decisions."

G A similar view was expressed by LORD DENNING in Jones v. Director of Public Prosecutions (180) (see also LORD DEVLIN (181)) a case which dealt with a kindred problem under s. 1, proviso (f) (i). VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., however, in Stirland v. Director of Public Prosecutions (182), after discussing the two conceptions, that is reputation and real disposition, said (183), "I am disposed to think that in para. (f) (where the word 'character' occurs four times) both conceptions are combined". A

Late as it may be, it might be justifiable to consider whether "character" means in the context solely general reputation, if a reassessment could lead to any clarification of the problem; but in my opinion it leads nowhere. For I cannot accept the proposition that to accuse a person of a particular knavery does not involve imputations on his general reputation. The words "involve" and "imputations" are wide. It would be playing with words to say that the allegation of really discreditable matters does not involve imputations on his general reputation, if only as showing how erroneous that reputation must be. The argument is, however, a valuable reminder that the Act of 1898 is intending serious and not trivial imputations. B

The second part of the argument in favour of a construction more liberal to the accused is concerned with the words "the conduct or nature of the defence". One should, it can be argued, read conduct or nature as something superimposed on the essence of the defence itself. In O'Hara v. H.M. Advocate (184), the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD THOMSON), after a careful review of the English cases construed "conduct" as meaning the actual handling of the case by the accused or his advocate. He found difficulty with "nature" but said (185): C

"But the more general considerations which I have mentioned persuade me to the view that 'nature' is to be read, not as meaning something which is inherent in the defence, but as referable to the mechanism of the defence; nature being the strategy of the defence and conduct the tactics." D

This argument has obvious force, particularly in a case of rape, where the allegation of consent is in truth no more than a mere traverse of the essential ingredient which the Crown have to prove, namely want of consent. The argument, however, does not, and I think cannot, fairly stop short of contending that all matters which are relevant to the crime, i.e., of which rebutting evidence could be proved, are excluded from the words conduct or nature of the defence. E

To take the present case as an example, the evidence having established physical signs on the victim of the alleged offence, his admission that he had previously committed it with somebody else was relevant. So, too, was his admission that he had been paid £1 for it, since when the conversation was relevant it could not be right to bowdlerise it. Therefore, it is said, the putting of the allegation in cross-examination and the evidence given by the accused was an essentially relevant part of the defence and therefore was not within the words "the nature or conduct of the defence". If counsel for the appellant's forceful argument on the proper construction of the subsection is right, the story told by the accused did not let in the convictions. F

So large a gloss on the words is not easy to justify, even if one were convinced that it necessarily produced a fair and proper result which Parliament intended; but there are two sides to the matter. So liberal a shield for an accused is in many cases unfair to a prosecution. Provided it is all linked up to the defence put forward by an accused there would be no limit to the amount of mud which could be thrown against an unshielded prosecutor while the accused could still crouch behind his own shield. Counsel for the appellant relies on an alternative argument that, even if the stricter construction is correct, yet R. v. Flynn (186) has established something akin to a rule by which the judge except in rare circumstances should always exercise his discretion in a way which would produce an effect similar to the more liberal construction. G I

Such being the problems set by the Act of 1898, the general course of the cases was as follows. The first reported case was R. v. Marshall (187) where (187) (1899), 63 J.P. 38.

A the stricter view was taken. It was also taken by implication in R. v. Rouse (188). In R. v. Bridgewater (189), however, in R. v. Preston (190) and finally in R. v. Westfall (191), there were certain expressions which supported the less strict construction. These were considered by a full court in R. v. Hudson (192), which took the stricter view (193):

B “We think that the words of the section ‘unless the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations’ etc. must receive their ordinary and natural interpretation and that it is not legitimate to qualify them by adding or inserting the words ‘unnecessarily’, or ‘unjustifiably’, or ‘for purposes other than developing the defence’, or other similar words.”

C That view was followed by R. v. Watson (194) in which PICKFORD, J., giving the judgment of the court (of which AVORY, J. was a member) quoted the above passage from R. v. Hudson (195) and said (196):

D “It has been pointed out that to apply the rule strictly is to put a hardship on a prisoner with a bad character. That may be so, but it does not follow that a judge necessarily allows the prisoner to be cross-examined to character; he has a discretion not to allow it, and the prisoner has that protection. But in order to see if the conviction should be upheld, it is not enough that the court should think it would have exercised its discretion differently. It is necessary to show that in law the cross-examination of the prisoner was inadmissible. The judge at the trial is in a better position to judge whether the cross-examination is to be allowed.”

E That case has never been criticised or disapproved. With one exception, that is the pattern of present practice. The courts adopt the strict interpretation but, where it would be unfair, it is modified by the discretion of the judge at the trial. Later in 1913, in R. v. Fletcher (197), BANKES, J. said (198):

F “where the judge entertains a doubt as to the admissibility of evidence, he may suggest to the prosecution that they should not press it, but he cannot exclude evidence which he holds to be admissible.”

G But this was not said in relation to s. 1, proviso (f) of the Act of 1898 and, as will be seen, that view has not since prevailed.

The exception is the case of rape. This had for long been treated on a different footing. R. v. Turner (199) decided that evidence of consent by the woman and indecencies by her which accompanied or constituted it, did not let in the previous convictions of the accused. Without embarking on other aspects of the subsection or other crimes HUMPHREYS, J. (giving the judgment of the court) said this (200):

H “For centuries the law has jealously guarded the right of an accused person to put forward at his trial any defence open to him on the indictment without running the risk of his character, if a bad one, being disclosed to the jury. It would be strange indeed if the Act of Parliament which allowed him, in most cases for the first time, to give evidence on oath had virtually deprived him of that right in the case of one serious felony by enacting that he could only do so at the risk of having his character exposed. What is commonly referred to as the defence of consent in rape is in truth nothing more than a denial by the accused that the prosecution had established one of the two essential ingredients of the trial. It is and must be the prosecution which introduces the question of consent or non-consent. Can the legislature have intended to penalise the accused who avails himself of the right to give evidence conferred by statute by enacting that he may be cross-examined as to previous convictions if he denies one, though not if he only denies the other, of the two ingredients of the crime. In our opinion this is one of the cases where the court is justified in holding that some limitation must be put on the words of the section, since to do otherwise would be to do grave injustice never intended by Parliament."

He then goes on to mention a ruling to the like effect by JELF, J., in R. v. Sheean (201) and adds (202): "In so holding we are satisfied that we are following the uniform practice of the last thirty-five years."

The argument in the case had ranged over such cases as R. v. Preston (203) and R. v. Hudson (204), but the court deliberately confined itself to the crime of rape in respect of which there had been a uniform practice for thirty-five years and the court felt that there could only be one answer; and it was refraining from criticising R. v. Hudson (204) or giving guidance as to the more general aspects of the subsection. LORD SIMON's fourth proposition in Stirland's case (205) which gives R. v. Turner (206) as authority, should in my opinion be taken as relating only to rape.

In Maxwell v. Director of Public Prosecutions (207), a case on a somewhat different point, where VISCOUNT SANKEY, L.C. remarked (208):

"In general no question as to whether a prisoner has been convicted or charged or acquitted should be asked or, if asked, allowed by the judge, who has a discretion under proviso (f) unless . . ."

and he goes on to deal with matters which do not help the particular problem. He also pointed out the negative form in which proviso (f) is couched (209): "The Act does not in terms say that in any case a prisoner may be asked or required to answer . . . or impose any such affirmative or absolute burden upon him."

In Stirland's case (210) on a somewhat different point under s. 1 (f) LORD SIMON, L.C. said that the questions (211):

"... should not have been put, and, if put should have been disallowed. It must not be forgotten that the judge presiding at a criminal trial has a discretion (as LORD SANKEY said in Maxwell's case (207)) to disallow questions addressed to the accused in cross-examination if he considers that such questions, having regard to the issues before the jury and to the risk of the jury being misled as to what those issues really are, would be "unfair", and the judge's disallowance cannot be challenged on appeal."

There is a useful summary of the situation as it has been uniformly recognised

A in practice for many years to be found in R. v. Jenkins (212) where SINGLETON, J. (with OLIVER and BIRKETT, JJ.) said (213):

B “There is one further matter which we think it right to mention. The subsection was intended to be a protection to an accused person. A case ought to be tried on its own facts and it has always been recognised that it is better that the jury should know nothing about an accused person’s past history if that is to his discredit. Just as it was recognised by the legislature that this was fair and proper, so it was recognised that if the nature or conduct of the defence was such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution, it was equally fair and proper that counsel for the prosecution should have the right to ask questions tending to show that the accused person has committed or been convicted of an offence other than that which is under investigation. If and when such a situation arises, it is open to counsel to apply to the presiding judge that he may be allowed to take the course indicated, as was done in this case. Such an application will not always be granted, for the judge has a discretion in the matter. He may feel that even though the position is established in law, still the putting of such questions as to the character of the accused person may be fraught with results which immeasurably outweigh the result of questions put by the defence and which make a fair trial of the accused person almost impossible. On the other hand, in the ordinary and normal case he may feel that if the credit of the prosecutor or his witnesses has been attacked, it is only fair that the jury should have before them material on which they can form their judgment whether the accused person is any more worthy to be believed than those he has attacked. It is obviously unfair that the jury should be left in the dark about an accused person’s character if the conduct of his defence has attacked the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution within the meaning of the section. The essential thing is a fair trial and that the legislature sought to ensure by s. 1 (f).”

F In Noor Mohamed v. Regem (214), LORD DU PARCQ (215), giving the judgment of the Board on a somewhat different point referred to the judge’s general power to exclude evidence which would be unfair. This was quoted with approval by LORD SIMON in Harris v. Director of Public Prosecutions (216):

G “There is a second proposition which ought to be added under this head. It is not a rule of law governing the admissibility of evidence, but a rule of judicial practice followed by a judge who is trying a charge of crime when he thinks that the application of the practice is called for. LORD DU PARCQ referred to it in Noor Mohamed v. Regem (215), immediately after the passage above quoted, when he said that ‘in all such cases the judge ought to consider whether the evidence which it is proposed to adduce is sufficiently substantial, having regard to the purpose to which it is professedly directed, to make it desirable in the interest of justice that it should be admitted. If, so far as that purpose is concerned, it can in the circumstances of the case have only trifling weight, the judge will be right to exclude it. To say this is not to confuse weight with admissibility. The distinction is plain, but cases must occur in which it would be unjust to admit evidence of a character gravely prejudicial to the accused even though there may be some tenuous ground for holding it technically admissible. The decision must then be left to the discretion and the sense of fairness of the judge.’ This second proposition flows from the duty of the judge when trying a charge of crime to set the essentials of justice above the technical rule if the strict application of the latter would operate unfairly against the accused. If such a case arose, the judge may intimate to the prosecution that evidence of 'similar facts' affecting the accused, though admissible, should not be pressed because its probable effect would be out of proportion to its true evidential value' (per LORD MOULTON in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Christie (217)). Such an intimation rests entirely within the discretion of the judge."

It is not to be thought that LORD MOULTON or LORD SIMON were intending that this "discretion" of the judge was then to be at the discretion of the prosecutor who might accept or reject it. It is a sensible and valuable discretion left in the hands of the judge to see that a criminal is fairly tried. He can see better than counsel for the prosecution or defence where fairness lies. It is argued that fairness is too loose a concept to afford guidance. I do not agree. It has been a guiding light in criminal trials for many generations. One generation may take a different view of its application from another; but that is an advantage rather than otherwise.

In Kuruma, Son of Kaniu v. Reginam (218), LORD GODDARD, C.J., giving the judgment of the Board on a different matter pointed out that "... in a criminal case the judge always has a discretion to disallow evidence if the strict rules of admissibility would operate unfairly against an accused."

Again in R. v. Clark (219) he said with regard to s. 1, proviso (f):

"It should be remembered that it is always in the discretion of the judge to rule out a cross-examination and to tell counsel for the prosecution that he is not going to allow a cross-examination as to previous convictions."

Many cases from the Court of Criminal Appeal were cited falling on one side of the line or the other. The matter was well summed up in a judgment of the full court under LORD PARKER, C.J. given by DEVLIN, J. in R. v. Cook (220):

"In our opinion the difficulties created by s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) are as a general rule best dealt with in accordance with the principle in R. v. Hudson (221), as applied in R. v. Jenkins (222). The attempt to give the words a limited construction has led to decisions which it is difficult to reconcile; now that it is clearly established that the trial judge has a discretion and that he must exercise it so as to secure that the defence is not unfairly prejudiced, there is nothing to be gained by seeking to strain the words of s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) in favour of the defence. We think, therefore, that the words should be given their natural and ordinary meaning and that the trial judge should in his discretion do what is necessary in the circumstances to protect the prisoner from an application of s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) that would be too severe. It may be that, as indicated in O'Hara v. H.M. Advocate, (223) cases of rape should be regarded as sui generis; certainly the peculiar questions to which they give rise have been settled by R. v. Turner (224) and that case has determined how the discretion should be exercised. No equally clear guidance can be given in cases where the subject-matter is not so specialised. In particular, no firm rule has been, or can be, laid down to govern the sort of circumstances we have to consider here where the defence involves a suggestion of impropriety against a police officer. The cases on this

A subject-matter—in particular R. v. Preston (225), R. v. Jones (226) and R. v. Clark (227)—indicate the factors to be borne in mind and the sort of question that a judge should ask himself. Is a deliberate attack being made on the conduct of the police officer calculated to discredit him wholly as a witness? If there is, a judge might well feel that he must withdraw the protection which he would desire to extend as far as possible to an accused who was endeavouring only to develop a line of defence. If there is a real issue about the conduct of an important witness which the jury will inevitably have to settle in order to arrive at their verdict, then, as SINGLETON, J. put it in R. v. Jenkins (228), and LORD GODDARD, C.J. repeated in R. v. Clark (229), the jury is entitled to know the credit of the man on whose word the witness's character is being impugned."

C Finally in R. v. Flynn (230) the court in a judgment of SLADE, J., allowing an appeal said (231):

"I have already emphasised that s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) of the Act of 1898, refers to both the nature and conduct of the defence. The exercise of a discretion must depend entirely on the facts of the particular case in which it falls to be exercised, but where, as in the present case, the very nature of the defence necessarily involves an imputation, against a prosecution witness or witnesses, the discretion should, in the opinion of this court, be as a general rule exercised in favour of the accused, that is to say, evidence as to his character or criminal record should be excluded. If it were otherwise, it comes to this, that the Act of 1898, the very Act which gave the charter, so to speak, to an accused person to give evidence on oath in the witness box, would be a mere trap because he would be unable to put forward any defence, no matter how true, which involved an imputation on the character of the prosecutor or any of his witnesses, without running the risk if he had the misfortune to have a record, of his previous convictions being brought up in court while being tried on a wholly different matter."

F It is argued that in view of those remarks the learned judge in the present case ought to have exercised his discretion in favour of this particular accused, since R. v. Flynn (230), set up something in the nature of a rule as to the exercise of the discretion; but if and in so far as R. v. Flynn (230) was purporting to do this, I do not accept it. The considerations which R. v. Flynn (230) sets out are valid factors to be weighed in the exercise of discretion. At the end of it all, however, the judge must make up his own mind.

G In the result I cannot accept the appellant's proposition that R. v. Hudson (232) and the many cases which have followed it were wrong in their strict construction of s. 1 (f) of the Act of 1898. Nor can I accept his contention that R. v. Flynn (230) laid down a rule by which, except in rare case, the judge's discretion should be used to produce the more liberal construction.

H On the other hand, I cannot accede to the contention of counsel for the Crown that the judge has no discretion and must always apply the strict rule in R. v. Hudson (232), in its full rigour. There is an overwhelming mass of distinguished authority that the discretion exists. It is not necessary to consider here whether that discretion has been evolved in relation to s. 1, proviso (f) from the case of R. v. Watson (233) onwards, or whether it comes, as in my opinion it does, from the inherent power of the courts to secure a fair trial for the accused, or to use the words of LORD SIMON (234):

“... the duty of a judge when trying a charge of crime to set the essentials of justice above the technical rule if the strict application of the latter would operate unfairly against the accused.”

Moreover, it is good sense. Naturally each side seeks to establish a rule rather than a discretion, provided always that the rule is in his own favour. There is always an attraction in rules since they are so much easier to apply. It would, for instance, be easier for a judge if he did not have a discretion as to costs in civil suits. Moreover, “the demon of formalism” in the words of CARDOZO, J. “tempts the intellect with the lure of scientific order”, especially in cases like s. 1, proviso (f) where decisions in particular cases are so difficult. The courts have been right, however, in thinking that the question is whether this attack on the prosecution ought to let in these convictions on the particular facts of the case, and on such a point rules are no substitute for a discretion in producing a fair trial. I appreciate that in the result an accused cannot be certain exactly how far he can go without letting in his convictions. The many cases in the Court of Criminal Appeal have, however, given some reasonably consistent guidance; and unless there is established a rule that an accused can go to the limits of attack without letting in his convictions, there is no possibility of drawing any clearer line for every case.

On the particular facts of this case, I do not think that the judge exercised his discretion wrongly. The attack on the chief witness for the prosecution was very thorough and serious. There was even added to the attack contained in the alleged admissions of the prosecution witness a suggestion that he was inventing the whole charge because the accused would not give him £1. Granted, therefore, that this was a case where the convictions should be let in, the judge's questions at the end of the appellant's cross-examination did not affect the situation or lead the accused to say anything more than had already been put on his behalf.

I am, however, perturbed by the impression which may have been given to the jury when the appellant got at odds with the judge. I think a more detailed explanation to the jury would have been desirable to indicate in what light they should view his convictions and how this should affect their minds. This is particularly desirable when, as here, it is the judge who is initiating the cross-examination of the accused as to his previous convictions. After some doubt in the matter, however, I do not find sufficient cause of complaint on this point to allow the appeal. The failure to prove the convictions can have had no adverse effect on the accused and the jury may well have taken his answers as tantamount to admissions.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE: My Lords, I have had the benefit of reading in advance the opinion of my noble and learned friend, LORD PEARCE. I agree with this, both as regards the legal principles to be applied in relation to s. 1, proviso (f) (ii) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, and also as to the actual conduct of the trial. I would dismiss the appeal.

B Charity—House to house collection—Company selling articles on door to door basis—Part of proceeds paid to a charity—Whether a “collection”—House to House Collections Act, 1939 (2 & 3 Geo. 6 c. 44), s. 11.

The appellant company was formed in 1964; its object was to sell articles on a door to door basis and to pay about 16·6 per cent. of the proceeds of such sales to the Children's Research Fund, the purposes of which were charitable within s. 11 (1)* of the House to House Collections Act, 1939. No licence under the Act of 1939 was in force in respect of any of the appellants. On May 4, 1967, the appellant H., who had been engaged as an agent by the appellant company, called at the respondent's house. He was carrying a hold-all containing toilet and other articles. He asked the respondent if he would like to buy something in aid of the Children's Research Fund and showed him a pamphlet entitled “The Children's Research Fund”, which bore a picture of a young child and which described the fund as the national charity for research into all children's diseases. By s. 11 (1)* of the House to House Collections Act, 1939, “collection” meant an appeal to the public, made by means of visits from house to house, to give, whether for consideration or not, money or other property; and by s. 11 (2)†, a collection was to be deemed to be made for a particular purpose where the appeal was made in association with a representation that the money or other property appealed for, or part thereof, would be applied for that purpose. On appeals against convictions of the appellant company and its managing director of promoting a collection for a charitable purpose, and of the appellant of acting as collector for such purpose, without licence contrary to s. 1 (2)‡ (3)§ respectively of the Act of 1939,

Held: the appellants had been rightly convicted, because—

(i) the appellant company and its managing director were promoting an activity and the appellant H. was acting as a collector in the course of that activity (see p. 531, letter G, and p. 532, letter B, post), and

(ii) the appellant company's activity came within the definition of “collection” in s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1939, since the definition included an appeal “to give, whether for a consideration or not”, and, if a person was induced to purchase an article on the representation that part of the proceeds would go to a charitable purpose, then the activity was a collection within the definition (see p. 532, letter A, post).

Appeals dismissed.

Essex—(i) the appellant Jack Emanuel and the appellant Carasu, Ltd. promoted a collection for a charitable purpose and on that date a collection for that purpose was made in the locality of Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, pursuant to his and their promotion without there being in force, throughout the period during which the collection was made in that locality, a licence authorising him or them or authorising any other person under whose authority he or they may have acted to promote a collection therein for that purpose, contrary to s. 1 (2) of the House to House Collections Act, 1939; and (ii) the appellant Reginald Cyril Hird acted as a collector in the locality of Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, for the purposes of a collection for a charitable purpose, there not being in force at the time a licence authorising the promotion under whose authority he was acting or authorising him himself to promote a collection in the locality for that purpose, contrary to s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1939. The following facts were found. At all material times, the appellant Emanuel was the managing director and secretary of the appellant Carasu, Ltd., a limited company formed in about 1964, whose object was to sell articles on a door to door basis and to pay about 16·6 per cent. of the proceeds of such sales to the Children's Research Fund, which fund was a charitable purpose within the meaning of s. 1 (2) and s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1939. The articles were sold at about seven times their wholesale price. Up to about March, 1967, the appellant Carasu, Ltd. paid over £5,000 to the fund as its share of such sales. From 1964 onwards, the appellant Carasu, Ltd. engaged between thirty and forty agents to sell articles on their behalf on a part-time basis from door to door, and the appellant Emanuel took an active part in the engaging of such agents, including the engagement of the appellant, Hird, a bricklayer, in respect of the evening of May 4, 1967. The agents were instructed by the appellant Emanuel not to accept donations for the Children's Research Fund but to sell articles. The commission for each agent was about thirty per cent. of the proceeds of sale, and about 16·6 per cent. of the proceeds would later be paid to the fund. Each agent was issued with a card entitled "Agents Authorisation card. Carasu, Ltd., 26, County Chambers, Weston Road, Southend-on-Sea, Essex, supporting the Children's Research Fund". Each agent was also provided with a supply of pamphlets entitled "The Children's Research Fund" each of which bore a picture of a young child, described the fund as being for research into all children's diseases, and listed twelve institutions, including the University of Birmingham and the Welsh National School of Medicine, as being recipients of its financial support. On May 4, 1967, at about 8.10 p.m., the appellant Hird called on behalf of the appellant Carasu, Ltd. at 17, Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, the respondent's house. He held a pedlar's certificate but did not wear a badge nor have with him a collection box or receipt book. No licences were in force pursuant to the Act of 1939 in respect of any of the appellants. The appellant Hird was carrying a holdall containing toilet and other articles, asked the respondent if he would like to buy something in aid of the Children's Research Fund and showed him one of the pamphlets.

It was contended before the justices by the appellants Emanuel and Carasu, Ltd. that the evidence did not establish in law that they were promoting a collection for a charitable purpose and that a collection for that purpose was made in the locality of Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, pursuant to that promotion on May 4, 1967, within the meaning of s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1939. It was contended before the justices by the respondent that the evidence did establish in law that the appellants Emanuel and Carasu, Ltd. were promoting a collection for a charitable purpose and that a collection for that purpose was made in the locality of Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, pursuant to their promotion on May 4, 1967, within the meaning of s. 1 (2) of the Act of 1939. It was contended before the justices by the appellant Hird that the evidence did not establish in law that he was acting as a collector in the locality of Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, for the purposes of a collection for a charitable purpose on May 4, 1967, within the

A meaning of s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1939; and it was contended before the justices by the respondent that the evidence did establish in law that the appellant Hird was acting as a collector in the locality of Dury Falls Close, Hornchurch, for the purposes of a collection for a charitable purpose on May 4, 1967, within the meaning of s. 1 (3) of the Act of 1939.

The justices convicted the appellants and the appellants now appealed.

C LORD PARKER, C.J.: These are three appeals by way of Case Stated from decisions of justices for the North East London Commission area sitting at Romford, who convicted the appellants in each case of offences against the House to House Collections Act, 1939. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:] The House to House Collections Act, 1939, provides by s. 1 (1) that:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, no collection for a charitable purpose shall be made unless the requirements of this Act as to a licence for the promotion thereof are satisfied."

D Section 2 of the Act deals with the licences for which application has to be made to the local police authority, and s. 1 (2) and (3) of the Act create the offences. Sub-section (2) provides that:

E "If a person promotes a collection for a charitable purpose, and a collection for that purpose is made in any locality pursuant to his promotion, then, unless there is in force, throughout the period during which the collection is made in that locality, a licence authorising him, or authorising another under whose authority he acts, to promote a collection therein for that purpose, he shall be guilty of an offence."

The appellant company and the appellant Emanuel were charged under that subsection. Section 1 (3), under which the appellant Hird was charged, provides that:

F "If a person acts as a collector in any locality for the purpose of a collection for a charitable purpose, then, unless there is in force, at all times when he so acts, a licence authorising a promotor under whose authority he acts, or authorising the collector himself, to promote a collection therein for that purpose, he shall be guilty of an offence."

G There is no doubt here that the appellant company and the appellant Emanuel were promoting an activity and that the appellant Hird was acting as a collector in the course of that activity. The sole question here is whether in each of these cases the activity promoted was a collection.

"Collection" is defined in s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1939:

H "... 'Collection' means an appeal to the public, made by means of visits from house to house, to give, whether for consideration or not, money or other property."

Section 11 (2) provides that:

I "For the purposes of this Act, a collection shall be deemed to be made for a particular purpose where the appeal is made in association with a representation that the money or other property appealed for, or part thereof, will be applied for that purpose."

Counsel for the appellants has argued that the appellant company's activities here do not amount to a collection within the meaning of the Act of 1939. He says that to say to somebody, "If you will buy our toothpaste some of the proceeds will find its way to the fund", is not a collection within the meaning of the Act of 1939. More strictly, he should say, so it seems to me, that to say, "Would you like to buy something in aid of the Children's Research Fund?", is not a collection within the meaning of the Act of 1939. In my judgment, it plainly comes within the definition. A collection is not confined to an appeal by way of house to house visits "to give", but extends to such an appeal "to give, whether for a consideration or not"; and, if a person is induced to purchase an article on the representation that part of those proceeds will go to a charitable purpose, then, as it seems to me, the activity is plainly a collection within the meaning of the Act of 1939. I would dismiss each of these appeals. A

KEANEY v. BRITISH RAILWAYS BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Harman, Davies and Winn, L.J.J.), January 25, 26, 29, March 13, 1968.] D

Railway—Look-out—Statutory duty to appoint look-out—Circumstances in which "danger is likely to arise"—Ganger and two men sent to do three-man job—Line on which no train scheduled but on which engine or diverted train might come at any time—Ganger told no train scheduled—Work proving more difficult than anticipated and ganger having to stand near live line—Ganger did not send for look-out—Ganger struck by train diverted on to line—Breach of statutory duty by railway authority—Whether sole responsibility of ganger—Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902 (S.R. & O. 1902 No. 696), r. 9. E

Shortly after midnight on a dark night in May, 1965, a British Railways sub-inspector sent a ganger with two men, from a gang of seventeen men, to renew two bolts in the track at a point joining the down-local and up-local electrified lines. The ganger, who was in charge*, was not familiar with those lines. The main job to which the remaining fourteen men went was not at this point. Because of other maintenance work the current in the down-local line was switched off. The up-local line was live. The sub-inspector told the ganger that no train was scheduled to run on it until 2.35 a.m. However, as all railwaymen should know, an unscheduled train or engine might come along the line at any time; and a signalman could divert a train to the line for convenience. No instructions were given to the signalman not to divert a train to the up-local line. The sub-inspector knew that renewing the bolts might, if a rail proved difficult to lift, involve one man standing in the six foot gap between the up and the down lines while lifting the rail and so being in a position of danger, if a train should come along the up-local line while the other two men would also be working on the job. Thus lifting the rail and renewing the bolts was a three-man job, if, as in fact happened, the rail proved difficult to lift. The ganger did not send to the main gang to collect a fourth man to act as look-out. An electric train was diverted by the signalman to the up-local line; the train struck and killed the ganger, who was standing in the six foot gap endeavouring to lift the rail. Rule 234 (d)† of the Railways 1950 Rule Book provided that "when work is about to be undertaken on or near lines in use for traffic and danger is likely to arise, the ganger . . . must . . . appoint one or more persons, as may be necessary, expressly to maintain a good look-out, and to give warning of any train approaching". The ganger's

- A widow brought an action for damages against British Railways Board based on breach of statutory duty under r. 9* of the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902, which provided that "in all cases where any danger is likely to arise" the companies (now the board) should provide persons for maintaining a good look-out or for giving warning against any train or engine approaching. On appeal against dismissal of the action on the ground that,
- B though the board were in breach of r. 9, the sole responsibility for the breach was the deceased ganger's,

Held: (i) the board were in breach of duty under r. 9 of the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902 (see p. 536, letter G, post), for the following reasons (per DAVIES and WINN, L.J.J.)—

- C (a) because, on the evidence, "danger was likely to arise" for the purposes of r. 9 (which per DAVIES, L.J., at p. 538, letter I, post, imposed an objective test) from an approaching unscheduled train or engine and, as the sub-inspector sent three men to do a job which would require all three to do it, the board being responsible for his acts, were then in breach of statutory duty under r. 9 (see p. 539, letter E, p. 543, letter H, and p. 544, letter B, post).

- D Hutchinson v. London and North Eastern Ry. Co. ([1942] 1 All E.R. 330) considered.

(b) because, when the men were working on the points, then likelihood of danger became more obvious and the failure of the deceased ganger at that time to obtain a look-out from the main gang constituted a second breach of statutory duty by the board under r. 9 (see p. 539, letter F, and p. 544, letter C, post).

- E (ii) (a) (per HARMAN, L.J.) there were two contributory causes of breach of statutory duty and the deceased should not have been held alone responsible (see p. 538, letter D, post).

(b) (per DAVIES and WINN, L.J.J.) the deceased owed a duty to the board under r. 234 (d) to comply with r. 9 of the regulations of 1902, but his blameworthiness in failing to go or send for a look-out (at the later stage, see (i) (b) above) was not the sole cause of the accident; accordingly the blame apportioned to him would be fifty per cent., and his widow would, therefore, be entitled to one half of the total agreed amount of damages (see p. 540, letter A, and p. 544, letters D and G, post).

Appeal allowed.

Appeal.

This action was brought by the widow and administratrix of Thomas John Keaney, who was killed in the night of May 7/8, 1965, while working on the permanent way near Earlsfield in Surrey. He was a ganger and a highly experienced railwayman whose usual place of work was the Nine Elms Yard near Battersea. He had been called on to work for the night in question near Earlsfield. On that night, for the purpose of carrying out some work of ballasting near Earlsfield Station some seventeen men had been assembled who came under the control of a Mr. Tuomey, a sub-inspector. Among the seventeen were three, namely the deceased with whom this case is concerned, who was not very familiar with this particular stretch of line, and two experienced lengthmen, Mr. Burnicle and Mr. Vesey, who had great experience of this particular length. It occurred to the sub-inspector that this was a good opportunity to effect a different and minor repair, namely the renewal of two bolts at the acute angle formed by the point of the cross-over line at the opposite end of the station, the cross-over being from the down-local to the up-local electrified lines, which latter line continued live. The sub-inspector detailed Mr. Burnicle and Mr. Vesey to carry out this job and as an afterthought added the deceased to their number, telling him to go along with them and look after them and then to bring them down to the main job at the other end of the station. This main job could be done, as it was, from the verge east of the down-local line and the men doing it were therefore safe enough, but the cross-over job would or might involve at least one man standing in the six-foot gap between the up-local and the down-local lines and so in a position of danger if a train should come along the up-local line. The sub-inspector was evidently conscious of this for he told the deceased that there should be no more trains on the up-local till 2.35 a.m. He said this before midnight and added that the job should have been completed well before 2.35 a.m. He described this in the witness-box as being a warning. The three men set off, got some tools from a shed very near the job and went to work.

The relevant section of railway track lay on the Clapham Junction or Waterloo side of Earlsfield Station; on the Waterloo side of a platform at that station is a platelayers' hut. On one side of that platform were two tracks, the up-through and the down-through line: on the other side were the up-local and the down-local line. There were points on the down-local and up-local lines, enabling trains to be switched between these lines. These were known as "spring" points. There was a rail which, after bearing to the left, came to an end; this was a "wing" rail and was not fixed to any other rail or to any sleeper along its terminal section; accordingly it was to some extent springy. Close to this "wing" rail and to the right of it were two rails which came together at an acute angle forming what was called an "acute" or a "nose". These two rails were bolted tightly together, but in the course of use the bolts required to be replaced. When bolts were replaced in the "nose" the old bolts had to be removed on the side nearer the "wing" rail and the new bolts had to go in from the same side; to enable this operation to be performed the "wing" rail had to be lifted at the end and sprung away from the "nose" in order that the bolts might be inserted between the two below the top flange, which projected outwards on the "wing" rail, the recess beneath which afforded clearance permitting insertion of the bolts before the "wing" rail sprang back to afford a snug fit. In preparation for work on the down local permanent way, at the position described and on the Wimbledon side of Earlsfield Station, the down-local line was made dead by switching off the current from the conveyor line. The up-local line was left live, but no train was scheduled to run on it

A through Earlsfield between 12.20 and 2.30 a.m. All railwaymen should know that at any time unscheduled movements might take place on any line which was open. Unfortunately, neither the deceased, to whom this particular stretch of line and its traffic conditions were not known, nor the two local men who were with him when he was killed, nor Mr. Tuomey, knew that a train would be switched from the up-through to the up-local line. This was what in fact
B happened: it happened for no reason of emergency, nor because of the development of any abnormal situation, but merely as a matter of convenience and efficiency in the operation of the system of traffic control.

To do their job the three men had taken a jack with them, but they found that they could not make use of it and that the job was much more difficult than anticipated. The only way which they saw of raising the "wing" rail was by a
C cross-lift with two bars at each side of the wing rail. This obliged one of the men operating the lift to stand in the six-foot gap between the up-local and down-local lines and to lever up the wing rail from that side; thus he would bring the end of his bar foul of the up-line. This part was taken by the deceased. The second man was lifting from between the down rails, where the third man was also standing with a lamp waiting to get the old bolts out and the new ones
D in. No look-out had been appointed. While these three men were intent on this job the slow passenger train from Portsmouth to London came along the up-local line taking them by surprise, and the deceased, who was standing in the six-foot gap, was struck and killed. The other two men, standing in the four-foot of the down-local line, escaped. The train had been diverted at Wimbledon by the signalman there from the up-through to the up-local line. This was
E done on the directions of the signalman at Clapham Junction in the exercise of his discretion in order not to delay the passenger train.

The plaintiff widow, Mrs. Mary Agnes Keaney, brought this action for damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1959, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, against British Railways Board (herein called "the board"); she alleged common law negligence on their part and breach of their
F statutory duty under r. 9 of the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902. WALLER, J., on May 4, 1967, held that the board were not guilty of common law negligence; that they were in breach of their statutory duty under r. 9, but that this breach of statutory duty was the fault of the deceased and of no-one else, and he dismissed the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff now appealed against so much of the judgment as held that the board's breach of statutory duty was the fault of the G deceased. Damages were agreed at £8,000 general damages, plus £92 5s. 6d. special damages.

H Mar. 13. The following judgments were read.

HARMAN, L.J., stated the nature of the appeal and, having summarised the facts, referred to the slow passenger train from Portsmouth to London having been diverted onto the up-local line by the signalman, Mr. Orton, in the exercise of his discretion and in order not to delay the passenger train, and continued:]

I The explanation which Mr. Orton, the Clapham Junction signalman, gave was that in the first place there was work going on at a bridge at Clapham Junction and that to send the train on the up-through line would necessitate the delay involved in getting the men working on the bridge to remove themselves and their tools. This was the reason accepted by the judge. It appears, however, from Mr. Orton's evidence that this process was actually being performed at the time when the passenger train was due at Wimbledon for the purpose of sending on the up-through line a freight train bound for Nine Elms which was travelling on that line. Apparently in order to get into Nine Elms it had to pursue this course. The Clapham Junction signalman could have kept the passenger train waiting while the freight train went through, but he thought it better, in order not to make the passenger train late by say ten minutes, to divert it on to the up-local, with the fatal consequences which I have mentioned. Which of these two was the correct explanation may be in some doubt, but in either event the diversion of the passenger train on to the up-local was a routine matter in the discretion of the Clapham Junction signalman and not a step which could be said to be wholly unexpected. No suggestion was made of negligence in this respect, nor that to switch the train without warning was an unsafe system of work sanctioned by the respondents ("the board"). As Mr. Orton said, experienced railwaymen would know that unscheduled trains or engines or a special train might at any time be so diverted. This would be known to the three men, though they seem to have forgotten it owing perhaps to their interest in the job they were doing, and it should also have been present to the mind of Mr. Tuomey when he sent the men off.

The Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902 (1), r. 9, provides:

"With the object of protecting men working singly or in gangs on or near lines of railway in use for traffic for the purpose of relaying or repairing the permanent way of such lines, the railway companies shall, after the coming into operation of these rules, in all cases where any danger is likely to arise provide persons or apparatus for the purpose of maintaining a good look-out or for giving warning against any train or engine approaching such men so working . . ."

This is a duty which is absolute but not unconditional and only becomes absolute where the conditions are satisfied (see the headnote and the speech of LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON in Cade v. British Transport Commission (2)). The questions thus raised are three. First, were these men working "near lines of railway in use for traffic"? Second, were they working "for the purpose of repairing the permanent way"? Third, was this a case "where any danger is likely to arise"? In my judgment the judge rightly held that all three conditions were satisfied. They were or would be near a line of railway in use for traffic, namely the live up-local. Their purpose was to repair the permanent way of the line, and danger was likely to arise. This last point was strongly contested by the board, arguing that as there were to be no scheduled trains during the period danger was not likely, and this seems to have been Mr. Tuomey's view, but the up-local was live and it was admitted either that a diverted train might come along, as indeed it did, or that a single or shunting engine might use the line. Indeed it was proved that all railwaymen know that any live line is liable to be used at any time. These factors, together with the pitch darkness of the night, seem to me to bring danger out of the realm of possibility into that of likelihood. On this footing there was an absolute duty on the board under the rule to provide a look-out, and of this they were in breach.

The next question is, whose function was it as a servant of the board to perform the duty? It is, of course, true that the board can perform a duty of this sort only through an agent, and they seek to discharge it by reference to r. 234 of the 1950 Railways Rule Book, which constitutes a contract between the board and their employees. Sub-paragraph (d) of r. 234 reads as follows:

"When work is about to be undertaken on or near lines in use for traffic and danger is likely to arise, the ganger or man in charge must, except as shown in cl. (i), appoint one or more persons, as may be necessary, expressly to maintain a good look-out, and to give warning of any train approaching."

Who, then, was the "ganger or man in charge" on whom the duty fell? Here again there was a conflict, it being argued for the board that the deceased was the man in charge, he having been put in that position by Mr. Tuomey. The

(2) [1958] 2 All E.R. 615; [1959] A.C. 256.

A judge held that this was right, and I agree with him. It is true that Mr. Tuomey did not actually use the words "You are in charge", but by sending the deceased, who was a ganger, to look after the other two I think that he was put in charge of them.

B It was argued for the widow that Mr. Tuomey was the man in charge because work ordered by him was "about to be undertaken" (see the rule) near lines in use for traffic where danger was likely to arise, but I think that Mr. Tuomey was not to be expected to know the exact method of work which would be found to be necessary, and that he was entitled to delegate the responsibility to the man whom he put in charge on the spot and leave it to his judgment to decide on the necessity for a look-out man when he was in a position to judge having regard to the procedure to be adopted. If the lift of the wing rail could C have been accomplished by the jack or by a lift from within the down line alone it might rightly be thought that danger was not likely to arise.

D On this footing the judge held that the breach of the board's duty was entirely due to the deceased himself and to no one else. The judge relied on the speech of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in Vincent v. Southern Ry. Co. (3), where VISCOUNT CAVE pointed out that this obligation must be performed by someone and that if that someone fails in his duty and is himself the victim of his own failure he cannot recover, although if that failure resulted in injury to other members of the gang for which he was responsible they might recover, but it is not enough for the board to say that they appointed someone to perform the task if he fails himself to do so. In the headnote to that case I find this (4):

E "Per VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., (with the concurrence of LORD ATKINSON and LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE): Semble, the duty of the railway company under the rule in any case of danger is an absolute duty to provide a look-out man and to see that he is instructed to act. The company does not comply with the rule by merely making regulations under which the foreman of a gang is entrusted with the duty of appointing a look-out man; F and, if the foreman fails in that duty, the company may be made liable for injury happening to a member of the gang other than the foreman himself."

VISCOUNT CAVE said (5):

G "I am disposed to agree with the view, which was expressed by ATKIN, L.J., in his judgment on the appeal, that it is a mistaken view of the rule to say that the company have complied with it by merely making regulations under which a foreman is entrusted with the duty of seeing that there is a look-out man, and that the company have not performed their duty unless in pursuance of that delegated task the foreman does in fact provide and appoint a look-out man. The duty of a company in any case of danger is an absolute duty to provide a look-out man and to see that he is instructed to act; and if in any case it were proved that the foreman to whom, under the H company's regulations, this duty was entrusted had failed in his duty and had not appointed a look-out man, the company might well be held liable for injury happening to any member of the gang other than the foreman himself. This does not mean that, in my opinion, the company in charging the foreman or ganger with the duty of deciding whether danger exists and of appointing a member of his gang to act as a look-out is taking an unreasonable course. Being a corporation, they must necessarily entrust that I duty to some agent, and I see no sufficient reason why the foreman or ganger (who will be on the spot) should not be selected for that duty; but nevertheless if he should fail in that duty, the company may be liable for the consequences of the default to any person not concerned in it."

I would agree with the result reached by the judge, namely, that the plaintiff could recover nothing, if I thought that the failure was due to the deceased and to him alone, but in the circumstances of this case I do not think that the board can altogether escape responsibility. A contributory cause was the conduct of their sub-inspector, who first lulled the precautions of the deceased by telling him that he need expect no trains on the line and secondly sent only three men to do what was on all sides agreed to be a three-man job. It should, I think, have been present to the inspector's mind that this was a job which would or might probably require the men who were doing it, or at least one of them, to stand in the dangerous position between the lines and that this would involve the provision of a look-out man. Mr. Tuomey could not be sure that danger would be involved and therefore I think that while it was not for him himself to station a look-out man he should have foreseen that the dangerous situation probably would arise and have sent another man who could act as look-out man if need be and have added perhaps some real word of warning. B C

I am of opinion, therefore, that there were two contributory causes of this breach of regulations and the deceased should not have been held to be alone responsible. Nevertheless I think that far the greater part of the blame must fall on the deceased, who, as Mr. Burnicle said in evidence, joined in "using our own discretion" and was, in effect, by an error of judgment the main cause of the accident. I would attribute the blame as to one-quarter to the board and as to three-quarters to the deceased and would therefore hold that the damages should be divided accordingly, allowing the widow to have £2,000, one-quarter of the sum agreed. D E

DAVIES, L.J.: I have had the advantage of seeing the judgment which WINN, L.J., is about to deliver and I agree with it. But, as we are differing from the judge and as HARMAN, L.J., takes a somewhat different view, it is probably desirable that I should state, albeit shortly, in my own words my reasons for that agreement. F

In the first place it would appear that there would have been a good deal to be said for the proposition that the plaintiff widow had made out a case of common law negligence; but the judge thought little of this, and that claim has not been persisted in in this court. The case, therefore, turns entirely on the interpretation and application of r. 9 of the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902, which has already been read. It is, in my view, clear that the deceased and his two companions, Mr. Burnicle and Mr. Vesey, were working "on or near lines of railway in use for traffic", since on any view of the matter they were working, and the task which they had to perform would necessitate their working, near the up-local line. It is not seriously disputed that they were working "for the purpose of . . . repairing the permanent way of such lines", namely the crossing between the up-local and the down-local. The real questions are: (i) whether and at what stage danger was likely to arise and (ii) if at any stage danger was likely to arise so that the absence of a look-out constituted a breach by the board of their absolute obligation, the deceased was, as the judge has held, entirely responsible for or the sole cause of that breach. G H

It is to be observed that the board do not discharge their duty by making rules such as r. 234 (d). The making of such a rule is merely the machinery by which they seek to carry out their duty (see per VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in Vincent v. Southern Ry. Co. (7) and LORD GREENE, M.R., in Hutchinson v. London and North Eastern Ry. Co. (8). Secondly, the question whether danger is likely to arise is a purely objective one. It does not turn on whether the man I

A on the spot or for that matter the board itself thought or would have thought that in the circumstances danger was likely to arise. It is entirely a question of fact to be decided by the court on the evidence.

In the present case there were two stages at which the question whether danger was likely to arise falls to be considered. The first stage was when Mr. Tuomey, the sub-inspector, instructed the deceased, Mr. Keaney, and his two
B companions to repair the crossing. The second was when the men in the course of doing the work found that it was necessary for the deceased to stand with his long pole in the six-foot near to, indeed close to, and with his back to, the open up-local.

As I understand the judgment of the judge, he has found that at the first stage no danger was likely to arise and that it was only at the second stage that that situation existed. In any event, he held that the sole responsibility in regard to the posting of a look-out was on the deceased himself. The responsibility, of course, is and remains that of the board themselves, and it is only if, given a breach of their absolute duty, they can show that that breach was entirely caused by the deceased himself that they can escape liability in accordance with the principles enunciated by PEARSON, J., in *Giddy v. Belmont Building
D Supplies, Ltd.* (9).

I turn now to consider whether at what I have called the first stage danger was likely to arise. The mechanics of the job assigned to the deceased and the other two men by Mr. Tuomey will be described by WINN, L.J. For the reasons to be indicated by him, I am quite satisfied that even at that stage danger was likely to arise. The work which the men had to do would in all likelihood make
E it necessary for one of them to stand in the six-foot. The up-local was an open line and, although no scheduled train was expected until 2.35 a.m., it was emphasised by the board that all railwaymen know that at any time an unscheduled train or, as here, a diverted train or a light engine may come along unexpectedly. It necessarily follows from this that at the second stage, when the deceased and his two companions were about to embark on or were actually engaged in their
F task in the manner in which they carried it out, danger was likely to arise, and that accordingly the deceased as the ganger or man in charge of the small gang ought under r. 234 (d) to have posted a look-out. The crucial question, however, in this case is whether his failure so to do was the sole cause of the board's breach of duty.

To return to stage one. The board's submission is that even if, which they
G dispute, at that stage danger was likely to arise, under r. 234 (d) the responsibility for appointing a look-out was that of the deceased as the ganger or man in charge and that Mr. Tuomey, the sub-inspector in general charge of the work in this neighbourhood that night, was not concerned with the matter at all. It is, in my view, impossible to accept that contention. As a matter of machinery the rule (10) provides that the ganger or other man in charge normally appoints
H the look-out; but, if in any given case a more senior official, such as Mr. Tuomey in the present case, is present, it is not in my view permissible for him to wash his hands of the matter entirely and to leave all the precautions to his junior. Here Mr. Tuomey, who knew this length of track very much better than did the deceased, sent three men to do what all the witnesses agreed was a three-man job, so that no fourth man was available to act as a look-out. He said
I nothing whatsoever to the deceased about a look-out: and his final words to the deceased to the effect that there would be no scheduled train on the up-local until 2.35 a.m. were, so far from being a "warning", as he himself described them, more in the nature of an assurance that all would be safe until that time and could tend to lull the deceased to sleep in regard to the matter of a look-out.

These actions of Mr. Tuomey, for whom, of course, the board are responsible, were in my opinion a contributory cause of the breach of duty, and in these circumstances, despite the deceased's subsequent action, the board cannot escape some measure of liability. I agree with WINN, L.J., that the proper apportionment of blame is fifty per cent., which was the amount provisionally fixed by the learned judge; and I would allow the appeal accordingly.

(9) [1959] 1 All E.R. 414.

(10) I.e., r. 234 (d) of the 1950 Railways Rule Book; see p. 536, letter I, ante.

WINN, L.J., after reviewing particularly the nature of the job to which the three men were sent and the circumstances (see p. 534, letters G to I, ante), continued: The judge in his judgment set out his understanding of the reason for this diversion of a train from the up-through, but with respect to him I am unable to accept that he properly understood why this was done; and I venture to think that it is largely a result of this misunderstanding that the judge arrived at his conclusion in this case. It is quite right, as the judge said, that repairs were being done to a bridge at Clapham Junction and that before a train could go through that bridge on the up-through line it would have been necessary to take all the men working on it away to a position of safety, which would have involved an expenditure of their time. It is not, however, in my opinion, correct to say, as did the judge, that the train which killed the deceased was switched to avoid this difficulty.

Mr. Orton, who was on duty at the Clapham Junction signal box at the material time, as a class "A" signaller, said the Wimbledon "A" signal box to divert a passenger train, No. 81, which left Portsmouth at 23.00, from the up-through to the up-local: he gave as his reason for deciding on this diversion the reason accepted by the learned judge, in the following two answers:

"(Q.) If you had permitted the train to come through on the up-through what would have had to be done? (A.) The procedure was that the permanent way man would sign for the occupation. He would have to go down to the road level, to the workmen underneath, and ask them to remove their things, and send me word to state that the line was clear. I would open the line and then the train would go through. (Q.) You would have to stop the train, clear the workmen away and let the train through? (A.) That is right."

However, in the second of those answers Mr. Orton went on to say:

"This was actually being done for a freight train which was going up the up-through to my home signal. This was actually being done for a freight train for Nine Elms, when this passenger train was due through Wimbledon."

He went on to explain that owing to the lay-out of the track affording entrance to Nine Elms Yard the freight train could not be diverted since if it once got on to the up-local it could not get back again across the through lines to the yard, and he said:

"This passenger train was waiting at Wimbledon so I requested Wimbledon to divert it up the local to save any delay to the passenger train."

Three things appear to me to emerge plainly from the evidence quoted—first, that the repairs to the bridge at Clapham Junction were not a sudden event of brief duration; second, that the effect of those repairs on convenient user of the up-through must have been readily capable of appreciation by all representatives of the railway concerned with any operations on the lines between Clapham Junction and Wimbledon; and third, that Mr. Orton had had no warning that there was any objection to using the up-local for unscheduled traffic.

In my opinion, once the diversion of the Portsmouth train had been made or ordered, danger was not only likely but virtually certain to arise for the deceased and the men working with him. It was Mr. Tuomey who decided that whilst the down-local was dead for the purposes primarily of the ballasting operations near Wimbledon, he would have the bolts changed in the points to which I have already referred. At about a quarter to midnight, the deceased and two men called Mr. Burnicle and Mr. Vesey, together with some fourteen others, reported to him near the platelayers' hut at Earlsfield; he detailed Mr. Burnicle and

- A Mr. Vesey to change the bolts in the "acute" of these points, and said to the deceased: "Tom, you go along with these two lads and look after them, and when you have finished bring them down on the main job."

I am not myself disposed to dissent from the judge's finding that these somewhat equivocal words sufficed, between men who had known one another for fourteen years, to make it understood that Mr. Tuomey intended the deceased

- B to be in charge of the other two as ganger for a sub-gang. Mr. Tuomey knew, as he said in cross-examination, that the job to be tackled was quite uncommon, might involve difficulties and really needed three men to perform it; he expected that the deceased would, if necessary, lend a hand, though he did not instruct him to take any active part. Before the deceased left him Mr. Tuomey said to him, according to his own evidence, "The last train has gone up and you should not
- C have any train on the up until 2.35". He actually said "up-main" but must have been understood to mean "up-local". Mr. Tuomey described this statement as "just a sort of parting warning to him". In my opinion it was not a warning but a misleading, inaccurate assurance, which was in the circumstances most unfortunate.

- When Mr. Tuomey sent the three men to deal with the points he knew: (a)
- D that the end of the wing rail would have to be lifted; (b) that if a jack were used for this lift it would probably—or as I think certainly—have to be placed in the six-foot between the down-local and the up-local; (c) that if the jack failed to afford the required lift it would be necessary to prise up the rail; (d) that owing to the tightness of the wing rail against the nose a sideways thrust would have to be applied to it by one man; (e) that another man would have to insert
- E a rod under the wing rail from the side nearer the nose and apply an upward force to it but would be unable thus readily to achieve sufficient lift; and (f) that for these reasons one of the men might well have to assist in lifting with a rod placed under the wing rail from the other side, a cross lift.

Men standing within the four-foot of the down-local should be safe from traffic passing on the up-local but any man within the points, where there is

F not even a full six-foot, would be materially closer to such traffic, in proportion to his distance from the nose and according to the stance he might take up to apply force to his rod. It has to be remembered that a train overhangs the six-foot, perhaps by eighteen inches.

Rule 9 of the Prevention of Accidents Rules, 1902 (S.R. & O. 1902 No. 616), provides:

- G "With the object of protecting men working singly or in gangs on or near lines of railway in use for traffic for the purpose of relaying or repairing the permanent way of such lines, the railway companies shall, after the coming into operation of these rules, in all cases where any danger is likely to arise, provide persons or apparatus for the purpose of maintaining a good
- H look-out or for giving warning against any train or engine approaching such men so working, and the persons employed for such purpose shall be expressly instructed to act for such purpose, and shall be provided with all appliances necessary to give effect to such look-out."

In my opinion the up-local was at the time of the accident "in use for traffic". In fact it was then used by the Portsmouth train. However, it is more important to decide whether it was "in use for traffic" at any time when it was possible for the duty imposed by the rule to be performed. I would hesitate long before saying that there could be a breach of this rule where the only use of a line for traffic occurred simultaneously with or so immediately before a danger arose that no opportunity could possibly have existed for performance of the duty imposed. In my opinion, even if the time when the Portsmouth train was diverted was very close to the time of the accident, which is not clear on the evidence, the use made of the up-local for this diversion was, on the evidence of Mr. Orton, not an abnormal use in the circumstances which undoubtedly had prevailed for some time at Clapham Junction. It seems to me right to regard the up-local as having been during the evening and night of May 7/8 "in use" for traffic which it might seem convenient to divert to it from the up-through. Furthermore the board were concerned at the trial to assert and emphasise that there was a "possibility"—falling short, they maintained, of probability—that a train might come along the up-local (cf., two passages of cross examination of Mr. Burnicle and Mr. Vesey). It was stressed that the up-local was "open for traffic"; that "a failure on the track would cause a diversion"; that there "might be a relief train"; "a light engine could have come along at any time, or special trains".

In my judgment the rule applied, on any construction of the phrase "in use for traffic" consistent with its intention and with the realities of working conditions, to the up-local at Earlsfield and to the positions in which men would be working on the points where the deceased was killed which were, I think, "near" to that line; it so applied at all times material for this appeal. It is important to consider what were those times, having in mind what was said in Cade v. British Transport Commission (11) by VISCOUNT KILMUIR, L.C.:

"... the question which must be asked in every case when men are or a man is so working, or rather (for the question must be asked and answered in time) going to work, on or near the railway lines, is: 'will any risk or injury to them or him be likely to arise from approaching trains or engines?'"

In my opinion that question should have been put to himself by Mr. Tuomey before he sent the sub-gang off to the points and should have been answered in the affirmative. The judge thought it was not Mr. Tuomey's responsibility to arrange for a look-out but solely that of the deceased: he based this view on the terms of r. 234 (d) of the board's rule book. For myself I am not much concerned at this stage of my judgment with any such question of responsibility for as I see the real question it is: did the board, through Mr. Tuomey, contravene the regulation at the time when he sent the three men off to do a three-man job without providing any additional man to act as look-out for them? The rule book is only a method of complying with the rules of 1902, not itself a performance of the duty that they impose.

It must be remembered that the claim in this action was not asserted, in any relevant respect, on any ground of negligence. Whether there was a breach of statutory duty at the time when the sub-gang went off depends solely, if what I have said about the line being in use for traffic and the working places or one of them being near it is correct, on whether then "any danger was likely to arise" from any train or engine approaching them whilst working.

The phrase in r. 9 "danger is likely to arise" is capable, as a matter of connotation of language, of at least three meanings. First, that in all the relevant circumstances actually prevailing there is likelihood of danger. Second, that in the totality of such circumstances as are known to agents of the railway company, some to one in the course of his duties, others to others in the course of their duties, there is such a likelihood. Third, that to some individual representative of the railway company having an opportunity to take the precaution required by the rule such a likelihood was or should have been apparent.

It is relevant to the issues in this appeal to distinguish these three suggested constructions, which would impose liability on the railway company with different degrees of strictness, descending in the order in which I have set them out. Unfortunately in the sixty-five years since rule 9 of the rules of 1902 came into force no directly pertinent guidance to the proper construction, of an authoritative kind, has been given.

Two features of r. 9 are noteworthy. First, it imposes the duty to provide the prescribed precaution on the company, not on any individual. In this respect it is more analogous to the Coal Mines Act, 1911, than to its modern

A successor, which imposes duties on the manager, and it is comparable with s. 14 of the Factories Act (12), which related to moving parts which are (scilicet in fact) dangerous. Second, it does not expressly relate to or manifestly contemplate any positive mental recognition, made or which should be made, of such likelihood.

Compare the two quite distinct concepts expressed by the statements:
B A. In the summer of 1939 war with Germany was likely to arise. B. (At that time) the cabinet realised, or should have realised, that war with Germany was likely to arise.

It does not seem open to doubt, and is, I think, common ground in the appeal that if the condition that danger is likely is satisfied, the obligation to post a look-out is absolute and is not merely a duty to take all reasonable care to ensure that this is done. In this respect the s. 14 duty is analogous since wherever the moving parts are, by the Walker v. Bletchley Flettons, Ltd. (13) test, dangerous, secure fencing must be provided: it is not sufficient to provide what is reasonably thought to be secure or to take all reasonable steps to provide secure fencing. The difficulty is to ascertain the meaning and effect of the condition "is likely to arise". Clearly it is not satisfied where there is no more than a possibility of danger or in circumstances where the occurrence of danger would be wholly abnormal or due to some quite extraneous, fortuitous occurrence; beyond that point relative obscurity prevails as to the meaning to be attributed to the words "likely to arise".

The problem arose for consideration by this court, constituted by LORD GREENE, M.R., MCKINNON, L.J., and GODDARD, L.J., in 1942 in a form which
E did very nearly, but unfortunately not quite, involve the specific point which arises in this appeal. This was in Hutchinson v. London and North Eastern Ry. Co. (14). Where LORD GREENE said:

"For instance, it is clear that, if there were a branch line with only two or three trains a day at long intervals, during those intervals no danger would be likely to arise, and, had the words under consideration not been F inserted in the rule, it would have been obligatory on the company to provide a look-out even on such a line during such intervals, which would be absurd."

It would have been extremely interesting to know what LORD GREENE would have said had there been on the branch line, not only "two or three trains a day at long intervals", but, as a matter of probability and likelihood, also from time to time unscheduled trains or engines.

Vincent v. Southern Ry. Co. (15), affords no relevant assistance on this matter of construction.

For myself I would say that in each and all of the possible meanings of the phrase which I have suggested, danger was "likely to arise" when Mr. Tuomey despatched the sub-gang because, first, the circumstances as a whole which in
H fact existed made this likely; second, anyone who knew of the diversion, and the practice of making such diversions and of the job to be done on the points would have realised it was likely; third, without that knowledge, but knowing the other relevant facts which I have mentioned, Mr. Tuomey should have realised that it was likely.

I I am content in the instant case to rest my judgment on an application of the third and last of the possible meanings, since I feel some doubt whether reliance on either of the others would be entirely consistent with some observations made by LORD KILMUR, obiter I think, in Cale's case (16) where he said:

(12) See the Factories Act, 1961, s. 14; 41 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 256.

(16) [1958] 2 All E.R. 615 at p. 618; [1959] A.C. at p. 266.

"... the vital words 'any danger is likely to arise' ... import, inevitably, an estimate of likelihood; not of what might possibly be foreseen, but of what should be expected to occur ... in the light of all relevant circumstances known at the material time ..."

It is therefore in this sense that I prefer, for the purposes only of the present case, to interpret the question: was danger likely to arise at the time when Mr. Tuomey sent off the deceased and the other two men to rebolt the points? This is a question not of what did seem likely to Mr. Tuomey, but is to be answered by the court. I would give an affirmative answer.

If this be right, the board then were in breach of r. 9 of the rules of 1902. Subsequently when the men were working on the points there was a further and perhaps more obvious opportunity for the deceased and the board acting through him to appreciate that danger was likely and to post a look-out, albeit at the expenditure of time and effort in going to collect one from the main gang. There was then, in my opinion, a second breach of the rule.

Rule 9 of the rules of 1902 did not impose any duty on the deceased, as the learned judge seems erroneously to have supposed, but under r. 234 (d) of the 1950 Railways Rule Book he owed a duty to the board, as ganger in charge, to comply with r. 9 of the rules of 1902; he also owed a duty to himself to take care of his own safety. It is not to be doubted, now, that contributory negligence affords a defence, wholly or partially, to a claim based on a breach of statutory duty (cf., per LORD WRIGHT in Caswell v. Powell Duffryn Associated Collieries, Ltd. (17)), but, as LORD WRIGHT said (17):

"What is all-important is to adapt the standard of what is negligence to the facts, and to give due regard to the actual conditions under which men work ..."

In those "conditions" he included "his pre-occupation in what he is actually doing at the cost perhaps of some inattention to his own safety".

The deceased was necessarily bending down at his task of lifting the guide rail with his back to the up-local: it was an electric train which hit him and this came along quietly, unnoticed by either of the other two men, in the dark. He was not familiar with local traffic conditions and may well, in my opinion, have been lulled into unjustified ease of mind by Mr. Tuomey's parting words. I have in mind the instructive passage in LORD PEARCE's speech in The Miraflores and The Abadesa, (18), stressing that any investigation of degrees of negligence must have regard to blameworthiness as well as causative potency.

Since it is my view that the deceased was not seriously blameworthy in failing to go for or send for a look-out or in concentrating on his task, I do not think that his contributory negligence should deprive his widow of more than fifty per cent. of the damages, agreed at £8,000, to which the board's two breaches of statutory duty gave rise.

Appeal allowed accordingly. Apportionment of blame equally between deceased and the board, and, judgment entered for plaintiff for £4,000, being half agreed figure of damages, plus £46 2s. 9d. funeral expenses. Leave to appeal to House of Lords refused.

A PETT v. GREYHOUND RACING ASSOCIATION, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Lord Denning, M.R., Davies and Russell, L.J.J.), April 4, 5, 1968.]

Tribunal—Procedure—Legal representation—Inquiry into matter affecting licence-holder's reputation and livelihood—National club rules silent as to procedure—Stewards of dog racing track inquiring into doping of dog and requiring trainer's presence at inquiry—Whether trainer entitled to oral hearing—Whether entitled to be represented by counsel and solicitor.

Track stewards of a greyhound racing stadium owned by the defendants proposed to hold an inquiry into the withdrawal of a trainer's dog from a race at a stadium licensed by the National Greyhound Racing Club. The inquiry involved the question whether drugs had been administered to the dog. The trainer held a licence from the National Greyhound Racing Club entitling him to race dogs on tracks licensed by the club, and thus the result of the inquiry might involve the trainer's reputation and livelihood. The rules of the club, to which the trainer had agreed when he obtained his licence, did not prescribe the procedure to be followed by track stewards at their inquiries, and did not exclude legal representation. The procedure in fact followed at such an inquiry allowed the trainer to be present, to hear the evidence and to have an opportunity to question witnesses. The trainer sought to be represented by counsel and solicitor at the inquiry, but the track stewards decided ultimately not to allow legal representation. On appeal from the grant of an interlocutory injunction restraining the inquiry from being held unless the trainer were allowed to be represented,

Held: prima facie the trainer was entitled to an oral hearing and, the inquiry being one of serious importance to him, to be represented at it by counsel and solicitor, for he was entitled not only to appear himself but also to appoint an agent on his behalf, and so was entitled to appoint lawyers to represent him (see p. 549, letter D, and p. 551, letter G, post).

R. v. St. Mary Abbots, Kensington Assessment Committee ([1891] 1 Q.B. 378) applied.

Dictum of MAUGHAM, J., in Maclean v. Workers Union ([1929] All E.R. Rep. at p. 471) not followed.

Dictum of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. in Local Government Board v. Arlidge ([1914-15] All E.R. Rep. at p. 8) distinguished.

Per LORD DENNING, M.R.: where a tribunal is dealing with matters affecting a man's reputation and livelihood or other matters of importance, natural justice requires that he shall be allowed to be defended by counsel and solicitor (see p. 549, letter I, post; cf. per DAVIES, L.J., at p. 551, letter B, post).

Appeal dismissed.

Interlocutory Appeal.

By writ issued on Nov. 3, 1967 the plaintiff, David Pett, sued the defendants, Greyhound Racing Association, Ltd., for a declaration that they were acting ultra vires in refusing to allow the plaintiff to appear and be heard by counsel at an inquiry which they proposed to hold into the alleged drugging on Sept. 9, 1967, of a greyhound, "Dogstown Star", owned and trained by the plaintiff and entered for a race at White City Stadium on that date; for an injunction to restrain the defendants and their servants or agents from holding an inquiry into the alleged drugging unless the plaintiff were allowed to appear and to be represented by counsel at any such inquiry, and for further relief not material to this report. The facts are stated in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R., at p. 547, letter D, post, et seq. By summons dated Nov. 3, 1967, the plaintiff applied for an interlocutory injunction restraining the holding of the proposed inquiry unless the plaintiff were allowed to appear and to be represented by counsel at any such inquiry.

By para. 1 of the conditions contained in a certificate of licence granted by the National Greyhound Racing Club it was provided that the applicant to be licensed agreed to be subject to the rules of racing of the club for the time being. The plaintiff was a private greyhound trainer licensed by the club, and the club had licensed the racecourse which was owned and operated by the defendants at White City Stadium.

The National Greyhound Racing Club was a members' club, the number of members being limited by the rules to fifty. It was controlled by its stewards, who were in effect the management committee of the club. The purpose of the club, as summarised by the secretary in his affidavit, was to frame and administer a code of rules for greyhound racing, to license racecourses, trainers, kennelmen and officials, and other purposes. The duties of the stewards of the club were to foster, protect and preserve the good name and reputation of the sport. The club was not concerned with the conduct of individual race meetings, which were in the hands of local stewards, but were concerned to see that the rules relating to the conduct of meetings were observed. A trainer's licence was valid for one year after which the trainer applied for renewal. Local stewards were appointed to conduct each meeting at a licensed track; they conducted the meetings under the rules of racing of the club. Local stewards had power to hold official inquiries, and the result of their findings were automatically referred to the club stewards, who acted as an appellate body from the local stewards' decisions. The proposed inquiry with which the present proceedings were concerned was an inquiry by local stewards, viz., the track stewards of White City Stadium.

By order dated Feb. 22, 1968 CUSACK, J., ordered that the defendants, Greyhound Racing Association, Ltd., by themselves their agents their servants or otherwise be restrained from holding an inquiry into the alleged drugging unless the plaintiff were allowed to appear and to be represented by counsel at any such inquiry until after the trial of the action or until further order. By notice dated Mar. 5, 1968, the defendants gave notice of appeal. In this they specified, among other grounds of appeal, the ground that the judge was wrong to interfere with the absolute discretion of the defendants in the determination of inquiries of the type that was the subject of the action.

- A E. W. Eveleigh, Q.C., and R. Johnson for the defendants, who were appealing.
G. Cohen for the plaintiff.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: The plaintiff, Mr. Pett is a trainer of greyhounds. He holds a licence from the National Greyhound Racing Club. He pays £25 a year for that licence. It entitles him to train greyhounds for races on all tracks which are licensed by the club. The club is rather similar to the Jockey Club which we have had several times in this court (1). The stewards of the club license racecourse tracks, track stewards, trainers, and so forth. The club may not have a complete monopoly, but they certainly have an important control over a large part of the greyhound racing industry. The livelihood of a trainer such as the plaintiff may depend a good deal on his having and retaining his licence. The White City Stadium is owned by the defendants, the Greyhound Racing Association, Ltd. They employ track stewards. The racecourse is licensed by the club. So are the track stewards.

- B In September, 1967 the plaintiff had a dog called Dogstown Star. He entered it for the seven hundred yards open race at the White City Stadium on Saturday, Sept. 9, 1967. The race was due to start at 7.45 that night. He sent the dog with his kennelhand, Mr. Hewlett, to the stadium for the race. In accordance with the usual practice, the dog was tested to see whether it had been drugged or not. At about half past five the kennelhand took a sample of urine from Dogstown Star and handed it to the security officer. He sent it off for examination. At 7.30 a report was received that the test showed positive for barbiturates. In consequence the track stewards decided to withdraw the dog from the race. Afterwards a second sample of urine was taken from the dog. The kennelhand was present. He asked for a part of this second sample, but his request was refused.

- C On Monday, Sept. 11, parts of the two samples were sent to Glasgow university for examination. On Wednesday, Sept. 13, a report was received that the samples showed positive for barbiturates and that the barbiturate appeared to be phenobarbitone. On Sept. 14 the racing manager of the stadium telephoned to the plaintiff saying that there was to be an inquiry with respect to the drugging of the dog and it was to be held on the following Tuesday. This was followed up by a letter of Sept. 16 which said:

- D "The official inquiry concerning the withdrawal of Dogstown Star from the fourth race on Saturday, Sept. 9 will be held at White City Stadium, London, at 11 a.m. on Tuesday, Sept. 19, your presence together with your kennelhand who was present at the meeting on Sept. 9 will be required."

G He added that the analysis by Glasgow university of the sample had proved positive.

- H The plaintiff got that letter on the morning of Monday, Sept. 18. The inquiry was to be held the next day. He immediately went to see his solicitor. His solicitor on that very day wrote to the secretary of the White City Stadium saying:

"This notice is much too short for [the plaintiff] to give instructions for him to be represented, and we shall be glad, therefore, if you will give us an alternative appointment in say fourteen days' time."

- I It is plain from that letter that the plaintiff desired to be represented by his lawyers at the inquiry, and that is why they requested an adjournment. The general manager replied saying:

"We are agreeable to postpone the date of the inquiry to Tuesday, Oct. 3. Please advise [the plaintiff] that he is required to attend the inquiry at White City Stadium at 11 a.m. Oct. 3, 1967, together with his kennelman, Mr. Hewlett."

(1) See e.g., Nagle v. Feilden, [1966] 1 All E.R. 689.

On that day the plaintiff and his kennelman went to the stadium. He went together with his solicitor and counsel. The general manager and the stewards were taken aback by the presence of counsel and solicitor. They were quite nonplussed. They did not know what to do. They did not want counsel or solicitors at the inquiry. They suggested that they might stay outside and pass messages in and out; but that was obviously impracticable. Eventually they decided to take time to consider the point. They adjourned the inquiry to Oct. 10, and then it was adjourned to Oct. 31. On the day before the hearing, the general manager telephoned to the plaintiff's solicitor saying that he would not be allowed to be legally represented at the inquiry. Thereupon on Nov. 3 the plaintiff's solicitor issued a writ asking for a declaration that he was entitled to be represented by counsel at the inquiry and an injunction to restrain them holding the inquiry unless he was allowed to be represented. They moved the court for an injunction. CUSACK, J. granted an interlocutory injunction. Now there is an appeal to this court. A B C

The disciplinary powers of the club are contained in a book of Rules of Racing which they issue. The plaintiff, when he got his licence, agreed to the rules. They are not very precise, but the relevant rules seem to be r. 48 and r. 49. They give these powers to "The Stewards", meaning the track stewards employed by the owners of the racecourse. These rules provide: D

"48. The stewards shall regulate, control, take cognisance of, and adjudicate upon, the conduct of all officials, and of all owners, trainers, kennelhands, and persons attendant on the greyhounds.

"49. The stewards shall have power to punish at their discretion any person, subject to their control, with a fine not exceeding £20, and with suspension, and shall report all such facts and remit the amount of the fine to the stewards of the National Greyhound Racing Club, who may at their discretion hold a further inquiry into the matter and make such order as they think fit. A right of appeal against the stewards of the meeting will lie if leave to appeal is given by the stewards of the National Greyhound Racing Club." E F

The appellant is to deposit £10 on the appeal and the stewards may "after hearing the appeal" make such order as to the deposit as they think fit.

Those rules contain nothing about the procedure on an inquiry. I think it clear law, however, that, before disciplinary action could be taken against a trainer, notice would have to be given to him of the charge against him: and he would have to be given a fair opportunity of meeting the charge and of contradicting or correcting any statement prejudicial to his interests. G

We have been told of the procedure which is adopted by the stewards. It seems to me in general to meet the requirements of the law. The general manager states in para. 8 of his affidavit: H

"As a steward of the defendants' stadium, I have been present at numerous stewards' inquiries and am conversant with the procedure involved. The trainer, whose greyhound is the subject of the inquiry, is informed of the date, time and place of the inquiry and is told that he and his kennel-hand may attend to give evidence. If the inquiry is as a result of a positive urine test, the stewards receive written statements from the security officer, the chromatography analyst, the veterinary surgeon and the racing manager, and they consider the analyst's report from Glasgow. The trainer is present to hear all the evidence given by witnesses and is given the opportunity to question the witnesses. There is now produced to me a bundle containing copies of statements that were made for the purposes of the inquiry in relation to the plaintiff's greyhound, Dogstown Star. The stewards then receive evidence from the trainer, and usually ask the trainer a number of questions. They may also ask the security officer or the veterinary surgeon questions. I

- A On this information the stewards then prepare an opinion, which is submitted to the club with the stewards' recommendations."

That appears to provide a fair hearing, provided that the trainer sees all the written statements and is able to comment on them.

- B Now the point arises: has the trainer a right to be legally represented? The club object to any legal representation. Their secretary states in his affidavit:

"If legal representation were allowed as of right, the delay and complications that this would cause would largely frustrate the stewards' intention to conduct their meetings expeditiously and with complete fairness."

- C Counsel for the defendants, says that the procedure is in the hands of the stewards. If they choose to say: "We will not hear lawyers", that is for them, he says, and it is not for the courts to interfere.

I cannot accept this contention. The plaintiff is here facing a serious charge. He is charged either with giving the dog drugs or with not exercising proper control over the dog so that someone else drugged it. If he is found guilty, he may be suspended or his licence may not be renewed. The charge concerns his reputation and his livelihood. On such an inquiry, I think that he is entitled not only to appear by himself but also to appoint an agent to act for him. Even a prisoner can have his friend. The general principle was stated by STIRLING, J. in Jackson & Co. v. Napper, Re Schmidt's Trade Marks (2):

- E "... that, subject to certain well-known exceptions, every person who is sui juris has a right to appoint an agent for any purpose whatever, and that he can do so when he is exercising a statutory right no less than when he is exercising any other right."

This was applied to a hearing before an assessment committee in the case of R. v. St. Mary Abbots, Kensington Assessment Committee (3). It was held that a ratepayer had a right to have a surveyor to appear for him. Once it is seen that a man has a right to appear by an agent, then I see no reason why that agent should not be a lawyer. It is not every man who has the ability to defend himself on his own. He cannot bring out the points in his own favour or the weaknesses in the other side. He may be tongue-tied or nervous, confused or wanting in intelligence. He cannot examine or cross-examine witnesses. We see it every day. A magistrate says to a man: "You can ask any questions you like"; whereupon the man immediately starts to make a speech. If justice is to be done, he ought to have the help of someone to speak for him; and who better than a lawyer who has been trained for the task? I should have thought, therefore, that when a man's reputation or livelihood is at stake, he not only has a right to speak by his own mouth. He has also a right to speak by counsel or solicitor.

- H I am aware that MAUGHAM, J. once expressed a different view. In Maclean v. Workers Union (4) speaking of domestic tribunals, he said:

"Before such a tribunal counsel have no right of audience and there are no effective means of testing by cross-examination the truth of the statements which may be made."

- I All I would say is that much water has passed under the bridges since 1929. The dictum may be correct when confined to tribunals dealing with minor matters where the rules may properly exclude legal representation. (Re Macqucen and Nottingham Caledonian Society (5), seems to have been such a case.) The dictum does not apply, however, to tribunals dealing with matters which affect a man's reputation or livelihood or any matters of serious import. Natural justice then requires that he can be defended, if he wishes, by counsel or solicitor.

Counsel for the defendants also submitted that the stewards were not bound to hold an oral hearing. He cited the speech of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. in Local Government Board v. Arlidge (6), where he said:

“I do not think that the board was bound to hear the respondent orally, provided it gave him the opportunities which he actually had.”

That again may be true in some matters; but I should have thought that it depended on the nature of the inquiry. In a case such as this, fairness may require an oral hearing; and with an oral hearing, then legal representation.

This being an interlocutory application, it is only necessary for us to see if there is a prima facie case for counsel and solicitor. I think that there is. In addition, the balance of convenience is very much in favour of maintaining the injunction which the judge granted. It would be most unfortunate if the inquiry should be held without the plaintiff being legally represented; and then later on at the trial it was found that the proceedings had been quite irregular and were upset.

On the whole I would be in favour of upholding the judge's decision and I would dismiss the appeal.

DAVIES, L.J.: I agree. It is very curious that there is no express provision in the rules of the National Greyhound Racing Club for the holding of an inquiry by the track stewards. Rule 48 and r. 49 provide:

“49. The stewards [the track stewards] shall have power to punish at their discretion any person, subject to their control, with a fine not exceeding £20, and with suspension, and shall report all such facts and remit the amount of the fine to the stewards of the National Greyhound Racing Club, who may at their discretion themselves hold a further inquiry into the matter and make such order as they think fit.”

The only reference by implication to an inquiry by the stewards comes from the words “a further inquiry” by the club stewards. I will return to r. 49 in a moment. Rule 54 provides:

“For the infringement of any of these rules or for any undesirable conduct, the stewards may fine or suspend any official, owner, trainer or kennelhand and shall report forthwith to the Secretary of the National Greyhound Racing Club and the Stewards of the National Greyhound Racing Club may make such order as they think fit.”

There is nothing about a £20 limit to the fine mentioned in r. 54. Then, returning to r. 49, the second part of the rule states:

“A right of appeal against the decision of the stewards of the meeting will lie if leave to appeal is given by the stewards of the National Greyhound Racing Club.”

Then it proceeds to say that the appeal must be in writing and must be accompanied by a cash deposit. Then it states that the stewards of the club

“may, after hearing the appeal, make such order as to the deposit as they think fit, and shall decide by whom the expenses of the appeal shall be defrayed.”

Curiously enough, there appears to be no express rule as to what the stewards may do on the hearing of the appeal, apart from the deposit and the costs.

It is I think implicit (as indeed is conceded by counsel for the defendants) in those passages of the rules to which I have referred that there must be an

- A inquiry and a hearing before those powers are exercised. What is said, however, is that although there is an implied right of audience, there is no right to representation. It is to be observed that, just as the rules do not provide for any inquiry by the stewards, so they do not lay down any rules of procedure or say anything about whether the person concerned can be represented or not. The evidence filed on behalf of the defendants shows, however, that it is in fact
- B the practice to conduct the inquiry by an oral hearing. I agree, for the reasons that LORD DENNING, M.R. has stated, that in the circumstances of an inquiry such as this, which may mean a great deal to a person who is licensed by the club as to his future and livelihood, unless express words are there denying him the right of representation, he should be entitled to have it. At any rate, there is a prima facie arguable case that he should be entitled to have it.
- C We were told at the hearing of the appeal that CUSACK, J.'s reason for granting the injunction was that the dismissal of the application would have the effect of determining the main issue to be heard at the trial of the action, and that he considered that the plaintiff had an arguable case to support the granting of a permanent injunction in the terms sought. I agree with that view in the circumstances of this case. The overwhelming balance of convenience is in favour
- D of continuing this injunction.

I, therefore, agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

- RUSSELL, L.J.: As at present advised, I think that a sufficient prima facie case is made out to support this interlocutory injunction; and the balance of convenience is certainly in favour of the injunction, for no sort of case is made out yet that legal representation on an occasion such as this will make the
- E system unworkable. The affidavit evidence shows that the standing procedure in a case such as this is to hold the official inquiry by the local stewards, involving a hearing at which the defendant may attend, question witnesses and address the stewards. Indeed, I should have thought that it would be contrary to natural justice for any other course to be taken in a case such as this, even if
- F r. 49 may not cover the situation. I say "in a case such as this". It involves, be it noted, a decision by the stewards as to the culpability of the plaintiff, the fault being either that of being party to the drugging of a dog or of taking insufficient security measures. There is, as it seems to me, nothing in the contract to overcome or deny what appears to be the common law right of the plaintiff to do by agent or representative, including counsel, that which under the procedure he is entitled to do, namely, question witnesses and address the stewards;
- G and I refer to the authorities referred to by LORD DENNING, M.R. How the case may ultimately turn out, I know not, but as an interlocutory matter, I too would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Company—Directors—Life directors—Power to remove other directors—Joint power conferred on two permanent life directors—Construction of articles of association—Power not conferred by way of joint confidence but for securing the interests of the life directors—Whether power exercisable by survivor.

The appellant B. and his wife were the first directors of a private company and were appointed permanent life directors by the articles of association. Article 16 (H)* of the articles provided that the permanent life directors "shall have power to terminate forthwith the directorship of any of the ordinary directors by notice in writing". B.'s wife died having the question arose whether this power was exercisable by B., who survived her.

Held: (i) the power conferred by art. 16 (H) on the permanent life directors was not vested in them as recipients of a joint confidence but for the securing of their joint interests, and the principle that a bare power could not be exercised by the survivor of joint holders did not apply (see p. 554, letter I, p. 555, letter I, to p. 556, letter A, p. 556, letter F, and p. 557, letter G, post).

(ii) moreover the principle that a power annexed to an office passed to successive holders of the office was not conclusive that this power, which was conferred on the two life directors was exercisable by the survivor, on whose death the office would cease (see p. 555, letters C, E and I, p. 556, letter C, and p. 557, letter H, post).

(iii) on the true construction of the articles of association the power conferred by art. 16 (H) remained exercisable by B. after the death of his wife (see p. 555, letters D and G, and p. 558, letters F and I, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellants Bersel Manufacturing Co., Ltd. and Ben Hubert Berry from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD DENNING, M.R., and DIPLOCK, L.J.; DANCKWERTS, L.J., dissenting) dated Oct. 4, 1967, allowing the appeal by the respondent Irene Eleanor Berry from an order of STAMP, J., dated June 15, 1967. STAMP, J., had made a declaration on a preliminary point of law in an action brought by the appellants by writ issued on Dec. 15, 1965, and had declared that the power conferred by art. 16 (H) of the articles of association of the appellant company became exercisable, on the death of Margaret Ann Berry, the wife of the second appellant, on Dec. 6, 1962, by the second appellant alone. The facts will be found stated in the opinion of LORD WILBERFORCE at p. 556, letters G to I, post.

* Article 16 (H) is set out at p. 554, letter B, post.

A Allan Heyman for the appellants.
M. W. Jacomb for the respondent.

Their lordships took time for consideration.

May 8. The following opinions were delivered.

B LORD REID: My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD WILBERFORCE, that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST: My Lords, I agree with your lordships that this appeal should be allowed.

C LORD HODSON: My Lords, the question of law raised by the respondent in the action is whether or not the power conferred by art. 16 (H) of the articles of association of the Bersel Manufacturing Co., Ltd. is only exercisable during the joint lives of the appellant Ben Hubert Berry (to whom I shall refer as "Mr. Berry") and his late wife Margaret Ann Berry (to whom I shall refer as "Mrs. Berry") and ceased to be exercisable on her death. Article 16 (H) provides: "The permanent life directors shall have power to terminate forth-

D with the directorship of any of the directors by notice in writing."

In order to understand the position it is necessary to make some reference to the admitted facts.

E The company was incorporated by Mr. Berry, one of the two signatories of the memorandum and articles of association of the company, which was at all material times managed by him and carries on a successful business with net assets in excess of £30,000. The company is a private company with a share capital of £10,000 divided into ten thousand shares of £1 each, all issued. Mr. Berry holds 4,050 shares; three employees who support him hold between them 450 shares. Mrs. Berry, one of the first directors named in the articles, died on Dec. 6, 1962. She held 3,500 shares and it is her death which gives rise to the question to be determined, since her shares were left under her will to three individuals. These are supporters of the respondent, Irene Eleanor Berry, the widow of a deceased son of Mr. Berry, who holds two thousand shares. Thus Irene Eleanor Berry, the daughter-in-law, with her supporters holds the majority of the shares.

F The articles provide inter alia as follows:

G "11. The first directors shall be Mr. Ben Hubert Berry and Mrs. Margaret Berry, both of 137, Powys Lane, Palmers Green, and each of them shall be entitled, subject to cl. 16, to retain office so long as he holds shares in the company of the nominal value of £1, and whilst holding office by virtue of this provision shall be called a permanent life director. Articles 73, 74 and 80 of Table A shall not apply to a permanent life director.

H "12. The directors, including the permanent life directors, shall not be less than two nor more than five. Article 77 of Table A shall not apply. The permanent life directors shall have power to appoint additional directors if they shall so desire and shall have power to decide whether they shall be permanent or ordinary directors so that the total number of directors shall not exceed five . . .

I "16. The office of a director shall be vacated:—

(A) If he ceases to be a director by virtue of s. 141 of the Companies Act, 1929.

(B) If he becomes prohibited from being a director by reason of any order made under s. 217 or s. 275 of the Companies Act, 1929.

(C) If he becomes bankrupt or insolvent or compound with his creditors.

(D) If he become of unsound mind or be found a lunatic.

(E) If he be convicted of an indictable offence and the other directors resolve that in their opinion such offence involved fraud or dishonesty on his part.

"(F) If he absent himself from the meetings of the directors for a period of six months, except through illness, without special leave of absence from the other directors.

"(G) If he gives the directors one month's notice in writing that he resigns his office.

"(H) The permanent life directors shall have power to terminate forthwith the directorship of any of the ordinary directors by notice in writing."

The situation created by the effect of art. 16 (H) with its power to dismiss directors coupled with the power of the shareholders to elect directors has always been, so long as the power to dismiss subsists, what has been described as a revolving door situation. Thus the daughter-in-law, appointed by a general meeting to be a director, can be immediately dismissed under the power contained in art. 16 (H). Mr. Berry purports to have exercised this power as the survivor of himself and his wife and it is his right so to do which is challenged.

The question may be stated this: has the power been given to these two persons as individuals in order that they may act together, and not otherwise, or in circumstances in which it is proper to read the power as passing to the survivor after the death of one of the two persons?

Much of the argument has been directed to the rule found in FARWELL ON POWERS (3rd Edn.), p. 514 to be applicable (apart from the provisions of the Conveyancing and Trustees Acts) to the survivorship of powers. This is stated to be "A bare power, given to two or more by name, cannot be executed by the survivor". The learned author added:

"This is not because there is anything in the power incompatible with its surviving, but if a man says he will trust two, the law will not say he shall trust one; it is a joint confidence."

On p. 516 one finds the next rule (stated to be the better opinion) that:

"When a power is annexed to an office (e.g., if it be given to executors) all persons who fill the office can exercise the power; but if the power be given to persons named officially (e.g., to my executors named officially) (e.g., to my executors A and B) it is in each case a question of intention whether the power is given to the person or annexed to the office—sed qu."

The learned author in another passage on p. 517 uses the words "It is incumbent on the court to ascertain . . . whether the power is given to the executor or the person".

The authorities considered as the basis of these rules are concerned with executors and trustees and there is no case concerning directors, although a director may properly be regarded as being to a large extent in the position of a trustee for the shareholders of a company. The difficulty of the question which falls to be decided is illustrated by the acute division of judicial opinion so far expressed.

It may be that the answer is not readily to be found simply by an attempt to apply the above rules. The first rule which was treated as applicable by the majority of the Court of Appeal does not seem to me to solve the problem in favour of the respondent for this reason. Mr. and Mrs. Berry were not, in my opinion, in the position of persons identified by name as being the recipients of a joint confidence. They were rather persons who were securing their own interests in the company by reserving to themselves a power which could be used to protect themselves against a majority vote of the shareholders of the company. This would apply to Mr. Berry as events have shown and would, if Mrs. Berry survived him, have been of value to her if she had found herself likewise in a minority position. The power is coupled with an interest and distinguishable from a bare power: cf., Re Bacon, Toovey v. Turner (1). There are accordingly

A A practical reasons for the continued existence of the power on the event of either Mr. or Mrs. Berry surviving the other.

B The second rule dealing with office holders is also difficult of strict application. Mr. and Mrs. Berry were given special offices as permanent life directors to hold office as permanent life directors subject to art. 16 whilst they (he or she) held shares of the nominal value of £1. This gave them a special position which no one else can hold, for none else can be appointed a permanent life director. This, no doubt, is an argument which can be and was prayed in aid by the respondent, for the conception of an office is normally one that can be filled by a succession of persons. This office dies at latest with the death of the survivor of the two occupants of the power and does not, therefore, fit the conception of an office as mentioned in the second rule which I have cited from FARWELL ON POWERS. Moreover, as DIPLOCK, L.J., said, the special powers given to the two persons are not directors' powers in the ordinary sense. They are not exercised in directors' meetings but as special powers simply to appoint and dismiss other directors. Even so, the power is vested in the holder of an office who loses his office not only on death but also, amongst other circumstances, if he becomes bankrupt; and there does not seem to be any reason why the power should not survive to the other when it is lost by one of two joint holders.

D However evenly balanced the arguments may be, my conclusion on the whole question of construction is, notwithstanding the powerful arguments to the contrary which have been addressed to your lordships, that the opinion of STAMP, J., and DANCKWERTS, L.J., is to be preferred to that of LORD DENNING, M.R., and DIPLOCK, L.J.

E I cannot regard the power as vested in these two persons by way of personal confidence. The power was, it seems, given to them in order that it might serve their own interests in preserving their position in the company. Notwithstanding that the office of permanent life director which each of them filled was of a different kind from the office normally filled by an executor or trustee I am of opinion that it matters not that the office is not of a perpetual character: F the power survives so long as the qualification exists in the individual holding the office of life director.

Rejecting, as I do, the view that the power was given to the two persons as personal confidants, there is no contrary intention shown so as to exclude the rule contained in s. 1 (1) of the Interpretation Act, 1889, that words in plural include the singular.

G I would allow the appeal and restore the order of STAMP, J.

LORD PEARCE: My Lords, in my opinion the construction put on the articles of association by STAMP, J., is to be preferred. The draftsman has deliberately set up a special office of permanent life director with special tenure of office, special qualification, and special powers. In all these three respects H it differs from the office of an ordinary director. Whether or not there is yet another office of "permanent" director does not affect the problem. So far as language is concerned the draftsman has created an office of permanent life director. It is true that it is an office to which, as the articles now stand, there can be no successors, a fact which tends against its being an office and in favour of the title of permanent life director being a mere description of Mr. and Mrs. I Berry as individuals; but this is not enough, in my opinion, to displace the indications that an office was intended.

Where a bare power is given to two jointly in their individual capacities the survivor cannot execute it, since trust in two persons jointly is not the same as trust in either alone; but where the power is annexed to an office, a survivor in that office can execute it. The relevant cases are set out in FARWELL ON POWERS (3rd Edn.) pp. 514-520. They deal with trustees, executors and the like. Even on the analogy of these cases, Mr. Berry is, in my opinion, entitled as survivor to execute his power. That analogy, however, is not conclusive, or indeed very eogent in deciding the construction which should be adopted in the case of a document concerned with commerce such as the articles of association of a private company. Here one should look in the document for indications of what the draftsman was really intending to achieve. A

It is not unusual in a private company to find provisions which transfer to certain persons in their position as special directors some of the powers which would normally reside in the votes of the shareholders in general meeting. In a private company the position and rights of a minority shareholder, whether he be a director or not, are precarious. Unless special provisions are made, the founder or founders of a family company (such as this was) are safe only so long as he or they keep their majority shareholding. Yet he or they may well wish, as the years go on, to divest themselves of a large part of the equity to others and in particular to the next generation without thereby losing all control of the business or risking the loss of such benefits as they may wish to retain for themselves. The only way to attain this end is for power to be divorced from shareholding or voting rights. This was plainly the object of the creation of the permanent life directorships. They were intended to secure Mr. and Mrs. Berry in their position even if they should part with their majority shareholding. B

Was it, then, intended that husband and wife should only have joint security and that as separate individuals they should have none? If so, there were several situations which could have destroyed the security of tenure given by the permanent life directorships. The death of one was not the only factor which could produce this result. The security of one could also be destroyed by the insolvency, unsoundness of mind, conviction, absence for six months without leave, or even the mere resignation of the other. Reading the relevant articles I cannot think that this was intended. Had this been envisaged, I would have expected some (perhaps limited) form of protection for the survivor. C

In my opinion, the strong inference to be drawn from the articles is that husband and wife (each of whom in fact had a large stake in the company) were each intended by virtue of the office of permanent life director to be secured in such control as that office gave them regardless of whether the other spouse died or resigned or ceased for any of the other named events from being a director. D

I would therefore allow the appeal. E

LORD WILBERFORCE: My Lords, this appeal requires your lordships to construe certain of the articles of association of a private limited company—Bersel Manufacturing Co., Ltd. [His LORDSHIP read arts. 11, 12 and 16, as set out at p. 553, letters G to I, et seq., ante, and continued:] The facts which gave rise to the litigation are that the appellant, Mr. Ben Hubert Berry, who was one of the signatories to the company's memorandum of association, was, as art. 11 shows, one of the two first directors, the other being his wife, Mrs. Margaret Berry. Of the issued share capital of ten thousand £1 shares, Mr. Berry held 4,050, Mrs. Margaret Berry 3,500 and the respondent, Irene Eleanor Berry, a daughter-in-law of the appellant, two thousand. The remaining 450 were divided between three small holdings. Mrs. Margaret Berry died in 1962 and bequeathed her 3,500 shares to three individuals who later allied themselves with the respondent. The respondent became a director of the company about 1959. She and the appellant failed to agree, and on Sept. 27, 1962, the appellant, purporting to act under the power conferred by art. 16 (H), removed her from office. She took no action on this removal. At the annual general meeting held on Dec. 10, 1965, she was re-elected a director by the voting power of her own shares, supported by the holders of the 3,500 shares mentioned above; the appellant voted against the election. The appellant thereupon purported again to remove her from office under the power conferred by art. 16 (H). This led to the present proceedings, which the respondent commenced, claiming that the power conferred by art. 16 (H) ceased to be exercisable on the death of Mrs. Margaret Berry. The judges in the courts below are equally divided as to whether her contention is correct. F

A The question for decision has been presented as a point of law directed to be separately tried before the trial of the action. This, in my opinion, is unfortunate. Documents, including articles of association, ought to be interpreted in the light of the circumstances in which they were drawn up. To require the court to construe them in isolation, purely as words printed on paper, as this procedure does, is to put the court in blinkers and to deprive it of legitimate and necessary assistance. It would, in this case, have been relevant, and of use, to know the circumstances in which the company was incorporated; whether it was formed to take over a pre-existing business; to whom that business belonged, what part the appellant and his wife respectively played in it, and what consideration was given for their shares. We know nothing of these matters and it is not surprising that the courts below found some difficulty in extracting their meaning and intention from the articles alone.

The articles not being explicit, and the background of them unknown, it was very natural that both STAMP, J., and the Court of Appeal should search, as a solvent of the difficulty, for a rule of law. They found this in a distinction drawn in that admirable work, FARWELL ON POWERS, between a bare power given to two or more by name and a power annexed to an office. A bare power, it is said, cannot be executed by the survivor, because "if a man says he will trust two, the law will not say he shall trust one; it is a joint confidence" (3rd Edn., p. 514). If, on the other hand, a power is annexed to an office, all persons who fill the office can exercise the power (3rd Edn., p. 516). But though all the judges agreed on the tools to be used, they achieved, by the use of them, different results, for while LORD DENNING, M.R., and DIPLOCK, L.J., thought that the power was one conferred on Mr. and Mrs. Berry, the words "permanent life directors" being merely a convenient way of describing them as individuals, DANCKWERTS, L.J., and STAMP, J., read it as conferred on them as holders of an office, viz., that of permanent life director. The rival views were forcefully urged on us by counsel in this House.

I should certainly be grateful for any authoritative aid in the difficult task of construction of these articles: but unfortunately, I cannot find that either of the keys offered to us unlocks the door. The conception of a joint confidence in two persons seems to relate to a world far removed from that of the powers of directors of a commercial private company: "if a man says he will trust two, the law will not say he shall trust one"—but where, or whose, is the "trust" here, or the "confidence"? The formula cannot be fitted to the facts either literally or by any adaptation that I can devise. It is true, of course, that while both permanent life directors survive, and hold office, the power of removal must be jointly exercised. But, on analysis, this does not imply any joint confidence, or joint trust; it is simply a reflection or statement of the reality that if two holders of equal voting power disagree, no result is achieved. The necessity of agreement during their joint tenure of office is no indication that, when one office holder remains, the separate power which he previously had is come to an end.

The alternative, annexation to an office, though nearer to the situation, does not fit it; for, though it meets the case where an office (including in the term such positions as trustees or executors) is by its nature held by persons in succession, or, if one of several holders dies, by the survivors, here the "office"—that of permanent life director—can only be held by Mr. and Mrs. Berry. Certainly it can be held by the survivor of them, but then the question remains, which is the whole question in the case, whether the power to appoint or remove directors can be exercised by the survivor. There is no external principle, apart from what one finds in the articles, to which one can appeal for an answer.

I find it, then, necessary to concentrate attention on the relevant articles—regretting that the somewhat faint indications which these contain are not strengthened by adequate knowledge of the background against which they were framed. Mr. Berry was one of the incorporators of the company: he and his wife the first directors. Between them they controlled the company, but neither of them had a majority of the votes. The first step—taken by art. 11—was to make them directors for life and there are two significant points about the method they adopted. Their appointment was not conditional on retention of their shareholdings—they remained permanent life directors so long as they held shares of the nominal value of £1. They thus enabled themselves, if they wished, to pass on their shares (over £1) to others in their lifetime without giving up their control of the board. Secondly, the definition of their position as permanent life directors and of their rights as such is expressed by the use of the words “each of them . . . so long as he” [sc. or she] “holds shares . . . shall be called ‘a permanent life director’.” The use of the singular seems deliberate, and to point away from any conception of joint power, or joint position. Each might dispose of his (or her) shares—less £1—or altogether: the position of each in either eventuality is separately provided for.

Article 12 contains no indication which I find helpful. I do not stop to examine the obscure distinction between permanent and ordinary directors because there is no relevance in it for present purposes, but art. 16 is significant. It provides for vacation of office in a number of events; its provisions operate separately in relation to each and every director including each permanent life director. Under it, either of the permanent life directors would vacate office during his or her life, if becoming insolvent, or of unsound mind, or through absence from directors’ meetings, or by resignation. Perhaps this is really the main argument in another form, but I find nothing reasonable in the suggestion that, if one of the permanent life directors vacates office under one of these provisions, the powers of the other should come to an end; yet, if they continue in these events, why should they not continue in the case of vacation by death? So far, in fact, from finding any business reason why the existence of the special powers should be conditional on the survivorship of both the permanent life directors, I would think it surprising, whether the company was effectively founded by Mr. Berry, or by Mr. Berry and Mrs. Berry, or by Mrs. Berry, if, after the creation of a special right of control over the board, which right was expressed to continue even after voting control had been relinquished, one should lose his or her powers over the board the moment the other died. The language of art. 21, so far from supporting such a conclusion, to my mind points the other way.

One other argument should be mentioned, because it appealed to LORD DENNING, M.R. He pointed out that if the appellant was right, and he retained his power of removal, this created a “revolving door”, in the sense that the moment after a director had been appointed by his shareholders he could be removed by Mr. Berry. The metaphor is illuminating but inconclusive, because precisely the same situation might have arisen during the joint life-time of the permanent life directors the moment that they jointly ceased to possess a majority of the voting shares; but art. 11 clearly contemplates that the power of removal would survive this event. The reality is that the power of appointing (art. 12) and of removing directors (art. 16 (H)) operates as a suspension, while it lasts, of the powers of the shareholders. The door may revolve, but it leads only to an exit, and the existence of it does not reveal for how long it is to operate.

I conclude on a construction of the articles that the special power of removal conferred by art. 16 (H) remains exercisable by Mr. Berry notwithstanding the death of his wife and that the appeal should be allowed.

On Apr. 27, 1959, a company, incorporated in 1955, passed resolutions for a creditors' voluntary winding-up and a liquidator was appointed. The liquidator realised various assets and incurred expenses in the liquidation which almost equalled the amount realised. B. was a solicitor who was engaged by a committee of creditors to arrange the calling of the meetings to wind-up the company. For this work the liquidator paid B. £200. It was accepted that, apart from any question of the amount of the charge, fees for this work were not properly payable out of the assets of the company. Moreover, apart from the £200, the fees paid to B. appeared to be high. It was admitted that the liquidator had been dilatory in the conduct of the liquidation, in particular he had consistently failed to convene the annual meetings of creditors. The Official Receiver presented a petition under s. 224 (2) of the Companies Act, 1948, for the compulsory winding-up of the company. At the date of the hearing the liquidation was for all practical purposes complete, and there was no reason why the liquidator should not convene a final meeting under s. 300. The liquidator was willing to give undertakings to pay the £200 into the assets of the company and to complete the liquidation with all due despatch.

Held: in the circumstances and on the liquidator's giving the two undertakings mentioned above, the burden of showing that the liquidation could not be continued with due regard to the interests of creditors was not discharged and the petition would be dismissed (see p. 562, letter I, and p. 563, letter A, post).

Petition.

J. Russell Electronics, Ltd. ("the company") was incorporated in 1955. It was one of a number of subsidiaries of a parent company and had a nominal capital of £6,000 and a paid-up capital of £5,331. On Apr. 27, 1959, resolutions were passed for a creditors' voluntary winding-up, and E. was appointed liquidator. E. was a chartered accountant and carried on his practice in Leicestershire; the company carried on business at Hythe, near Southampton. The amount of the estimated assets and liabilities of the company at the commencement of the winding-up, as shown by the liquidator's account (under s. 342 of the Companies Act, 1948), was £9,115; secured creditors' debts amounted to £2,228 and unsecured creditors' debts to £28,525. In the course of the liquidation assets were realised, but many of them for much less than originally estimated. The amounts realised were—£300 for machinery, less a payment of £200 to a Mr. Sutton; part of stock, less cost of drawings purchased to facilitate sale, £175; furniture £40; balance of stock, less transport, £39 1s. 8d.; cash from unknown source £20; first dividend in liquidation of Easipower, Ltd. £524 5s.; and second dividend in liquidation of Easipower, Ltd. £190 0s. 10d.—total £1,288 7s. 6d. Easipower, Ltd. was an associated company. In the course of the liquidation the liquidator incurred expenses almost equalling the total amount realised. The expenses were as follows—fees and expenses £1,077 18s. 8d.; bank charges and interest £69 2s. 10d.; cost of Messrs. Child & Child (solicitors) in relation to a claim made in the liquidation of Easipower, Ltd. £25; and a few other items making a total of £1,215 7s. 3d. Particulars of the fees and expenses were—£349 6s. for fees and £78 6s. 6d. for expenses to a Mr. Buckley, total £427 12s. 6d.; fees to the liquidator himself £200 (which, the court found, did not appear on the face of it to be unreasonable) and expenses £171 16s. 8d., making a total of £371 16s. 8d.; to the liquidator and Mr. Buckley joint expenses £118 15s.; fees to Mr. Sutton £80 10s. and expenses £41 8s. 6d., making a total of £121 18s. 6d. Those fees and expenses appeared to be very large in proportion to the realisation.

Mr. Buckley was formerly a solicitor practising in Leicestershire. He was engaged by a committee of creditors of the company before the liquidation to make the arrangements for the calling of the meetings to wind-up the company. He was also engaged by the liquidator after the winding-up resolutions to assist him in connexion with the affairs of the company which were in some confusion. Mr. Buckley had since been struck off the rolls as a solicitor, and in 1965 he was adjudicated bankrupt. The liquidator said that the services which he rendered were unsatisfactory. Of Mr. Buckley's fees of £349 6s. no less than £200, according to the documents emanating both from himself and from the liquidator, represented a fee which was paid to him for his work in connexion with the meetings summoned to propose the winding-up resolutions. The amount of that figure was, on the face of it, extravagantly large, but, apart from that, it was accepted on behalf of the liquidator that fees for that work could not properly have been paid out of the assets of the company in liquidation.

The claim against Easipower, Ltd., had involved protracted negotiations. His Lordship intimated the liquidator's expenses in regard to it were not on the face of them extravagant, that it was for the Board of Trade to make out a prima facie case in that respect, and that, as regards both the liquidator's fees and expenses and those of Mr. Buckley, it had not done so. There was raised a matter of the purchase of machinery by a Mr. Sutton from the liquidator. Mr. Sutton, a former employee of the company, was employed, with the consent of

A the committee of inspection, to negotiate for the sale of the company's machinery. In regard to this His LORDSHIP intimated that in the circumstances the liquidator could not be said to have been guilty of any misfeasance in accepting an amount which Mr. Sutton paid for purchasing himself a part of the machinery. He accordingly found that the liquidator had by common consent paid £200 to Mr. Buckley to which Mr. Buckley was not entitled, and that, apart from the £200, the fees paid to Mr. Buckley appeared to be high; but that no other prima facie case had been made out as regards the application of the company's assets.

B It was admitted that the conduct of the liquidation had been dilatory throughout. In particular the liquidator had consistently failed to convene the annual meetings of creditors, which he was bound to convene under s. 299 of the Companies Act, 1948. One order had been made against the liquidator to make a return; that was an order made by PLOWMAN, J., on June 19, 1964. On May 20, 1963, the Board of Trade had directed, pursuant to r. 201 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949, that the chief auditor of the companies liquidation branch of the Board should audit the account of the liquidator submitted to Board pursuant to prior order. The order of PLOWMAN, J., was made for non-compliance with the Board's order. On Apr. 15, 1965, a report pursuant to such audit was submitted to the Board.

D The Official Receiver presented on Feb. 13, 1968, a petition seeking that the company might be wound-up by the court under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1948, on the ground, pursuant to s. 224 (2), that owing to the conduct of the liquidator the voluntary winding-up could not be continued with due regard to the interests of the creditors.

D. M. Burton for the liquidator.

F PENNYCUICK, J., having stated the nature of the proceedings and read s. 224 (2) of the Companies Act, 1948, reviewed the relevant facts and the charges and the fees raised in question, and, having reached the conclusion stated at letter A, above, continued: the position in the present case is this. The Official Receiver has made good one claim against the liquidator for misapplication of the company's assets, namely the payment of £200 to Mr. Buckley. He has not made out the other claims against the liquidator.

G I have now to consider whether on those facts it would be right to make the order sought under s. 224 (2). On that point I was referred to some authorities. The first is Re 1897 Jubilee Sites Syndicate (1), where there was a petition under s. 14 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which corresponds to s. 224 (2) of the Companies Act, 1948. In the course of his judgment WRIGHT, J., said this (2):

H "This is a case of great importance. It is very desirable that a person in the position of the Official Receiver should in a proper case be able to interfere with effect for such a purpose as is here suggested. There are two questions for my decision—namely, What is the real meaning of s. 14 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890? and, has a sufficient case been shown to justify an order being made under the section when its meaning has been ascertained? I have had a great doubt as to what the section means, but I think a reasonably wide construction ought to be given to it . . ."

I WRIGHT, J., then proceeds to say that it includes a particular matter with which he was there concerned and which is quite different from anything which arises in the present case. He concluded by saying this (3):

"I may add that I do not think an order should be made as a matter of course under s. 14. As here, a very strong case must be made out to justify the interference of the court under that section."

(1) [1899] 2 Ch. 204.

(2) [1899] 2 Ch. at pp. 205, 206.
(3) [1899] 2 Ch. at p. 206.

Counsel for the Official Receiver pointed out to me that the language of s. 224 (2) is merely "unless it is satisfied" and the words "very strong case to answer" are not to be found in the section. I accept the contention of counsel for the Official Receiver on that point, i.e., that in order to give the court jurisdiction under sub-s. (2) it must merely be satisfied on a balance of probabilities that the statutory condition is satisfied, i.e., "that the voluntary winding-up . . . cannot be continued with due regard to the interests of the creditors".

It is quite clear that the court is entitled to be so satisfied if the circumstances are that on the evidence there appears to be a claim against the liquidator himself or a claim which the liquidator ought to bring against some third party, and that unless the official receiver takes over the liquidation it is unlikely that such a claim would be pursued. If that is the position, then I think that it is true to say that the voluntary winding-up cannot be continued with due regard to the interests of the creditors because it is to their interest that all the assets of the company should be got in, including whatever might result from the successful prosecution of a claim against the liquidator or third party.

The present section was considered by BUCKLEY, J., in Re Ryder Installations, Ltd. (4), where, however, the facts were entirely different from those here. According to the report there had been repeated failures on the part of the liquidator to comply with the various requirements of the Companies Acts as to returns and so forth, involving various orders both of a magistrates' court and of this court. Further, there was an allegation in the petition, which was not challenged, that the audit disclosed what appeared to be irregularities by the liquidator in the conduct of the winding-up which he had failed to explain to the auditor's satisfaction. The auditor had therefore concluded that no useful purpose would be served by continuing his inquiries. The winding-up was still continuing and there is nothing in the report to suggest that it was due for immediate termination. In those circumstances BUCKLEY, J., after setting out the facts, said (5):

"In those circumstances, the Official Receiver petitions this court for an order under s. 224 (2). It seems to me that the evidence which has been filed in support of this petition and has been read to me, does establish a clear and strong case to the effect that the voluntary liquidation by this voluntary liquidator cannot be continued with due regard to the interests of the persons concerned with that liquidation, and I think that it is a case in which it is proper for me to make the order asked for."

If the winding-up of this company were not now almost completed that case would be much more closely in point. But the liquidation is now for all practical purposes completed, and so far as appears from the evidence there is no reason why the liquidator should not convene the final meeting under s. 300 of the Companies Act, 1948, with a view to the dissolution of the company. It appears extremely doubtful whether there will be any assets at all available for distribution, but in so far as there are any assets they can be immediately distributed, as far as I can see, as a first and final dividend without delay.

If the liquidator had not been willing to give an undertaking with regard to the £200 misapplied by him, I should have thought that on that single ground it would be right to make an order under s. 224 (2). The position would, I think, then be that only by means of a compulsory winding-up could that sum be recovered in the interests of the creditors. However, counsel for the liquidator in the course of the hearing gave a firm undertaking on behalf of the liquidator to pay that sum of £200 into the assets of the company. If that misappropriated sum is replaced I do not think that there is anything in the evidence which would justify me in taking the view that the voluntary winding-up cannot be brought to completion with due regard to the interests of the creditors.

Counsel for the Official Receiver made the point that once one finds that the

A liquidator has been guilty of misfeasance in one particular respect then one should look more jealously at the other items in his account, in particular the fees to Mr. Buckley and his own fees, and that on that ground alone, even though the £200 is replaced, it would be right to make the compulsory order. I do not think that in all the circumstances a sufficient case is made out against the liquidator to justify that course, having regard to the words which I have quoted so often from s. 224 (2).

It seems to me that in addition to the undertaking which he has already offered the liquidator should give an undertaking to complete the liquidation with all due despatch (6). That, of course, will involve making returns, and so forth, which he has not already made. On those undertakings by the liquidator I propose to dismiss the petition.

MOHAMED v. KNOTT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Ashworth and Blain, JJ.), March 28, 1968.]

Children and Young Persons—Protection—Recognition of foreign marriage—Potentially polygamous marriage—Fit person order—Nigerian girl of thirteen validly married by Nigerian Moslem law—Whether marriage recognised in England—Whether girl, living with her husband, exposed to moral danger or in need of care and protection—Children and Young Persons Act, 1933 (23 Geo. 5 c. 12), s. 62—Children and Young Persons Act 1963 (c. 37) s. 2.

Criminal Law—Carnal knowledge—Girl under sixteen—Married according to foreign law—Intercourse with husband—Prosecution should not be brought—Sexual Offences Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2 c. 69), s. 6 (1).

The appellant, who was a Nigerian Moslem married in Nigeria a girl, then aged a little over thirteen, who was also a Nigerian Moslem. The marriage was a valid marriage according to Moslem law of the domicile. It was a potentially polygamous marriage. The appellant and the girl came to London. On application to the juvenile court, the justices held that the girl's marriage was not one that was recognised in England, and that accordingly or alternatively because she had not a parent or guardian in England, she was exposed to moral danger, and was not receiving such protection and guidance as a good parent might be expected to give, for the purposes of s. 2* of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963. Pursuant to s. 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, the justices made a fit person order committing her to the care of the London Borough of Southwark. On appeal,

Held: the marriage would be recognised by the English court as a valid marriage giving the wife the status of wife (see p. 567, letter C, post); and in considering whether the wife was in moral danger in living with the appellant the justices had misdirected themselves by ignoring the way of life in which the parties to the marriage had been brought up, and the fit person order should be revoked (see p. 568, letter D, and p. 569, letter B, post).

(6) The undertaking was given by the liquidator.

Per CURIAM: (a) a fit person order may be made in appropriate circumstances in respect of a wife validly married to her husband (see p. 567, letter D, post).

(b) in such circumstances as those in the present case, where a wife validly married to a husband by foreign law was under sixteen years of age, a prosecution should not be brought under s. 6 (1)* of the Sexual Offences Act, 1956, for sexual intercourse between the parties, nor did the existence in English law of the criminal offence of unlawful sexual intercourse with a person under the age of sixteen render the wife a person who was exposed to moral danger for the purposes of s. 2 (2) (a) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963 (see p. 568, letter G, and p. 568, letter I, to p. 569, letter A, post).

Case Stated.

This was a Case Stated by the justices for the Inner London Area sitting at the Southwark North juvenile court.

On June 27 and 28, 1967, a complaint was preferred by W.P.C. Knott (the respondent) under s. 62 of the Children and Young Persons Act, 1933, that Rabi Mohamed Musi was in need of care, protection or control in that she was not receiving such care, protection and guidance as a good parent might reasonably be expected to give and was exposed to moral danger within s. 2 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963. The relevant facts are set out in the judgment of LORD PARKER, C.J. (see p. 565, letters B to E, post). The justices, having heard the complaint, determined that it was proved and ordered that Rabi Mohamed Musi be committed to the London Borough of Southwark as a fit person. The questions for the opinion of the High Court were as follows:—

(i) whether the justices were right in law in concluding that the marriage between the appellant (Alhaji Mohamed) and Rabi Mohamed Musi was not one recognised as valid by the English courts for the purposes of the question before them; (ii) whether there was evidence on which the justices were entitled to find that the appellant had sexual intercourse with Rabi Mohamed Musi at a time when puberty had almost certainly not begun; and (iii) whether the justices were right in holding that in all the circumstances Rabi Mohamed Musi was in need of care, protection or control within s. 2 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963.

* Section 6, so far as material, is set out at p. 568, letter F, post.

- A P. K. Archer for the appellant.
M. D. L. Worsley for the respondent.
N. M. Butler for Rabi Mohamed Musi.

LORD PARKER, C.J.: The short facts are as follows. The girl, Rabi Mohamed Musi, was born on Jan. 1, 1954. There was some doubt as to her age, but the justices accepted her evidence and that of the present appellant, Alhaji Mohamed, that she was born on that day. The appellant, Alhaji Mohamed, is twenty-six and both he and the girl are Nigerian Moslems of the Hausa tribe, and both were at all material times domiciled in Nigeria. On Jan. 15, 1967, that is when the girl was aged thirteen years and two weeks, the two of them went through a ceremony in Nigeria according to Moslem law. There was evidence before the justices as to the relevant law and custom among Nigerian Moslems, and it was held on ample evidence that under the ceremony that they underwent in Nigeria, these two persons were validly married according to their law. The marriage, however, was a polygamous marriage, since the present appellant could have up to four wives. On Apr. 16, the appellant, who was studying medicine in this country, brought his wife Rabi (herein referred to as "the wife") over here and they were admitted by the immigration authorities. The appellant's intention is, after he has completed his studies, to take the wife back to Nigeria. It so happens that when he arrived in this country, he was suffering from gonorrhoea and within five days of arrival he went to a doctor in this country to be cured. A few days later he took the wife to a doctor to have a contraceptive fitted. It was the result of that visit to the doctor that the doctor took the view that the wife was an extremely young girl, and the matter was finally reported to the authorities and these proceedings were commenced.

The first point which fell to be dealt with by the justices was how far, if at all, the law in this country would recognise the marriage, being a polygamous marriage, that these two persons underwent. The justices held that since the marriage was potentially polygamous it was not a marriage recognised by this country. If that were right, it followed that this young girl of thirteen was living with and sleeping with a man twice her age, they not being married in English eyes at all. On that basis, the justices held that she was exposed to moral danger, and did not have the care, protection and guidance that a good parent would be expected to give.

I should, before going further, read the relevant provisions of the Children and Young Persons Act 1963; there are few that need to be referred to. Section 2 (1) provides that:

"A child or young person is in need of care, protection or control within the meaning of this Act if—(a) any of the conditions mentioned in sub-s. (2) of this section is satisfied with respect to him, and he is not receiving such care, protection and guidance as a good parent may reasonably be expected to give; . . ."

One of the conditions there referred to is the condition to be found in s. 2 (2) (a), namely that he is falling into bad associations or is exposed to moral danger. Accordingly the justices, having come to the conclusion that this was not a marriage which would be recognised in English law, came also to the conclusion that she was exposed to moral danger and was not receiving such care, protection and guidance.

In my judgment, however, the justices in this difficult realm of the law came to a wrong conclusion. The courts have advanced, one might say, step by step in this matter, and I find it unnecessary to go through all the decisions. Perhaps the position is best set out in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Baindail (otherwise Lawson) v. Baindail (1). The question that arose there concerned the validity of a marriage which the respondent had gone through with the appellant in 1939 at a London register office, the appellant being described as a bachelor and the respondent as an English woman. The validity of that marriage came in question as the result of proof that in 1928, some eleven years earlier, he had been lawfully married to a Hindu woman according to Hindu rites in India and his Hindu wife was still alive. It was held there that the court was bound to recognise that Indian marriage as valid, albeit it was potentially polygamous, and that it was an effective bar to the subsequent marriage in England. LORD GREENE, M.R., said this (2):

"I do not propose to go through all the cases cited to us but I will take what I think has been properly described as the high-water mark, the well known decision of LORD PENZANCE in Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (3). The headnote starts with this general proposition: 'Marriage as understood in Christendom is the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman, to the exclusion of all others.' But that, of course, does not enable any general answer to be given to the question: what is to be understood by 'marriage' for the purpose of the various branches of English law in which the question of marriage is relevant? For the purpose of enforcing the rights of marriage, or for the purpose of dissolving a marriage, it is no doubt the case (at any rate, it has always been accepted as the case following LORD PENZANCE's decision) that the courts of this country exercising jurisdiction in matrimonial affairs do not and cannot give effect to, or dissolve, marriages which are not monogamous marriages."

LORD GREENE then goes on to refer to the reason for that, namely, that our Matrimonial Causes Act and Acts dealing with marriage are based purely on monogamous marriages. He goes on to point out that in the case then before him, the court did not have to consider the construction of any words such as "marriage", "husband and wife", such as one finds in the Acts concerned with marriage, and points out that the real question is how far English law recognises a polygamous marriage as creating a status.

"The practical question in this case appears to be: will the courts of this country, in deciding upon the question of the validity of this English marriage, give effect to what was undoubtedly the status possessed by the appellant? That question we have to decide with due regard to common sense and some attention to reasonable policy. We are not fettered by any concluded decision on the matter. The judge set out in a striking manner some of the consequences which would flow from disregarding the Hindu marriage for present purposes. I think it is certainly a matter which we must bear in mind that the prospect of an English court saying that it will not regard the status of marriage conferred by a Hindu ceremony would be a curious one when the Privy Council might come to a precisely opposite conclusion as to the validity of such a marriage on an Indian appeal. I do not think we can disregard that circumstance. We have to apply the law in a state of affairs in which this question of the validity of Hindu marriages is necessarily of very great practical importance, in the every day running of our Commonwealth and Empire."

I read that because it seems to me that everything that LORD GREENE there said applies equally today in relation to a Moslem marriage in Nigeria such as took place in the present case.

As I have said, I do not propose to go through all the authorities; it seems to me that the present position is correctly set out in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS (7th Edn.), where in r. 37 it is said:

A "A marriage which is polygamous under r. 34 and not invalid under r. 35 or r. 36 will be recognised in England as a valid marriage unless there is strong reason to the contrary."

B The editor then goes on to refer to certain cases where there is some strong reason to the contrary, they all being cases which involve the construction in a statute of some such words as "marriage", "wife", "husband", and where one has to decide whether those statutes have in mind merely a monogamous marriage in which case for the purpose of that statute the polygamous marriage will not be recognised; or whether they are statutes which clearly cover marriages whether monogamous or polygamous. In my judgment the justices came to a wrong conclusion in this case, and that for the purposes of ascertaining the status of this wife, the courts here will recognise the marriage as a valid marriage giving her that status.

C That, however, does not conclude the matter, because the justices go on to find that even if they are wrong, and our courts would recognise this marriage as a valid marriage, nevertheless Rabi was in moral danger, and did not have the care, protection and guidance which it could be expected that a good parent would give. Let me say at once that in my view it is perfectly possible to make a fit person order in respect of a wife validly married to a husband. One can think of many illustrations; there might have been evidence that he constantly assaulted her; there might be evidence that he deserted her, in this case a girl who spoke no English, leaving her on the streets of London. There might be evidence that he introduced her to undesirable characters, that he introduced her to drugs, matters of that sort, which would undoubtedly be justification for making a fit person order. The question here really is whether there was evidence in this case justifying the making of such an order.

E It has been pressed on this court that that is a matter of fact for the justices, and that this court should not interfere unless it could be said to be a decision which no reasonable bench of justices properly applying their minds to the law could arrive at.

F What did the justices find? They found in the first place that prior to marriage the appellant had lived with another woman by whom he had had three illegitimate children; that was before the marriage. They found that immediately after the marriage, at a time when, as they put it, Rabi had almost certainly not reached the age of puberty, he had intercourse with her. They found that that is something which, if not a crime, is looked on as a serious matter in Nigeria. G The age of puberty is not less than nine; its limits are nine to fifteen, and on the evidence here the justices said that when intercourse first began, when the marriage took place, almost certainly there had not been development of puberty. They then find that after the marriage and after intercourse had begun, he slept in Nigeria with a prostitute and contracted gonorrhoea. They H go on to find that while suffering from that disease he abstained from any intercourse with the wife, that he has now been cured, and that as a result he now intends, once she is fitted with a contraceptive, to begin intercourse again.

It is in those circumstances that the justices in their written decision, which is annexed to the case, say this:

I "Here is a girl, aged thirteen or possibly less, unable to speak English, living in London with a man twice her age to whom she has been married by Moslem law. He admits having had sexual intercourse with her at a time when according to the medical evidence the development of puberty had almost certainly not begun. He intends to resume intercourse as soon as he is satisfied that she is adequately protected by contraceptives from the risk of pregnancy. He admits that before the marriage he had intercourse with a woman by whom he has three illegitimate children. He further admits that since the marriage, which took place as recently as January of this year, he has had sexual relations with a prostitute in Nigeria from whom he contracted venereal disease. In our opinion a continuance of such an association notwithstanding the marriage, would be repugnant to any decent minded English man or woman. Our decision reflects that repugnance."

I would never dream of suggesting that a decision by this bench of magistrates with this very experienced chairman, could ever be termed perverse; but having read that, I am convinced that they have misdirected themselves. When they say that "a continuance of such an association notwithstanding the marriage, would be repugnant to any decent minded English man or woman", they are, I think, and can only be, considering the view of an Englishman or woman in relation to an English girl and our western way of life. I cannot myself think that decent minded English men or women, realising the way of life in which Rabi was brought up, and the appellant for that matter, would inevitably say that this is repugnant. It is certainly natural for a girl to marry at that age. They develop sooner, and there is nothing abhorrent in their way of life for a girl of thirteen to marry a man of twenty-five. Incidentally it was not until 1929 that, in this country, an age limit was put on marriage. Granted that the appellant may be said to be a bad lot, that he has done things in the past which perhaps nobody would approve of, it does not follow from that that the wife, happily married to the appellant, is under any moral danger by associating and living with him. For my part, as it seems to me, it could only be said that she was in moral danger if one was considering somebody brought up in and living in, our way of life, and to hold that she is in moral danger in the circumstances of this case can only be arrived at, as it seems to me, by ignoring the way of life in which she was brought up, and the appellant was brought up.

There is one other point which has given me some trouble, and that is the suggestion that every time the appellant in England has intercourse with the wife he is committing a criminal offence, because s. 6 (1) of the Sexual Offences Act, 1956, provides:

"It is an offence, subject to the exceptions mentioned in this section [which do not apply] for a man to have unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl... under the age of sixteen."

So it is said that every time in this country he has intercourse with the wife, he is committing an offence, and that in those circumstances the offence being committed against her, she is exposed to moral danger. It is a point which was apparently not before the magistrates; they certainly do not base their decision on any such consideration. Nor, for my part, do I think that the police could ever properly prosecute in a case such as that if the marriage is a marriage recognised by this country. It may be, of course, that the word "unlawful" will govern this case in the sense that it might be said that it was lawful as between man and wife, and some slight support is given to that view by the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal, as it then was, in R. v. Chapman (5). The word "unlawful" was being considered there not in relation to s. 6 (1), but in relation to s. 19 (1) of the Sexual Offences Act, 1956. That section provides:

"It is an offence, subject to the exception mentioned in this section, for a person to take an unmarried girl under the age of eighteen out of the possession of her parent or guardian against his will, if she is so taken with the intention that she shall have unlawful sexual intercourse with men or with a particular man."

It was said that the appellant's intention was to have sexual intercourse with a girl but only after he had married her. It was held by the court that unlawful sexual intercourse in the above subsection meant illicit intercourse, that is intercourse outside the bonds of marriage.

Whether or not that applies here, it does seem to me that it is not right to say

A that the participation in a crime necessarily exposes a person to moral danger. If, as I think, this is a case of husband and wife validly married, recognised as validly married according to the law of this country, I certainly would not say that the wife was exposed to moral danger merely because she carried out her wifely duties.

B I have come to the conclusion in this case that for the reasons I have endeavoured to state, the magistrates came to a wrong conclusion on points of law, and that accordingly I would allow the appeal and revoke the fit person order.

F In June, 1955, the plaintiff and defendant, who had lived together for many years as man and wife, went to live in a house in London which was conveyed to the defendant. A dispute having arisen as to the ownership of the house, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming a declaration that the defendant held the property on trust, as to a half share, for him. By para. 3 of the statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that he never intended or proposed that any contribution made by him from a joint account of the parties therein referred to should be a gift and that none of his contributions was or ever became a gift. On application by the defendant for particulars under para. 3 of "never intended" particularising the overt acts of the plaintiff and the facts relied on to show that any contributions of the plaintiff were made with no intention of being a gift to the defendant,

G Held: under the new rule, R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 12*, a party must plead the facts relied on to support an allegation of a condition of mind of any person; this applied to an allegation by a plaintiff of the condition of his own mind, including an allegation that he did not have a particular intention, and accordingly the defendant was entitled to particulars under para. 3 of the statement of claim (see p. 572, letters G and H, post).

Procedure Summons.

This was an application by summons for particulars under the statement of claim in the action. The plaintiff, Robert Bartley Feeney, and the defendant Stella Rix, lived together for many years as man and wife, the defendant being known generally as Mrs. Feeney. In June, 1955, they went to live at 11, Hollingbourne Gardens, London, W.13. The conveyance was taken in the name of the defendant. Some years before the commencement of these proceedings relations between them had deteriorated and, though continuing to live under the same roof, they lived separate lives. By writ issued on Mar. 29, 1965, beginning the present action, the plaintiff claimed against the defendant a declaration that she held the property on trust for the plaintiff as to one half share thereof, an order for its sale, and that the plaintiff should recover out of the net proceeds of sale his one half share. The statement of claim, delivered on Apr. 6, 1965, was as follows:

"1. On a date in June, 1955, there was conveyed into the defendant's name the freehold property situate at 11, Hollingbourne Gardens, London, W.13, in respect of the purchase of which property the plaintiff and the defendant contributed in equal shares to the deposit (being in the sum of £600) and to the repayments to date of the mortgage of £2,000 taken out with the Ealing Borough Council in the name of Mrs. Stella E. Feeney towards discharge of the purchase price of the said property (being in the sum of £2,750), as well as the parties contributing in equal shares to the legal fees and stamp duties of and in connexion with the said transactions. 2. The said contributions in equal shares by the plaintiff and the defendant were made from time to time as required by one or other of the parties from the joint account or fund of the parties standing in the name of the defendant at Lloyds Bank, Ltd., Camden Town, London, N.W.1, which joint account or fund consisted of and represented the joint savings of the plaintiff and the defendant during the period commencing in June, 1952. 3. The plaintiff never intended or proposed that any contribution by him to the said joint account or fund or to any of the transactions or matters referred to in para. 1 hereof should be a gift and none of his contributions was or ever became a gift. 4. In the premises the defendant holds the said property on trust for the plaintiff as to a half share thereof and the plaintiff was and is entitled to an account of all rents, profits and financial benefits received by the defendant from the said property and to payment of his just share thereof."

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the defendant held the property on trust for him as to one half share thereof, an order that the property be sold, that he should recover one half of the net proceeds, and an account of all rents, profits and payment to the plaintiff of his just share thereof. The defence, delivered on May 28, 1965, ran as follows:

"1. The defendant admits that from and since Aug. 30, 1955, she has been and is registered proprietor at H.M. Land Registry under Title No. MX200260 of the freehold property known as and situate at 11, Hollingbourne Gardens, London, W.13, and that the said property was charged by her to Ealing Borough Council but save as to this denies para. 1 of the statement of claim. 2. The defendant admits that she formerly had an account with Lloyds Bank, Ltd. at Camden Town, London, N.W.1, but save as to this denies para. 2 of the statement of claim. 3. Paragraph 3 of the statement of claim is not admitted, the plaintiff never made any contribution as there alleged or

A at all. 4. Paragraph 4 of the statement of claim is denied. 5. If (which is denied) the plaintiff made any contributions as alleged in para. 3 of the statement of claim the defendant will claim to set-off the amount of her counterclaim against the value of such contributions (if any) or such part thereof as may be sufficient to disentitle the plaintiff to judgment on his claim. 6. Save as hereinbefore expressly admitted each and every allegation B contained in the statement of claim is denied as if herein set forth and traversed seriatim. 7. In the premises the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief claimed."

By her counterclaim the defendant made claims not material to this report. A reply and defence to counterclaim was served on June 14, 1965; particulars of the defence and counterclaim and of the reply and defence to counterclaim were C given on Apr. 28, 1966, and Aug. 24, 1966. The defendant requested particulars under para. 2 and para. 3 of the statement of claim. The plaintiff refused to give those sought under para. 3, which were as follows:

"Of 'never intended'. Particularising any overt acts of the plaintiff and any other facts relied on to show that the contributions (if any) of the D plaintiff when made by the plaintiff (if at all) were made with no intention of being made as a gift to the defendant."

By summons dated Feb. 13, 1968, the defendant sought an order that the plaintiff should give the further and better particulars above-mentioned. The summons was adjourned to the judge (CROSS, J.) as a procedure summons.

Apr. 10. CROSS, J., read the following judgment in which, after having stated the nature of the dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant and having read the statement of claim, and the defence, and the particulars sought F under para. 3 of the statement of claim, as hereinbefore set out, he continued:
There is no doubt that under the old rules of court which were operative until the end of 1963 the defendant would not have been entitled to these particulars, for R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 22 provided as follows:

"Wherever it is material to allege malice, fraudulent intention, knowledge, or other condition of the mind of any person, it shall be sufficient to allege the G same as a fact without setting out the circumstances from which the same is to be inferred. Provided that where in an action for libel or slander the defendant pleads that any of the words or matters complained of are fair comment on a matter of public interest or were published upon a privileged occasion, the plaintiff shall, if he intends to allege that the defendant was H actuated by express malice, deliver a reply giving particulars of the facts and matters from which such malice is to be inferred."

I It appears that before 1943 a practice had grown up of ordering particulars of intention or knowledge, but in Burgess v. Beethoven Electric Equipment, Ltd. (1), the Court of Appeal pointed out that the rule in question meant what it said and that to order particulars of an allegation of intention or knowledge would be to compel the pleader to plead, not simply the fact on which he relied, but the evidence by which he proposed to prove it.

However, the new rules have altered the position completely. The matter is now governed by R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 12 which, so far as relevant, runs as follows:

"(1) Subject to para. (2), every pleading must contain the necessary particulars of any claim, defence or other matter pleaded including, without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing words—(a) particulars of any misrepresentation, fraud, breach of trust, wilful default or undue influence on which the party pleading relies; and (b) where a party pleading alleges any condition of the mind of any person, whether any disorder or disability of mind or any malice, fraudulent intention or other condition of mind except knowledge, particulars of the facts on which the party relies.

“(4) Where a party alleges as a fact that a person had knowledge or notice of some fact, matter or thing, then, without prejudice to the generality of para. (3), the court may, on such terms as it thinks just, order that party to serve on any other party—(a) where he alleges knowledge, particulars of the facts on which he relies, and (b) where he alleges notice, particulars of the notice.”

It follows, therefore, that if a party alleges that the other party intended on some occasion to make a gift of some item of property he must plead the facts on which he relies in support of the allegation. Further, if he alleges that the other party did not intend on some occasion to make a gift of some item of property he must plead the facts on which he relies in support of that allegation, for to say that someone did not intend to do something is just as much an allegation of a condition of mind as to say that he intended to do something. If authority for that is required, it can be found in the judgment of DIPLOCK, L.J., in the case of Fox v. H. Wood (Harrow), Ltd. (2).

In para. 3 of the statement of claim, however, the plaintiff is making an allegation as to his own state of mind, and counsel submitted on his behalf that R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 12 (1) and (4) did not apply to such an allegation, that is to say that one ought to read in the words “other than himself” after the word “person” in the two sub-rules. I might be prepared to do that if I thought that to construe the rules literally would lead to an absurdity; but I cannot see that it does. If a man’s mistress, who alleges that he intended to make a gift to her of the contents of a flat in which he has installed her, must plead the facts on which she relies in support of that allegation, I cannot see why a husband who alleges that he did not intend to make a gift to his wife of a diamond necklace of which he has put her in possession should not be obliged to plead the facts on which he relies in support of that allegation. The unwillingness of the law to allow self-serving statements to be given in evidence may limit the matters on which the husband can rely, but that circumstance does not seem to have any bearing on the problem in hand. In this case, of course, the plaintiff is not the husband of the defendant, and it might have been enough for him simply to plead the fact that he had contributed to the purchase of the house, leaving it to the defendant to allege that if he had contributed anything it had been by way of gift. However, as they had been living together as man and wife for many years, it is quite understandable that his counsel should have alleged a positive intention not to make a gift. The consequence of doing so is, however, as I see it, that this defendant is entitled to the particulars for which she asks. What, of course, she wants to know is whether the plaintiff is simply saying that he contributed to the purchase and that in his own mind he did not intend his contributions to be gifts, or whether he is also saying that he let the defendant know that he did not intend his contributions to be gifts.

For those reasons I propose to allow the particulars requested with the alteration of “the overt acts” to “any overt acts” and “the facts” to “any facts”.

Having as instructed drawn a crossed cheque for £3,000 in favour of E. with whom the plaintiff company had business dealings, and having got it signed by the company's Pakistani managing director, who then went abroad, K. the Pakistani office manager of the company, went to a branch of the defendant bank where considerable business was done with Pakistanis. He called himself E. and sought to open a new account in that name. He told the securities officer, who had authority to open new accounts, that he was thinking of going into business as a restaurateur, signed the particulars required by the bank with the name of E., and gave two restaurateurs as referees. He paid in £80 on Jan. 24, 1966, to open the account and said that the majority of the funds would come later, and the following day he paid in the £3,000 cheque, which he had endorsed (unnecessarily) in the name of E., together with £35 9s. 6d. in cash. The bank had the cheque specially cleared the same day without being asked to, and credited the proceeds to the new account in E.'s name, although they would not have allowed the account to be operated without a satisfactory reference. On Jan. 26, 1966, the bank was visited by Mr. Ali, one of the referees (the other did not reply to the bank's inquiry), a Pakistani who had been known to the bank since about 1961, had had an account with them for some years and had previously introduced satisfactory Pakistani customers to the bank. He told the bank's branch manager that E. (as K. was known to both of them) had been known to him "for some time" (he was not asked how long), that he, Mr. Ali, believed that E. intended starting a restaurant and that in Mr. Ali's opinion he (i.e., K. known as E.) was all right for the conduct of a bank account. Mr. Ali had in fact known K. for only a month as a customer at his restaurant and was in no position to vouch for his trustworthiness or even his identity. Payments out of the account started at the end of January, 1966; viz., a few days after Mr. Ali's reference was given. All the money in K.'s account was withdrawn in the course of the first week of February, 1966, and he left for Pakistan. The plaintiff company brought an action for conversion of the £3,000 cheque against the defendant bank.

Appeal.

The plaintiff company had brought an action for £3,000 damages for conversion of a cheque for £3,000 drawn on the Bank of India and collected by the defendant bank, the proceeds being credited to an account newly opened by the plaintiff company's former office manager at a branch of the defendant bank and soon afterwards withdrawn from the account; alternatively the plaintiff company claimed £3,000 as money had and received to its use. The defendant bank by their defence admitted that a customer opened an account on Jan. 24, 1966, in the name of Sheik Eliasade. The defendant bank pleaded further that they took the cheque in good faith and without negligence, and they relied on s. 4 of the Cheques Act, 1957.

The plaintiff company carried on business as import and export merchants; the chairman and managing director was Mr. Ameen Marfani, who came to England from Pakistan in about 1953. The plaintiff company's bankers were the Bank of India, Booth Street, Manchester. In March, 1964, a Pakistani, Anwar Kureshy, became employed by the plaintiff company as clerk. He had come to the United Kingdom in 1952. He seemed competent and trustworthy and in the spring of 1965 he was promoted to be office manager. It was a small office, the only other member of the staff being a girl clerk. In January, 1966, Mr. Marfani was proposing to visit Pakistan, and before leaving England it was necessary to pay £3,000 to a London firm called Eliasade, who were import and export merchants with whom the plaintiff company did business. Kureshy

A made out a cheque for this amount in favour of Eliaszade. It was dated Jan. 17, 1966, drawn on the Bank of India, and crossed. Mr. Marfani signed it. On Jan. 21, 1966, Mr. Marfani left for Pakistan. Kureshy remained in charge of the office.

During December, 1965 and January, 1966, or thereabouts, Kureshy, calling himself Eliaszade, visited the Taj Mahal Restaurant in All Saints, Manchester.

B He lunched there on four or five occasions. The proprietor of the restaurant was Akaddas Ali. Kureshy asked Mr. Ali how long he had been there, saying that he, Kureshy, intended to open a restaurant. After some conversation Kureshy asked Mr. Ali about his bank, which it was and whether he were satisfied. Mr. Ali told Kureshy about his bank, saying "find your restaurant first and I will recommend you", meaning, recommend Kureshy to the bank. Mr. Ali in evidence C said that he had known Kureshy, whom he knew as Eliaszade, only for about a month around Christmas, 1965. Mr. Ali had been a customer of the defendant bank's Rusholme branch since about 1961. His account had been operated satisfactorily, and he had introduced several satisfactory Pakistani customers to the bank. It was not known to the bank that he had been convicted of a crime and sent to prison.

D On Jan. 24, 1966, Kureshy went to the Rusholme branch of the defendant bank and there saw the securities clerk, a Mr. Meakin, who had authority to open new accounts. There was evidence that Kureshy was well-dressed, spoke courteously and appeared business-like, that his English was good and that his appearance was consistent with being a man of some substance. The Rusholme branch did thirty to forty per cent. of its business with Pakistanis. At the E interview which followed Kureshy, calling himself Eliaszade, told Mr. Meakin that he, Kureshy, wanted to open an account. Mr. Meakin asked him what type of account he required. Kureshy said that it would be a trading account and that he was thinking of going into business as a restaurateur. He said that the majority of funds for the account would come later. Kureshy paid in cash the sum of £80 with which to open an account. Mr. Meakin produced a form and F himself made out the particulars, which included the name, Mr. Sheikh Eliaszade, 51, Manley Road, Whalley Range, Manchester 16, Restaurateur. This address was the address of a house which Kureshy rented from Mr. Marfani. On Jan. 24, 1966, Eliaszade (i.e., Kureshy posing as Eliaszade) purported to sign his usual signature and his signature in full, Sheikh Eliaszade, in printed lettering and in ordinary handwriting; and the names and addresses of persons to whom G the bank should make reference were set out, viz., A. Ali of the Taj Mahal Restaurant, Manchester, and A. Syeed, Kismet Restaurant, Bolton, Lancashire. Kureshy filled in the usual signature and the signature in full. The two words "Sheikh" written by him, were differently spelt, the first having one "h" and the second having two.

H On Jan. 25, 1966, Mr. Meakin had two letters sent, one to each of the referees. The first was as follows:

"Dear Mr. Ali,

"We have been asked to open an account for Sheikh Eliaszade and your name has been given as a reference. Would you kindly inform us, therefore, whether in your opinion he may be considered trustworthy and likely to prove a satisfactory customer at the bank."

I This letter was addressed personally to Mr. Ali. The other letter, which was to Mr. Syeed, was addressed "Dear Sir", and asked for the same information—"... if you could tell us whether you would consider him trustworthy". On the same day, Jan. 25, 1966, Kureshy presented himself at the Rusholme branch of the defendant bank with the cheque for £3,000 and sought to pay it in, together with a sum of £35 9s. 6d. in cash. The paying-in slip was to credit Eliaszade, and the name was put down twice and the credit as £3,035 9s. 6d. The cheque was in fact endorsed, although endorsement was no longer necessary. The cheque was specially cleared by the bank, with the consequence that on Jan. 25, 1966, the defendant bank had collected the proceeds of the cheque from the Bank of India and had placed them to the credit of the account in the name of Eliaszade which had just been opened. At that time, however, no cheque book had been issued to Kureshy by the defendant bank. A

On the same day, Jan. 26, 1966, Mr. Ali, who was then about to leave for Pakistan, visited the Rusholme branch of the defendant bank in order to make some banking arrangements which would obtain during his absence abroad. The manager of the branch, Mr. Fisher, gave evidence at the trial that Mr. Ali came into his office saying that he was going to Pakistan, and referred to receiving an enquiry about Eliaszade. Mr. Ali said that Eliaszade had been known to him for a time; that he believed that he intended starting a restaurant, and that in Mr. Ali's opinion Eliaszade was all right for the conduct of a bank account. Mr. Fisher did not ask further, and passed on this message to Mr. Meakin, saying that he had satisfied himself that it would be in order to issue a cheque book and start the account in that way. Payments out of the account were made as follows —on Jan. 31, 1966, a payment of £500 to "self"; a payment of £1,080 to Famaz Agencies, and a payment on Feb. 5, 1966 of £1,450 to M. Sheikh. In effect all money which had been paid in was withdrawn or paid out. B C D

On Feb. 8, 1966, Mr. Marfani, then in Pakistan, had a signal to say that Kureshy had gone. In March, 1966, he learned that Eliaszade had not been paid the £3,000.

On July 26, 1967, as reported at [1967] 3 All E.R. 967, NIELD, J., at Manchester Assizes, gave judgment in the action in favour of the defendant bank, holding that the bank were protected by s. 4 of the Cheques Act, 1957, having acted in accordance with the ordinary practice of careful bankers and having discharged the onus of showing that they acted without negligence. The plaintiff company appealed to the Court of Appeal on the following grounds: (i) that the judge misdirected himself on a matter of law by determining the issue of whether the defendant bank had acted without negligence by considering matters and events which occurred after the act of conversion by the bank on Jan. 25, 1967. In particular, he should have determined the issue by disregarding any evidence which related to the taking up of a reference by the defendant bank on Jan. 26, 1967. (ii) that the judge misdirected himself on a matter of law by accepting uncritically the defendant bank's evidence about their own particular banking practice in the opening of new accounts as the sole criterion of whether the defendant bank had acted without negligence. In the absence of independent expert evidence, the judge should have himself determined the issue of negligence by a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. (iii) that the judge failed to attach proper significance to the fact that the defendant bank had ordered special collection of the cheque on Jan. 25, 1967, without having received a request from their customer so to do. The plaintiff company submitted that the proper and reasonable inference to be drawn from the fact of special collection was that the suspicions of the officials of the defendant bank were aroused about the integrity of their new customer but, in ordering special collection of the cheque, the defendant bank were ignoring the interests of the true owner of the cheque. (iv) that the judge ought to have found negligence on the part of the defendant bank. The plaintiff company contended that, in failing to do so, the judge failed to consider the significance and relevance of the following facts:—(a) that at the time of conversion the defendant bank had taken no or no adequate steps to satisfy themselves as to the identity of the new customer; (b) that at the time of conversion the defendant bank had failed to make elementary enquiries from their customer with regard to his background, domicile, income, existing and past occupation, and prior banking transactions; (c) that at the time of conversion the defendant bank had failed to obtain any references about their new customer; (d) the amount for which the cheque was drawn, its date, the similarity between the writing on the cheque and paying slip; (v) E F G H I

- A that the judge in determining whether or not the defendant bank had acted without negligence, failed to pay regard to the cumulative effect of the defendant bank's conduct in the matters listed, but considered each allegation of negligence in isolation. (vi) that if the judge was entitled to consider the manner in which the defendant bank took up a reference on Jan. 26, 1967, he should have held that the defendant bank failed to make proper and prudent enquiries from the referee who was interviewed by their manager and failed to ensure that a second reference was obtained and/or failed to attach significance to the fact that no reference was forthcoming from the second referee nominated by their new customer. (vii) that the judge misdirected himself in law by considering whether the taking of precautions by the defendant bank would have proved to be fruitless.

DIPLOCK, L.J., delivered the first judgment at the invitation of DANCKWERTS, L.J.: By an ingenious and elaborate fraud, one Kureshy, the plaintiff company's employee, obtained payment to himself of a cheque for £3,000 drawn by the plaintiff company on the Bank of India in favour of a firm called Eliaszade as payee. The cheque was crossed. To carry out his scheme, Kureshy needed a bank account. He opened one with the defendant bank in the name of Eliaszade, and handed the cheque to them for collection. They presented it for payment to the Bank of India and received payment of it which they credited to the account of Eliaszade, out of which Kureshy drew nearly all of the sum of £3,000 so credited.

The facts are set out with clarity and in detail in the judge's judgment, and are now reported in the All England Law Reports (1). This makes it unnecessary for me to repeat them. I would only add that Kureshy's scheme was very carefully prepared. Well in advance of the actual drawing of the cheque which he fraudulently converted, he had already taken steps to establish a false identity as Eliaszade with Mr. Ali, whom he planned to use as his introducer to the defendant bank, who were Ali's bankers. After the cheque had been drawn, but before visiting the bank, he took the precaution on the day of the departure of the managing director of his employer (the plaintiff company) of making a false entry in the postage book of the plaintiff company to make it appear that the cheque had been posted to the payee, the real Eliaszade, in London. He would have been the only person in the office of the plaintiff company in a position to answer any inquiries about the cheque, had any been made. This was a cunning calculating rogue.

It may seem odd that in the 1960s the liability of the defendant bank for the part which they were deceived into playing in this transaction should be affected by the series of legal fictions by use of which the lawyers of the sixteenth century evolved from the ancient real action of detinue sur trover a personal action on the case of trover which, with the abolition of forms of action, became the modern tort of conversion. It may also seem odd that the basis of their liability is that the piece of paper on which the cheque was written was "goods" belonging to the plaintiff company, and that the defendant bank's acts in accepting possession of that piece of paper from Kureshy, in presenting it to the Bank of India and accepting payment of it, constituted an unjustifiable denial by them of the plaintiff company's title to its goods, from which damage flowed. Such, however, is the common law of England, and one of the consequences of the historic origin of the tort of conversion and its application to negotiable instruments as "goods" is that the tort at common law is one of strict liability in which the moral concept of fault in the sense of either knowledge by the doer of an act that is likely to cause injury, loss or damage to another, or lack of reasonable care to avoid causing injury, loss or damage to another, plays no part.

(1) [1967] 3 All E.R. 967 at pp. 968-970.

At common law one's duty to one's neighbour who is the owner, or entitled to possession, of any goods is to refrain from doing any voluntary act in relation to his goods which is a usurpation of his proprietary or possessory rights in them. Subject to some exceptions which are irrelevant for the purposes of the present case, it matters not that the doer of the act of usurpation did not know, and could not by the exercise of any reasonable care have known, of his neighbour's interest in the goods. This duty is absolute; he acts at his peril.

A banker's business, of its very nature, exposes him daily to this peril. His contract with his customer requires him to accept possession of cheques delivered to him by his customer, to present them for payment to the banks on which the cheques are drawn, to receive payment of them and to credit the amount thereof to his own customer's account, either on receipt of the cheques themselves from the customer, or on receipt of actual payment of the cheques from the banks on which they are drawn. If the customer is not entitled to the cheque which he delivers to his banker for collection, the banker, however, innocent and careful he might have been, would at common law be liable to the true owner of the cheque for the amount of which he receives payment, either as damages for conversion or under the cognate cause of action, based historically on assumpsit, for money had and received.

So strict a liability, so absolute a duty, on bankers would have discouraged the development of banking business. It was accordingly progressively mitigated by statute, first by s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, then by the Bills of Exchange (Crossed Cheques) Act, 1906, and finally by s. 4 of the Cheques Act, 1957, which is the current statute with which we are concerned, and sub-s. (1) of which reads as follows:

"(1) Where a banker, in good faith and without negligence—(a) receives payment for a customer of an instrument to which this section applies; or (b) having credited a customer's account with the amount of such an instrument, receives payment thereof for himself, and the customer has no title, or a defective title, to the instrument, the banker does not incur any liability to the true owner of the instrument by reason only of having received payment thereof."

Subsection (2) provides that the section applies inter alia to cheques.

A pettifogger might be tempted to thwart the obvious intention of Parliament by treating the immunity of the banker as limited to actions based on the receipt of payment as constituting the only act of conversion, or as the cause of action for money had and received; and, had the matter first come before the courts in the heyday of literal interpretation, it might well have been so construed. Fortunately, however, the interpretation of s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, was exposed to the robust common sense of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Capital & Counties Bank, Ltd. v. Gordon (2), where he construed the section as extending the immunity "to cover every step taken in the ordinary course of business, and intended to lead up to that result", i.e., the receipt of payment of the cheque.

A purist might also comment (and some have) about the use of the expression "negligence", a term of art appropriate to a cause of action different in its legal characteristics from that of conversion or money had and received in respect of which the qualified immunity is conferred. It is, however, in my view, clear that the intention of the subsection and its statutory predecessors is to substitute for the absolute duty owed at common law by a banker to the true owner of a cheque not to take any steps in the ordinary course of business leading up to and including the receipt of payment of the cheque, and the crediting of the amount of the cheque to the account of his customer, in usurpation of the true owner's title thereto, a qualified duty to take reasonable care

A to refrain from taking any such step which he foresees, or ought reasonably to have foreseen, was likely to cause loss or damage to the true owner.

The only respect in which this substituted statutory duty differs from a common law cause of action in negligence is that, since it takes the form of a qualified immunity from a strict liability at common law, the onus of showing that he did take such reasonable care lies on the defendant banker. Granted good faith in B the banker (the other condition of the immunity) the usual matter with respect to which the banker must take reasonable care is to satisfy himself that his own customer's title to the cheque delivered to him for collection is not defective, i.e., that no other person is the true owner of it. Where the customer is in possession of the cheque at the time of delivery for collection, and appears on the face of it to be the "holder", i.e., the payee or indorsee or the bearer, the banker C is, in my view, entitled to assume that the customer is the owner of the cheque unless there are facts which are known, or ought to be known, to the banker which would cause a reasonable banker to suspect that the customer is not the true owner.

What facts ought to be known to the banker, i.e., what inquiries he should make, and what facts are sufficient to cause him reasonably to suspect that the D customer is not the true owner, must depend on current banking practice, and change as that practice changes. Cases decided thirty years ago, when the use by the general public of banking facilities was much less widespread, may not be a reliable guide to what the duty of a careful banker, in relation to inquiries and as to facts which should give rise to suspicion, is today.

The duty of care owed by the banker to the true owner of the cheque does E not arise until the cheque is delivered to him by his customer. It is then, and then only, that any duty to make inquiries can arise. Any antecedent inquiries that he has made are relevant only in so far as they have already brought to his knowledge facts which a careful banker ought to ascertain about his customers before accepting for collection the cheque which is the subject-matter of the action, and so have relieved him of any need to ascertain them again when the F cheque which is the subject-matter of the action is delivered to him. What the court has to do is to look at all the circumstances at the time of the acts complained of, and to ask itself were those circumstances such as would cause a reasonable banker possessed of such information about his customer as a reasonable banker would possess, to suspect that his customer was not the true owner of the cheque.

G Counsel for the plaintiff company has, not unnaturally, sought to divide the duty of care in the present case into two separate duties, viz., first a duty to make inquiries of and about Kureshy himself before accepting him as a customer; secondly, a duty to investigate more fully the reference given them by Mr. Ali when the account had been opened. He also contends that the defendant bank should have had their suspicions aroused by the cheque itself and the H circumstances in which it was delivered for collection by Kureshy. This occurred before the reference was given.

It is conceded that the information that the defendant bank had obtained from Kureshy himself when he opened the account on Jan. 24, was insufficient to justify their assuming, without further inquiry, that Kureshy was an honest and trustworthy man, though there was nothing in it to arouse suspicion that he I was not. They would not on that information have been prepared to let him draw on his account without further inquiry unless they had received a reference from a source which they regarded as so reliable that the quality of the reference might be taken as dispensing with the need for further inquiry. The reference given by Mr. Ali on Jan. 26 they regarded as fulfilling this requirement; but, as counsel for the plaintiff company points out (and this is why he seeks to separate the duties), even assuming that the obtaining of this reference would have been sufficient to comply with their duty of care, it was in fact given after the defendant bank had received payment of the cheque, and the conversion of it by the bank was in law complete. Counsel concedes (as I think that he must) that had the reference been given immediately before the bank received payment of the cheque, instead of shortly after, this court would have been bound to take into consideration the reference as well as the information previously obtained from Kureshy in determining whether the defendant bank had fulfilled their duty of taking reasonable care to satisfy themselves that their customer's title to the cheque was not defective; but he contends that any precautions that they took after they themselves had received payment of the cheque from the drawee bank are irrelevant even though taken before they permitted their customer to draw on his account. I think that this is much too technical an effect to give to a statute which was intended to apply to business transactions as they are carried on in real life."

In all actions of the kind with which we are here concerned, the banker's customer has in fact turned out to be a fraudulent rogue, and attention is naturally concentrated on the duty of care which was owed by the banker to the person who has in fact turned out to be the true owner of the cheque. We are always able to be wise after the event, but the banker's duty fell to be performed before it, and the duty which he owed to the true owner ought not to be considered in isolation. At the relevant time the banker was entitled to take into consideration the interests of his customer who, be it remembered, would in all probability turn out to be honest, as most men are, and his own business interests, and to weigh these against the risk of loss or damage to the true owner of the cheque in the unlikely event that he should turn out not to be the customer himself.

What then is the risk of loss or damage to a possible true owner of the cheque if the banker receives payment of it, but does not part with the money to his customer pending completion of all reasonable steps to verify that his customer is entitled to it? One must assume, of course, that those inquiries may disclose that someone other than the customer is in fact the true owner. If they do, the amount received by the banker in payment of the cheque is held to the use of the true owner, and is recoverable from the banker by him under the equitable rules of following money. This right is independent of any liability by the banker for conversion or under the statute, and continues until the time that the banker allows his customer to use the money. What reasonably foreseeable loss will the true owner have sustained because the banker holds the money to his use instead of its being held on his account by another banker on whom the cheque was drawn? Usually the true owner is not the drawer, but is the payee or indorsee of the cheque or the bearer thereof. He, it is true, is kept out of his money, not because the banker has received payment, but because the owner is not in possession of the cheque. In the less usual case of which the present one is an example, where the true owner is the drawer, his credit with the payee bank is reduced by the amount of the payment, but it would in any event have been reduced by the payment of the cheque to the intended payee, and the drawer, too, in this case can follow the money into the new banker's hands. It is true that the drawer has not settled his indebtedness to the intended payee, but this is not because the banker has received payment but because the intended payee has not obtained possession of the cheque.

While it may be possible to imagine cases where receipt of payment by the banker, as distinct from payment out by him to his customer, might cause damage to the true owner, this possibility seems to me to be so minimal that the banker is entitled to ignore it, if it would be in the interest of his customer, if he prove to be in fact the true owner, that payment should be obtained. From the practical point of view of foreseeable loss to the true owner, it seems to me to make no difference whether the banker has received payment of the cheque or not, so long as he retains the payment in his own hands and it is capable of being followed and recovered from him by the true owner. The relevant time for determining whether the banker has complied with his duty of care towards

A the true owner of the cheque is, in my opinion, the time at which the banker pays out the proceeds of the cheque to his own customer, and so deprives the true owner of his right to follow the money into the banker's hands.

The question in this case, therefore, is whether the defendant bank have proved that by Feb. 2, when they started to pay out the proceeds of the cheque to Kureshy, they had taken all reasonable care to ascertain that he was the true owner of the cheque. This is to be judged by the practice of careful bankers. The only evidence of the practice of bankers was given by the manager and securities clerk of the branch of the defendant bank. No evidence that the general practice of other bankers differed from that adopted by the defendant bank was called by the plaintiff company, although they knew well in advance of the trial, as a result of searching interrogatories, exactly what steps the defendant bank had taken, and what inquiries they had made. It seems a reasonable inference that what the defendant bank did in the present case was in accordance with current banking practice. The judge accepted that it was, and counsel for the plaintiff company has not sought to argue the contrary. What he contends is that this court is entitled to examine that practice, and to form its own opinion whether it does comply with the standard of care which a prudent banker should adopt. This is quite right, but I venture to think that this court should be hesitant before condemning as negligent a practice generally adopted by those engaged in banking business.

Counsel for the plaintiff company has developed before this court the same criticisms of the defendants' conduct, both as to the inquiries made of Kureshy and the reference given by Mr. Ali, as were developed before the judge and dealt with in his judgment. This relieves me of the necessity to discuss them in detail. Suffice it to say, as respects the inquiries made of Kureshy, he submits that the defendant bank, before opening the account, ought to have required Kureshy to produce some document to identify himself, ought to have inquired the name of his previous employer (he had told them that he was not employed) and about previous banking accounts held by him.

F The defendant bank's answer was that they regarded a trustworthy reference as more reliable than inquiries made of the customer himself. It is to be borne in mind that, whatever inquiries it might be prudent for the bank to make for their own purposes, the only inquiries which they were under any duty to the plaintiff company to make were inquiries directed to discovering whether their new customer might use the account for the fraudulent purpose of cashing G cheques belonging to other people. The purpose of such inquiries would be to find out (a) whether the customer was a fraudulent rogue, and if so (b) whether he would be likely to have opportunities of dishonestly obtaining other people's cheques, and in particular those of the plaintiff company. As a matter of common sense, a person who is opening a bank account for a dishonest purpose is unlikely himself wittingly to give any information calculated to disclose his dishonest H purpose. He will be prepared with appropriate answers to lull suspicion. It may be that a searching interrogation would reveal inconsistencies or improbabilities in his story, but a bank cannot reasonably be expected to subject all prospective customers to a cross-examination, which cannot fail to give the impression that the bank doubts their honesty, and which would be understandably resented by the 999 honest potential customers, on the off chance of detecting I the thousandth dishonest one. If there is some other independent and apparently trustworthy source from which the honesty of the potential customer may be verified, to rely on this source of information is not only less likely to damage the bank's own business by driving away honest customers than interrogation of the customer himself, but is also more likely to result in the successful detection of the occasional dishonest one.

Counsel for the plaintiff company placed great reliance on the speech of Lord WRIGHT in Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. E. B. Savory & Co. (3) as authority for the proposition that it is the duty of a banker, when opening a new account, to ascertain the name of the customer's or customer's spouse's employers, in addition to obtaining suitable references. LORD WRIGHT went further than the other members of the three to two majority, LORD BUCKMASTER and LORD WARRINGTON, both of whom considered that such inquiries might be dispensed with if an apparently reliable and trustworthy reference were obtained. That case, as all other cases, depended on its own particular facts. The frauds had gone on for a very long time. There were many other matters calculated to arouse suspicion in the social conditions of the 1920s. It was decided on expert evidence, not of what is now current banking practice, but of what it was nearly forty years ago. I find in it no more than an illustration of the application of the general principle that a banker must exercise reasonable care in all the circumstances of the case.

Counsel for the defendant bank argued that, in any event, on the facts now known to us, none of the proposed inquiries would have resulted in any suspicion of Kureshy's honesty. He had prepared his scheme too well. Failure to make them was not causative of the loss. There are dicta, which can be found collected in Baker v. Barclays Bank, Ltd. (4), which suggest that, even if it could be proved that a failure to make a particular inquiry which a prudent banker would have made, had no causative effect on the loss sustained by the true owner, the banker would, nevertheless, be disentitled to the protection of s. 4 of the Cheques Act, 1957. For my part I think that these dicta are wrong; but it is obviously difficult to prove so speculative a proposition as what would have happened if inquiries had been made which were not made, and I do not think that the defendant bank has sustained the onus of proving it here. I prefer to put it in the alternative way which I have already indicated. It does not constitute any lack of reasonable care to refrain from making inquiries which it is improbable will lead to detection of the potential customer's dishonest purpose, if he is dishonest, and which are calculated to offend him and maybe drive away his custom if he is honest.

I turn next to the criticisms of the defendant bank's acceptance of Mr. Ali's reference. We must resist the temptation of hindsight. We know now (as the defendant bank did not) that Mr. Ali's knowledge of Kureshy was brief and scanty. He was in no position conscientiously to vouch for Kureshy's trustworthiness, or even his identity. Were the defendant bank acting prudently in relying on what Mr. Ali told them about their new customer who called himself Eliaszade? Their new customer was a Pakistani, a close community who in England keep themselves to themselves. The most reliable source of information about him would be likely to be a fellow Pakistani whom the defendant bank could reasonably regard as trustworthy. Mr. Ali was a Pakistani of substance, a restaurateur and thus likely to know about other Pakistanis in the same line of business. He had been a valued customer of the defendant bank for some six years. He had introduced a number of other Pakistanis as customers, and all of these had proved satisfactory. The bank had no reason to doubt Mr. Ali's honesty, conscientiousness or candour, or to suppose that he would vouch for the trustworthiness of a customer unless he had reasonable grounds for doing so. I do not think that there was any lack of reasonable care on the part of the defendant bank in accepting and acting on Mr. Ali's reference. It is to be noted that what he said about Eliaszade confirmed what Kureshy had said about himself two days before. There was no inconsistency between them.

The only criticism which has given me trouble is that, on being told by Mr. Ali that he had known Eliaszade "for some time", the bank manager did not ask Ali how long he had known him. We know now that had that inquiry been made and answered truthfully, it would have disclosed that Mr. Ali was in no position to vouch for Eliaszade's trustworthiness, and the bank would have been under a duty to make further inquiries before allowing this new customer to draw on

A his account; but this again is hindsight. The real question is: given their knowledge of Mr. Ali as a valued customer, and their experience of him as a reliable referee for Pakistani customers, ought his use of the imprecise expression "some time" to have aroused their suspicion that his knowledge of Eliaszade might be insufficient to enable him to express a reliable view of Eliaszade's trustworthiness? Should it have led them to inquire further as to the facts on which that knowledge was based? This, I think, was very much a matter for the judge, who saw and heard Mr. Ali as well as the bank witnesses. I agree with his conclusion (5) that the defendant bank, in acting without further probing on the information given to them by Mr. Ali as to their customer's trustworthiness, were not in breach of their duty to the plaintiff company to take reasonable care in relation to the plaintiff company's cheque which Kureshy had delivered to them for collection.

Counsel for the plaintiff company has made a number of other criticisms of the defendant bank's actions, in particular in relation to their obtaining special clearance of the cheque. They are all dealt with in the judgment appealed from. The significance of the special clearance depends on the judge's assessment of the credibility of the bank officials who gave evidence. I see no ground which would justify us in differing from his conclusions on these or any of the matters which I have dealt with at greater length. I would dismiss the appeal.

CAIRNS, J.: I have found this a difficult case. On Jan. 24, 1966, a man, who was in fact Kureshy, a fraudulent servant of the plaintiff company, presented himself at the Rusholme branch of the defendant bank and asked to open an account. He gave his name as Sheik Eliaszade, and said that he was thinking of going into business as a restaurateur. He gave an address in Manley Road, Whalley Range, Manchester 16, and gave the names of two referees, Mr. Ali, a restaurateur in Manchester, and Mr. Syeed, a restaurateur at Bolton. He was allowed to open an account and paid in £80. The next day he paid in a further £35 9s. 6d. in cash, and the plaintiff's cheque for £3,000 made out in favour of Eliaszade. On that day the defendant bank wrote to the two referees telling each of them that Sheik Eliaszade of 61, Manley Road, Whalley Range, Manchester, had given his name as a referee, and asking whether that gentleman might be considered trustworthy and likely to prove a satisfactory customer of the bank. Also on Jan. 25 the defendant bank had the £3,000 cheque specially cleared, and apparently received the proceeds on Jan. 26. On that day Mr. Ali came to the bank on business of his own, and after transacting it told the manager that he had received the inquiry about Eliaszade. He said that he had known Eliaszade "for some time"; he believed that he intended starting a restaurant business, and in his (Mr. Ali's) view he was considered all right for the conduct of a bank account. Mr. Syeed never replied to the defendant bank's letter. The bank manager was satisfied with the reference from Mr. Ali, and allowed the customer to draw on his account. Within a few days he drew out £1,580. He then drew a cheque for £1,975, which exceeded his credit balance, and was not met. The manager wrote to him on Feb. 3, addressing the letter to 59, Manley Road, asking him to remit funds to meet this cheque. He apparently received this letter because within two days he drew a cheque in favour of the same payee for £1,450. This was met, and the credit balance remaining in the account was thereby reduced to £85 4s. 6d.

The issue is whether the defendant bank received payment of the proceeds of the cheque for their customer without negligence. It is common ground that the onus of proving that they were not negligent in a material respect rests on the defendant bank, and that to establish this they have to show that they acted with reasonable care in all material respects in opening the account and clearing the cheque. There is an issue what would constitute negligence in a material respect. I think that the rival contentions may be summarised by saying that the plaintiff company argues that the failure to take any precaution which a reasonable banker would have taken for the protection of their interests would make the defendant bank liable to it, whereas the defendant bank argue that they are liable only if there was a failure to take a precaution which, if taken, would probably in all the circumstances have been effective. A

There are dicta by GREER, L.J., in the Court of Appeal and LORD WRIGHT in the House of Lords in Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. E. B. Savory & Co. (6), which bear on this question. GREER, L.J., said (7): B

"It is, I think, also true to say that a banker who has not exercised reasonable care cannot claim the benefit of the section, even though it may seem probable that the exercise of care would not have enabled him to discover the defective title of his customer. The protection is given to careful bankers, and any banker who does not exercise reasonable care is outside the section altogether, even though he may be able to say: 'If I had exercised care, the fraud would not have been discovered'." C

LORD WRIGHT in the House of Lords said (8):

"Nor is it any answer to a charge under s. 82 of neglecting a proper precaution, that if it had been taken, it might have been fruitless. Nor does a precaution cease to be proper for the purposes of s. 82 merely because though generally effective it may in special circumstances be ineffectual." D

It is evident that in Baker v. Barclays Bank, Ltd. (9) DEVLIN, J., considered that these expressions might go too far, because he said (10):

"I do not think that in this case I need go as far as to hold that every failure to make proper inquiries, whether or not they appear to be material, is fatal to a defence under s. 82. It is not necessary that I should hold that such carelessness is fatal even if the bank can show affirmatively that the failure was immaterial. In my judgment, however, if a bank manager fails to make inquiries which he should have made, there is, at the very least, a heavy burden on him to show that such inquiries could not have led to any action which could have protected the interests of the true owner." E

In those circumstances, and having heard the views expressed by DIPLOCK, L.J., I am emboldened to say that in my view both GREER, L.J., and LORD WRIGHT stated the view more unfavourably to the banker than can be justified in principle. If, for example, it were found that on opening an account the bank official had failed to ask the prospective customer for his address, this would plainly be the omission of a proper precaution. If, however, it were shown that on the following day the customer had voluntarily disclosed a perfectly genuine and respectable address to the bank, it seems to me that it would be impossible to hold that the bank had forfeited the protection of the section by the initial piece of carelessness. In my opinion, if the bank can show that in all probability a particular precaution would have been unavailing, the failure to take that precaution is not such negligence as deprives them of the protection. The burden of proof on the bank is no doubt heavy, but I do not think that it can be so heavy as to require them to prove with certainty that the precaution would have been useless. F

Approaching the matter in this way, it appears to me that there are four respects in which the defendant bank might be held to have been careless. They took no steps to establish the customer's identity; they made no inquiry as to his previous occupation; they were content with a single reference expressed in quite general terms, and they had the cheque cleared before they had any reference at all. I have felt great doubt whether the defendant bank have discharged G

(10) [1955] 2 All E.R. at p. 584. H

A the onus which lies on them in regard to these matters, but in the end I have reached the conclusion that they have discharged it.

My reasons are as follows. The evidence of the bank manager was to the effect that the steps taken were in accordance with the general practice of the defendant bank. In the absence of any evidence of different practices among bankers generally, I think that the judge was entitled to find (as he did) that B normal banking practice was followed. This is not conclusive in favour of the bank (see Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. E. B. Savory & Co. (11)), but it is a matter to be taken into account in deciding whether they were negligent.

For the purpose of establishing identity, it might be thought desirable that some such document as a passport or a driving licence should be asked for; but there is no hint in any of the decided cases of any such means of identification C being considered necessary. If an apparently respectable referee, well known to the bank, identified the customer as a person known to him by the name which he claimed to be his, I cannot think that any further inquiry as to his identity would be necessary. If then the bank manager in this case had asked the customer to come to the bank with Mr. Ali in order to be identified by him as Eliaszade, this would in my view have amply fulfilled any duties that they D had in this respect. If they had done so, however, there can be no doubt that Ali would have said that the customer was indeed Eliaszade, and, therefore, the omission of this precaution had no effect.

As to the customer's previous occupation, the evidence was that he was asked if he was in employment, and that he said he was not employed. It is clear from Lloyds Bank, Ltd. v. E. B. Savory & Co. (11) that, if it had appeared E that he was employed, the bank official should have gone on to inquire by whom and in what capacity he was employed. Once, however, the man stated that he was not employed (there being nothing to suggest that this statement was untrue), I cannot think that it was incumbent on the bank officer to cross-examine him in order to determine whether he was lying, nor to inquire whether he had formerly been in employment or in business, or whence he had acquired F the money to enable him to set up as a restaurateur; that would be acting as an amateur detective, which it has been said more than once that a bank officer is not required to do.

Next as to references. In the absence of any evidence that it is usual for a bank to require more than one reference, I think that it would be impossible to lay down that two ought to be required. It is true that in this case two G references were called for, and only one was given; but it was adequately explained that the failure of a Pakistani to reply to a letter asking for a reference is not an unusual event, and one which would excite no suspicion. I was at one time disposed to think that the reference given by Ali was in such general terms, without any indication of how long Ali had known the man, or what dealings he had had with him, that it ought not to have been considered sufficient. Mr. Ali, H however, was regarded with justification by the bank as a reliable person whose word could be trusted. When he said that Eliaszade was "all right for the conduct of a bank account", I think that on the whole the bank manager was entitled to assume that this statement would not be made without the knowledge to justify it.

Finally, as to the clearing of the cheque before any reference was received, in I the events which happened the clearance of the cheque at this stage rather than twenty-four hours later, after the reference had been received, made no difference to anyone. For that reason, and the other reasons given by DIPLOCK, L.J., in relation to the early clearance of the cheque, I do not think that that is a factor which enables the plaintiff company to succeed against the defendant bank.

I wish to add this. It may be that competition between banks for customers tempts them to relax to some extent precautions taken on opening a new account. We have heard that former decisions of the courts adverse to banks have had the effect of causing them to tighten their rules about the inquiries to be made when an account is opened. I should be sorry if the effect of our decision in this case were to encourage any loosening of those rules. If the defendant bank here exercised sufficient care, it was in my view only just sufficient. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. A B

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: I agree. In my opinion the arguments which have been put forward on behalf of the plaintiff company do not give proper weight to the facts of this case. Here was a cheque, true for a substantial sum of £3,000, but drawn in favour of "Eliaszade". Kureshy had established himself with Mr. Ali as Eliaszade, and none of the participants in the transaction knew him as anyone else. He was, therefore, accepted as the payee, and there was no suspicion that he was other than the payee. He was asked, when he sought to open the account, for references as to his character. Mr. Ali had been prepared by Kureshy as such a reference and, indeed, appears to have acted in good faith in the reference which he gave. Nobody had any reason to suspect that Kureshy was anyone but Eliaszade. Mr. Ali willingly gave him a reference, and he being well known to the defendant bank as a reputable customer who had introduced other Pakistani customers, the defendant bank accepted his statement that he had known the person in question for "some time", that he regarded him as all right for the conduct of a bank account, and that he believed that he intended starting a restaurant. All this fitted in with the possession by the person who was supposed to be Eliaszade of the cheque, and his desire to open an account at the defendant bank. I am unable to see anything to suggest that the man was not Eliaszade, and in that case why should the defendant bank make further inquiries? They were dealing with a well dressed man of acceptable appearance known to a customer of the bank, and I cannot see why suspicion should have been aroused in the officers of the bank. C D E

The circumstances of this case seem to me to be quite different from those of the reported cases to which we were referred. In my opinion the bank were not negligent, and are protected by s. 4 of the Cheques Act, 1957. I also would dismiss the appeal. F

On Oct. 20, 1967, at the end of the first trial of the appellant on a charge of robbery, the jury returned to court after an hour and a quarter's deliberation, the foreman informing the trial judge that they were at a deadlock. ### Appeal.

jury trying the appellant (on a charge of robbery with another person of one Krishna Murty of £12, a wallet and a quantity of documents) without giving them an opportunity of returning a majority verdict. At the new trial on Oct. 27, 1967, at the same court before Mr. Commissioner HUMPHREYS, Q.C., and a jury the appellant, Peter Elia, was convicted of the robbery offence by a majority of eleven to one and sentenced to 2½ years' imprisonment. The case is reported on the question whether the discharge of a jury at the first trial rendered the re-trial a nullity, having regard to the provisions of s. 13 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and the Practice Direction* on majority verdicts made by the Court of Appeal (criminal division) on July 31, 1967. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

The authority and cases noted below† were cited during the argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment of the court.

Apr. 3. DAVIES, L.J., read the following judgment of the court: This appeal is brought by leave of the single judge against a conviction at the Central Criminal Court on Oct. 27, 1967, for robbery with aggravation, for which offence the appellant was sentenced by Mr. Commissioner HUMPHREYS, Q.C., to 2½ years' imprisonment. The trial was a re-trial in circumstances which will appear later, and the verdict was by a majority of eleven to one. The appeal was heard in this court on Mar. 12, 1968, when it was dismissed, and the court reserved the giving of its reasons for the dismissal.

The facts of the case, according to the prosecution, were within a narrow compass. In the late evening of Sept. 18, 1967, an Indian, one Krishna Murty, fell into conversation in a public house in the West End of London with two men, one of whom he positively identified as the appellant. They chatted together in a well-lit bar for some fifteen minutes, during which time Mr. Murty produced his wallet in order to pay for a drink or drinks. At closing time he left to walk to Tottenham Court Road Station and the two men accompanied him. When they reached Soho Square, they inveigled him into a mews by some pretext and there attacked him, half strangled him and left him unconscious. When he recovered consciousness, his wallet, which had contained about £12, had, of course, gone. On the following evening he returned to the West End to search for his attackers. He went into Lyons Corner House and there saw and recognised the appellant. He telephoned the police who came and arrested the appellant. Mr. Murty was at all times quite positive in his identification of the appellant and in addition he said that he recognised the appellant's voice, presumably at the previous trial. The appellant, when questioned by the police, at all times asserted his innocence. He told them that he had spent the evening with a girl called June whom he had arranged to meet again but at no particular place. In evidence he said that he had also met a girl called Margaret and two men whom he named, and that June was going to write to him at the address of a mutual friend called Yianos which he (the appellant) did not know. The police evidence, however, was that he told them none of this.

In support of the appeal, four points are taken, three of which can be dealt with fairly shortly. [His LORDSHIP then discussed the three points, intimated that the submission on behalf of the appellant regarding these failed and continued:] There remains counsel for the appellant's point under s. 13 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, and the Practice Direction (1) dated July 31, 1967.

(1) [1967] 3 All E.R. 137.

A On Oct. 20, 1967, at the end of the first trial before JUDGE ROGERS, the jury returned into court at 4 p.m., when the following took place:

"JUDGE ROGERS: I understand, Mr. Foreman, that you are unable to reach agreement. The foreman of the jury: That is so, my lord. JUDGE ROGERS: Do you think any useful purpose would be served by further deliberation? You have been out now for one and a quarter hours. The foreman of the jury: We are of the opinion that no useful purpose would be served. We are at a deadlock. JUDGE ROGERS: In that case, it is a perfectly straightforward and simple case and not a case that would be helped by prolonged argument. Some of you obviously feel one way and some another and I don't think it right to press you any further. You have your conscientious views, and I don't think it right in a case of this sort to press you. So I will discharge you from giving a verdict in this matter and there will have to be a new trial."

The jury were discharged. It is submitted on behalf of the appellant that in view of the provisions of s. 13 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 and the terms of the Practice Direction (2) the judge had no right to discharge the jury at that stage and that in consequence the appellant could not be tried again before another jury. Section 13 provides as follows:

"(1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, the verdict of a jury in criminal proceedings need not be unanimous if—

"(a) in a case where there are not less than eleven jurors, ten of them agree on the verdict; and

"(b) in a case where there are ten jurors, nine of them agree on the verdict; and a verdict authorised by this subsection is hereafter in this section referred to as 'a majority verdict'.

"(2) A court shall not accept a majority verdict of guilty unless the foreman of the jury has stated in open court the number of jurors who respectively agreed to and dissented from the verdict.

"(3) A court shall not accept a majority verdict unless it appears to the court that the jury have had not less than two hours for deliberation or such longer period as the court thinks reasonable having regard to the nature and complexity of the case."

It is not necessary to set out the terms of the Practice Direction (2) which are well known and are to be found in the 5th Supplement to ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE (36th Edn.), para. 573A; but in view of the nature of the argument it is perhaps as well to observe that in that direction the first sentence of the model or specimen passage to be used at the end of the main summing-up is (3): "As you may know, the law permits me in certain circumstances to accept a verdict which is not the verdict of you all."

It is argued for the appellant that the terms of s. 13 are mandatory and that the procedure contemplated by sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) and laid down by the Practice Direction (2), though that admittedly has no statutory force, must be followed in every case. The statute, it is said, has in this respect trenched on the well-recognised power of a judge to discharge a jury for good cause. On the other hand it is argued for the Crown that the language of the section is most inapt for a mandatory or compulsory provision. Stress is laid on the words in sub-s. (1), "the verdict . . . need not be unanimous". It is said, moreover, that if the section is mandatory, one would expect in sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (3) instead of the words, "A court shall not accept . . . unless", the words, "A court shall accept . . . if . . ." For what it is worth, there is also the word "permits" in the specimen direction in the Practice Direction (3) referred to above. The Crown go so far as to submit that in a case of importance and difficulty where the issue is nicely balanced the judge could say that he would refuse to accept a majority verdict and could insist on unanimity or nothing. That point does not arise in this case, and we express no opinion on it. A

The correct interpretation of the section, coupled with the Practice Direction (4), is not easy. On the whole, we incline to the view that it is not mandatory in the sense that in every case and in all circumstances the contemplated procedure must be followed. The words of the section, do, in our view, fall short of enacting that in every case a majority verdict must in the last resort be invited. In the great majority of cases, no doubt, the contemplated procedure ought to be followed. If, for example, however, a jury were to return and inform the court that they were hopelessly and helplessly divided, it would seem quite idle to make them wait for the full two hours only to announce that they were unable to reach a verdict by the necessary majority. The argument that, as the result of the event that happened at the end of the first trial in the case, the appellant lost the chance of a majority acquittal is of little weight in view of the fact that he also lost the chance of a majority conviction. B

Even if the view indicated above be wrong and the judge was in error in discharging the jury, the decisive point in this case, in the view of the court, is that such an error on the part of the judge was no bar to the appellant being tried before another jury. Counsel for the appellant very properly put before the court authorities which, in our view, are conclusive on this point. R. v. Lewis (5), was a case where, after a trial had started, the jury were discharged owing to the absence of some of the witnesses for the prosecution. In the course of giving the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal, CHANNELL, J., said (6): C

"...the rule as to autrefois acquit and autrefois convict cannot be urged here because the appellant was never in peril on Apr. 20 (7). The established law to the effect that the discharging of the jury is in the discretion of the judge, and that his exercise of the discretion is not subject to review, is not affected by the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, and therefore we have no jurisdiction to deal with it. However, although we cannot say it judicially, we would like to intimate that the judge's discretion in this case appears, if we rightly understand the facts, to have been exercised in a way different from that in which it has been our individual practice to exercise it. A jury should not be discharged in order to allow the prosecution to present a stronger case on another trial. That is the rule on which judges have acted and on which we ought to act, but we have no jurisdiction to deal with this matter." D

So there was a case where the court was of opinion that the judge was wrong to discharge the jury but nevertheless held that they could not interfere. It is suggested by counsel for the appellant that the present case is different, since he says that the discharge was in breach of the statute; but even so, the appellant was not in peril at the first trial. He could not, therefore, plead autrefois acquit or autrefois convict, and there was no ground on which he could move to quash. E

Two cases of respectable antiquity and high authority were cited in R. v. Lewis (8) which are most relevant to the present question. The first was R. v. Charlesworth (9), a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. In that case SIR ALEXANDER COCKBURN, C.J., said (10): F

- A "Assuming that the judge had not this power (11) or that he exercised it improperly, the question is, whether what he has done amounts to the acquittal of the defendant, and entitles him to have judgment entered up as if he had been acquitted. On this I can add nothing to the conclusive reasoning of CRAMPTON, J., in Conway and Lynch v. Reginam (12) on which so much observation has been made. There is no instance of such a plea as this, except in this case and that. It may be said with truth that may be because, since the practice established in the time of LORD HOLT, juries have not been discharged, and therefore the occasion for such a plea has not presented itself. On the other hand, the only pleas known to the law of England to stay a man from being tried on an indictment or information (and we must consider this as if it was a fresh information, and the defendant had pleaded to it the facts stated on the record) are the pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict, and it is clear that this statement of facts amounts to neither. It is said that a man is not to be tried twice, and is not a second time to be put in jeopardy; and that that applies equally to this case as to a case where a man has been convicted or acquitted. In that I cannot concur; and the judgment of CRAMPTON, J., is conclusive on that subject. When we talk of a man being tried twice, we mean a trial which proceeds to its legitimate and lawful conclusion by verdict; and when we speak of a man being twice put in jeopardy, we mean put in jeopardy by the verdict of a jury; and he is not tried nor put in jeopardy until the verdict is given. If that is not so, then in every case of a defective verdict a man could not be tried a second time; and yet it is well known that, though a jury have pronounced upon a case, yet, if their verdict be defective, it will not avail the party accused in the event of his being put on his trial a second time. Therefore, in my humble judgment (though it is not necessary to decide the point), as at present advised, I cannot come to the conclusion that there has been, in this case, a trial, or that the accused has been put in jeopardy, or put in the position, either in fact or in law, of a man who has been once acquitted, and who, having been once acquitted, cannot be put on his trial a second time."
- D
- E
- F

To the same effect were the observations of WIGHTMAN, J. (13); and BLACKBURN, J., said (14):

- G "... the one point on which I rest my judgment is that, at all events in a case of misdemeanour, the discharge of a jury sworn to try an issue after the trial has begun, even if improper, is not in my opinion a legal bar to a trial of the issue by another jury. I have said 'at all events in a case of misdemeanour' because that is the only question before us, and because the law of England undoubtedly does, in favorem vitae, make distinction in many cases, and it may be in this, between the modes of procedure in felonies and in misdemeanours."
- H

The present case was one of felony, but in the opinion of the court there was in this regard no difference between felony and misdemeanour in the year 1967 (15). The other case, five years later, was Winsor v. Reginam (16), in the Court of Queen's Bench and on appeal in the Exchequer Chamber (17). In the course of delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, ERLE, C.J., said (18):

- I
- (11) Viz., power to discharge the jury.

- (14) (1861), 1 B. & S. at p. 527.
- (15) The statutory abolition of the differences between felony and misdemeanour effected by the Criminal Law Act 1967 s. 1, is not here referred to, as that did not become operative until Jan. 1, 1968 (see ibid., s. 12 (1)).

"Even if it was assumed, for the sake of argument, that the statement on the record led the judges of the court of error to the opinion that the order for the discharge in question was an improper exercise of discretion on the part of the judge who tried the case, still we should hold that such a discharge was no legal bar to a second trial on the same or on a fresh indictment. The only pleas known to the law founded upon a former trial are pleas of a former conviction or a former acquittal for the same offence, but if the former trial had been abortive without a verdict, there has been neither a conviction nor an acquittal, and the plea could not be proved."

In the view of this court, those authorities make it clear that whether JUDGE ROGERS was right or wrong at the end of the first trial in discharging the jury, as he did, whether he had the right in his discretion so to do or whether s. 13 of the Act of 1967 had taken away that right, there was no bar to the appellant being put in charge of a fresh jury for trial. For these reasons, the appeal was dismissed.

Criminal Law—Sentence—Extended term of imprisonment—Meaning—Power to impose a term longer than the maximum for the particular offence, but not to extend an appropriate shorter term to a length less than the maximum—Sentencing powers, not power for rendering applicable statutory provisions regarding release on licence—Criminal Justice Act 1967 (c. 80) s. 37 (2), (3), (5), s. 60.

The power conferred on the court by s. 37 (2)* of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 to impose an “extended term of imprisonment” is a power to impose a term of imprisonment longer than the authorised maximum for the offence of which the accused is convicted, and s. 37 (3)† limits the extent of any extended term: accordingly, the power under s. 37 to impose an extended term of imprisonment does not authorise a court to impose a term longer than it otherwise would, but less than the maximum for the particular offence, and thereby to render applicable the provisions of s. 60‡ of the Act of 1967 regarding release on licence (see p. 596, letter I, p. 597, letters B and F, and p. 598, letter A, post).

The appellant was sentenced, on conviction on two counts of assault occasioning actual bodily harm, to two years’ imprisonment consecutive on each count, making four years in all. The maximum period of imprisonment for each such offence was greater than the imprisonment imposed§. The trial judge also directed under s. 37 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 that the sentence imposed was an extended one, and issued a certificate under s. 37 (5)|| of the Act of 1967 to that effect. On appeal,

Held: the sentence imposed was not an “extended term of imprisonment” within s. 37 (2), and accordingly there had been no jurisdiction to grant a certificate under s. 37 (5); the certificate would be set aside, but the sentence should stand (see p. 598, letter B, post).

F

PER CURIAM: the established principle that, in considering the length of a sentence which is to be imposed, a court should not take any question of remission of sentence into account, applies to release on licence as it does to remission (see p. 596, letter E, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by Peter Ottewell against sentences of two years’ imprisonment consecutive imposed on him at Leeds Assizes on Oct. 12, 1967, by HINCHCLIFFE, J., after he had pleaded guilty to two counts of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The trial judge directed that the sentence imposed “be an extended term under s. 37 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967". Leave to appeal against sentence was granted by JAMES, J., but solely in order that the Court of Appeal might consider whether the words "an extended term of imprisonment" in s. 37 (2) included a term of imprisonment less than the maximum permitted for the offence. The appeal came before the court (LORD PARKER, C.J., WINN, L.J., and WIDGERY, J.) on Dec. 19, 1967, when LORD PARKER, C.J., intimated that the court agreed with the single judge that there was nothing wrong with the sentences on the merits and could see no reason to interfere with sentence, but that, on the question arising on s. 37, the appeal would be adjourned to Jan. 29, 1968, for counsel to appear and assist the court as amicus curiae.

Apr. 10. ASHWORTH, J., read the following judgment of the court: On Dec. 19, 1967, this court dismissed the appellant's appeal in so far as he sought a reduction in two consecutive sentences amounting together to four years' imprisonment for two offences of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. At the same time this court adjourned for further argument the question whether the learned judge had power to direct, as he did, that the imprisonment imposed by him "be an extended term under s. 37 (2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967". The adjourned hearing took place on Jan. 29, 1968, and the court was greatly assisted by the arguments addressed to them by counsel as amicus curiae and by counsel for the appellant.

Section 37 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) came into force on Oct. 1, 1967, and it is convenient to set out the first three subsections:

"(1) No person shall be sentenced by a court to preventive detention or corrective training. (2) Where an offender is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and the conditions specified in sub-s. (4) of this section are satisfied, then, if the court is satisfied, by reason of his previous conduct and of the likelihood of his committing further offences, that it is expedient to protect the public from him for a substantial time, the court may impose an extended term of imprisonment under this section. (3) The extended term which may be imposed under this section for any offence may exceed the maximum term authorised for the offence apart from this section if the maximum so authorised is less than ten years, but shall not exceed ten years if the maximum so authorised is less than ten years or exceed five years if the maximum so authorised is less than five years."

It is not necessary to set out in full the terms of sub-s. (4) which specify the conditions which must be satisfied before an extended term of imprisonment can be imposed under the section. It may, however, be observed in passing that these conditions are not the same as those which had to be satisfied before a sentence of preventive detention could be passed under s. 21 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (1). Section 37 (5) is in the following terms:

"Where an extended term of imprisonment is imposed on an offender under this section, the court shall issue a certificate (hereafter in this Act referred to as 'an extended sentence certificate') stating that the term was so imposed."

It is to be noted that s. 37 is the first section in Part 2 of the Act, which is headed by the words "Powers of courts to deal with offenders" followed by a sub-heading, relating to s. 37 and s. 38, "Powers to deal with persistent offenders". Moreover the side-note to s. 37 is "Punishment of persistent offenders".

(1) See 28 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 371.

A The main arguments addressed to this court were based on the provisions of s. 60 of the Act and it is convenient to set out some of those provisions in full. Before that is done, it is to be noted that s. 60 is in Part 3 of the Act which is headed by the words "Treatment of offenders" followed by a sub-heading "Release of prisoners on licence and supervision of prisoners after release". Section 60 (1) is in the following terms:

B "The Secretary of State may, if recommended to do so by the Parole Board, release on licence a person serving a sentence of imprisonment, other than imprisonment for life, after he has served not less than one-third of his sentence or twelve months thereof, whichever expires the later . . . (3) Without prejudice to his earlier release under sub-s. (1) of this section the Secretary of State may direct that—(a) a person serving a sentence of imprisonment C in respect of whom an extended sentence certificate was issued when the sentence was passed; or (b) a person serving a sentence of imprisonment for a term of eighteen months or more who was under the age of twenty-one when the sentence was passed, shall, instead of being granted remission of any part of his sentence under the prison rules, be released on licence at any time on or after the day on which he could have been discharged from prison D if the remission had been granted. (4) A person subject to a licence under this section shall comply with such conditions, if any, as may for the time being be specified in the licence . . . (6) A licence granted to any person under this section shall, unless previously revoked under s. 62 of this Act, remain in force until a date specified in the licence, being—(a) in the case of a licence
E granted to a person in respect of whom an extended sentence certificate was issued when sentence was passed on him or to a person who was under the age of twenty-one when sentence was passed on him, the date of the expiration of the sentence; (b) in any other case, the date on which he could have been discharged from prison on remission of part of his sentence under the prison rules if, after the date of his release on licence, he had not F forfeited remission of any part of the sentence under the rules."

The effect of s. 60 in regard to a person in respect of whom an extended sentence certificate was issued in pursuance of s. 37 (5) is that he may be released on licence either under s. 60 (1) or s. 60 (3). In the former case, the licence may be issued if he has served one-third of his sentence or twelve months thereof whichever expires the later, whereas in the latter case, the licence may be issued in lieu G of remission, at any time on or after the day on which he could have been discharged from prison if the remission had been granted. In either case the licence will remain in force until the date of the expiration of his sentence. There is of course no certainty that such a person will be released on licence either under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (3), and in that event he will normally be discharged from prison on remission, having served two-thirds of his sentence.

H As a practical illustration, one may take the case of a man sentenced to six years' imprisonment in respect of whom an extended sentence certificate is issued:—(a) He may be released on licence under s. 60 (1) after serving two years, in which event the licence will remain in force until the end of the sixth year.
(b) He may be released on licence under s. 60 (3) after serving four years, in which event the licence will remain in force until the end of the sixth year. (c) He
I may not be released on licence, in which event he will be discharged from prison at the end of the fourth year. So far as the man is concerned, there are both advantages and drawbacks if he is released on licence under sub-s. (3). The licence will probably require him to maintain contact with a probation officer, as a result of which he will receive help and guidance in the process of rehabilitation.
On the other hand the conditions in the licence will inevitably involve some restriction of his freedom of conduct or movement and he will not be as free a person as he would have been otherwise. It is on this aspect of the matter, namely, the control of a persistent offender on release, that counsel amicus curiae chiefly relied in support of his interpretation of s. 37 (2) of the Act of 1967. A

It was said that the objects of s. 37 were two-fold: one object was to confer on a court power to impose a longer sentence than the authorised maximum, the other was to confer a power to ensure that a persistent offender should be kept under a measure of control after his release. It was further said that it is not incumbent on a court to make use of the first of these powers: the sentence could be within the statutory limit and all that is needed for the purpose of exercising the second power is a certificate that the sentence imposed (whatever its length) involves an extended term of imprisonment. In other words the phrase "extended term of imprisonment" is in effect a label to indicate that s. 60 has been made applicable. This seems to have been the course taken by the judge in the present case: the two sentences, each of two years, which he imposed were well within the authorised maximum and it is difficult to describe them, either singly or taken together, as being, in any real sense of the words, extended terms of imprisonment. B C

In the judgment of this court this approach to the problem of deciding the meaning of s. 37 is not correct. If the two objects just mentioned were indeed the objects of the legislature, one cannot help commenting that the language of s. 37 is a distinctly odd method of achieving them. We cannot accept the contention that one of the meanings of the words "extended term of imprisonment" is, to quote counsel as amicus curiae, "a term which by reason of s. 60 will be extended in its operation compared with its ordinary operation". Moreover, this approach to the problem runs counter to the well-established principle, that, in considering the length of the sentence which is to be imposed, a court should not take any question of remission of sentence into account (R. v. Maguire, R. v. Enos (2)). That case related to remission, but in our view the same principle applies to release on licence. A court's normal function is to "impose a term of imprisonment", and unless clearly and specifically empowered so to do, it neither should nor does exercise control over the way the sentence is carried into effect. The words "impose an extended term of imprisonment" are not apt to describe the action of a court in giving the Home Secretary powers to interfere with an entitlement to remission. D E F

In view of the extent to which counsel as amicus curiae stressed the necessity of taking s. 60 into account when construing s. 37, it is as well to mention a contention which he pressed very strongly. He urged that it would be absurd to be able to keep under licence control after their normal remission dates those who received a five year "extended term" in cases where before the Act of 1967 the maximum sentence was two years, but yet not be able to exercise such control in even more serious cases where perhaps a seven year sentence had been imposed where the maximum was fourteen years. The court has already indicated that if the legislature had wished to provide for control during the term of imprisonment of the latter class of offender it could easily have so stated: indeed it could have adopted some formula parallel to that used in s. 22 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, (3). His contention, however, brought into prominence a further point in view of his concession that, as at the time of the passing of the Act of 1967, the prisoner had an absolute right to uncontrolled remission if he earned it. G H

Under the Act of 1967 the only offenders who are deprived of that absolute right are those on whom an "extended term" is imposed: to the extent of that deprivation s. 37 (2), if read in conjunction with s. 60, is a penal section. Thus s. 37 (2) ought not to be construed so as to operate against the subject in the way counsel as amicus curiae contended unless its intention so to do is clear and there is not any other equally reasonable interpretation. As, however, the court has come to the conclusion that s. 37 (2) clearly has the different effect expressed I

(2) (1956), 40 Cr. App. Rep. 92.

(3) See 28 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 373.

A later in this judgment, it is not necessary to rely on the need in doubtful cases to give a penal section in a statute the construction which is least unfavourable to the subject.

What then is the meaning of the word "extended term of imprisonment"? Although it may be stating the obvious, it is worth emphasising that the power conferred by s. 37 (2) is to pass a term of imprisonment, and an extended one at that. It is not a power to give directions as to treatment in prison or release on licence. It was submitted in argument that the term "extended" merely means a term that is longer than would otherwise be appropriate for the particular offence, and that the extended term need not be longer than the authorised maximum. One answer, in the view of this court, is that the power to impose a longer sentence than would otherwise be appropriate for the particular offence, in order to protect the public, already exists and is frequently exercised. For example, a persistent thief, who will not desist from small-scale thefts and is not deterred by sentences otherwise appropriate for the offence or offences, is frequently sentenced to a much longer term for the protection of the public: in such cases the court, in passing sentence, usually makes it plain that a severe sentence is required for the express purpose of protecting the public; but, apart from s. 37 (3), such longer term must not exceed the authorised maximum. Accordingly, when preventive detention came to be abolished by virtue of s. 37 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, it was replaced by a new power enlarging and extending the powers conferred by statute or by common law: hence the phrase "an extended term of imprisonment". It is true that in s. 37 (3) it is provided that the extended term may exceed the maximum authorised for the offence and at first sight this might indicate that equally the extended term might not exceed the maximum. In the view of this court the object of sub-s. (3) was not to confer an option on the sentencing court either to exceed the authorised maximum or not. The object was to set limits to the extent to which an extended term might exceed the authorised maximum: in its context that subsection supports rather than negatives the view that an extended term of imprisonment involves the exercise of a newly conferred power to exceed the authorised maximum sentence, subject to the limitations set out in sub-s. (3).

Another suggestion is that the clue to the meaning of s. 37 (2) is to be found in the phrase "it is expedient to protect the public from him for a substantial time". It is suggested that, to protect the public, a sentencing court might, for example, add twelve months to the sentence which it would otherwise have imposed, and in this way impose an extended term of imprisonment. On this footing, the question whether the authorised maximum was exceeded would be immaterial. In support of this suggestion it may be argued that as the law stood before the Act of 1967, while an offender's past record might properly be taken into account when a court was considering what sentence would be appropriate for the particular offence, care had to be taken to see that he was not being punished for that record, that is to say, for offences in respect of which he had already been punished. It may be argued further that, in order to deal with persistent offenders, Parliament has conferred in s. 37 (2) of the Act of 1967 a new power which is in effect a power to punish an offender for his record by adding to what would otherwise be an appropriate term of imprisonment and calling the resulting term an extended term of imprisonment, even if it keeps within the pre-existing statutory maximum. The difficulty in giving effect to this suggestion is that (as has already been stated) courts have for a long time felt themselves entitled to lengthen a sentence for the express purpose of protecting the public, and accordingly on this footing sub-s. (2) confers no new power. In addition it is difficult to separate when considering the length of sentence, the need to protect the public from the two other factors mentioned in sub-s. (2), namely the man's previous conduct and the likelihood of his committing further offences: all three factors should be considered together when the question of imposing an extended term of imprisonment arises.

Accordingly, in the view of this court, the meaning of extended term of imprisonment in s. 37 (2) is a term extended beyond the authorised maximum for the particular offence and s. 37 (3) defines and limits the extent of any extended term as opposed to being the sole source of the power to extend a term beyond the previous maximum. It follows that the judge could not grant a certificate under s. 37 (5). That certificate must be set aside but in regard to the actual sentence the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords granted, the court certifying under s. 1 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1969, that a point of law of general public importance was involved, viz., whether, on the construction of s. 37 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, an extended term of imprisonment may be imposed although it does not exceed the maximum term authorised for the offence apart from s. 37.

PICKLES v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD (INTENDED ACTION).

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Lord Denning, M.R., Davies and Russell, L.JJ.), March 29, 1968.]

Limitation of Action—Extension of time limit—Leave to contend in an action that time limit not a defence—Application by member of trade union to union for advice—All reasonable steps taken by member—Attributability of injury first known by member when union's advice communicated to him in July, 1967—Nature of applicant's illness (silicosis) known to him in September, 1966—Disease contracted in employment before 1960—Leave granted ex parte—Limitation Act 1963 (c. 47) s. 7 (5).

The applicant was a miner employed by the National Coal Board. From 1947 to 1960 he worked underground. He then ceased working in a mine and became a lathe operator. In February, 1966, he became ill with chest trouble and in September, 1966, he was told by his doctor that he suffered from silicosis contracted whilst working at the colliery. At that time he did not know that he might have a cause of action against the National Coal Board. He approached the branch secretary of his union, who communicated with head office, and then asked the applicant to fill in a form, which he did in September, 1966. In June, 1967, after delay attributable to the union-representative, the form was sent to head office, who informed him in July, 1967, that there might be a claim for negligence or breach of statutory duty against the board. On appeal by the applicant from refusal of leave (pursuant to s. 1 of the Limitation Act 1963) to contend in an action that s. 2 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, should afford no defence,

Held: by applying to the trade union representative the applicant had taken all such action as it was reasonable for him to have taken before that time for the purpose of obtaining appropriate advice, and thus had satisfied s. 7 (5) (c) of the Limitation Act 1963; accordingly for the purpose of an ex parte application for leave pursuant to s. 1 the applicant had established that the attributability of his injury to a tort on the part of the board was outside his knowledge until July, 1967, with the consequence that leave should be granted to him (see p. 600, letters F, H and I, and p. 601, letters B, G and I, post).

Appeal allowed.

Interlocutory Appeal.

This was an appeal by Stanley Pickles from an order of THOMPSON, J., made on Nov. 20, 1967, dismissing his application (made on affidavit filed on Nov. 15, 1967) for leave pursuant to s. 1 of the Limitation Act 1963 in respect of an intended action against the National Coal Board for damages for personal injuries caused by alleged negligence or breach of statutory duty. The grounds of appeal were that the judge was wrong in law in holding that no material facts of a decisive character were at all times outside the knowledge (actual or constructive) of the appellant until a date which was not earlier than twelve months before Nov. 17, 1967. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

Hugh Griffiths, Q.C., and J. M. Williams for the applicant.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: This is yet another case under the Limitation Act 1963. The applicant, Mr. Stanley Pickles, was at one time a mineworker. For two years before the war he worked on a screening plant in a mine in county Durham. He went to the war. After he came back he worked underground from 1947 until September, 1960. He was then a member of the Mineworkers' Union. In 1960 he ceased working in a mine and became a lathe operator. He moved down from Durham to Bedfordshire. He joined the Amalgamated Engineering Union. He worked there until he was taken ill in February, 1966, with trouble in his chest. It was thought at first to be tuberculosis, but afterwards it was found to be silicosis.

In July, 1966 (and this is the important date) he was told by his doctor that he had silicosis and he had contracted it while he was working at the colliery in county Durham. He did not realise then that he had any claim for negligence or breach of statutory duty, but he thought that he would have a claim on the national insurance fund. He went along to the Amalgamated Engineering Union in Bedfordshire. The union representative wrote up to head office, who suggested that he should fill in a schedule in the usual form. In September, 1966, he filled in the form. He said that he had got silicosis. One of the questions was whether the employers were to blame. He left the answer blank. He did not know that it was the fault of the employers. The union representative unfortunately did not at that time send the form up to the head office. It seems to have got lost somehow amongst his papers. He did not send the form up to head office until June, 1967. Meanwhile, the applicant had been along and asked about it on several occasions and he had been put off for one reason or another. When the form did get to head office, they thought it was a case for legal advice. The legal advisers looked into the matter. They thought that there might be a claim by the applicant for negligence or breach of statutory duty. In July, 1967, the applicant was told that that was their view. By that time the period of limitation had long expired. In order to overcome that bar, the solicitors on his behalf made application for leave under the Limitation Act 1963. They set out in an affidavit for the court the circumstances, most of which I have already described. It came before the judge ex parte, and the judge thought that it was not a case in which he should grant leave. Now counsel for the applicant asks us to review the judge's decision.

This is one more case on this very complicated and obscure Act. I need not recite all the provisions again; but it is quite plain that a plaintiff has to get leave to bring an action, and actually to bring the action, within twelve months of the time when he gets to know (actually or constructively) the material facts (those facts being of a decisive character). The judge seems to have thought that in this case the applicant got to know the material facts in July, 1966, or at latest September, 1966, when he knew that he had got silicosis through working in the coal mine: and, seeing that more than twelve months had elapsed since he got that knowledge, the judge refused to grant him leave. Counsel for the applicant submits to us that the judge did not correctly interpret the statute. He says that it is not enough for a plaintiff to know that he has silicosis due to working in a mine. He must also know that it is attributable to negligence or breach of statutory duty: and in this case the applicant did not know it was so attributable until July, 1967.

The definition of "material facts" is contained in s. 7 (3). It provides:

"... any reference to the material facts relating to a cause of action is a reference to any one or more of the following, that is to say (a) the fact that personal injuries resulted from the negligence, nuisance or breach of duty constituting that cause of action... (c) the fact that the personal injuries so resulting were attributable to that negligence, nuisance or breach of duty..."

That definition makes it clear that the attributability of the injury to negligence or breach of duty, or, in other words, its causation, is a material fact within the the statute. I realise that, in the ordinary way, attributability or causation is regarded as a point of law, but, nevertheless, I think that for the purpose of this statute, it is to be regarded as a material fact.

Once attributability or causation is seen to be a material fact, the next question is when did the applicant get to know (actually or constructively) that his disease was attributable to the negligence or breach of duty of his employers. For that purpose we have to look at s. 7 (5). If one goes through that section, it is plain that sub-s. (5) (a) is satisfied. He did not actually know of the attributability of negligence or breach of statutory duty until July, 1967. Next, sub-s. (5) (b) is satisfied. He had taken all such action as was reasonable for him to have taken in order to ascertain it. He had put the matter before his trade union representative, which is surely all that is required of a man in his position. Subsection (5) (c) seems to add a little more to sub-s. (5) (b). By putting the matter before the trade union he had taken all action as it was reasonable for him to take to obtain advice. In the circumstances the attributability of silicosis to negligence or breach of statutory duty was not known to him—it was not within his knowledge, actual or constructive—until July, 1967. It was obviously a material fact of a decisive character within s. 7 (4) because until he knew of it he would not know he had a worthwhile action.

On the present evidence, I think that the applicant only got to know of the material facts of decisive character in July, 1967. He has, therefore, twelve months from July, 1967 in which to bring the action. That is, he has got to issue his writ by July, 1968, which he can do provided leave is given. I think that leave should be given. I do not say that he will win the action, but he has given evidence which, if accepted, might establish his cause of action. It is a proper case for leave. Of course, it does not finally decide the matter. The grant of leave ex parte is only provisional. The respondents will have the opportunity later to argue these points again if they so please, either on a preliminary issue or on a full trial of the case; but for present purposes I think that the applicant has sufficiently made out a case for leave, and I would grant leave accordingly.

DAVIES, L.J.: I agree. The applicant knew in July, 1966, because he had been told so by his doctors, that he had silicosis and that the silicosis was contracted while he was working in a mine. He says that at that time, although he thought that that might entitle him to some form of disablement benefit or pension, he had no idea that he had a cause of action against the National Coal

A Board. He did not, in other words, realise there had been any negligence or breach of duty on the part of his former employers. That evidence, naturally, it being an ex parte application, is uncontradicted, and it seems on the face of it to be true.

Nevertheless the question remains: did he take all such action as was reasonable for him to have found out his rights? In my view he plainly did. When he went back to work, or even perhaps when he was in hospital, he spoke to the branch secretary of the Amalgamated Engineering Union, of which he was a member, who wrote on Sept. 2, 1966, to the head office of his union:

C "The [applicant] who having been off work for some twenty-six weeks with tuberculosis has been told by a doctor in Bedford hospital that it was caused by silicosis from when he worked underground at a colliery. His doctor said that his union should be able to do something regarding a claim for him, but at the time he was in a colliery workers' union. I would appreciate your comments and advice that could be given our member."

On Sept. 21, the union wrote back saying:

D "We acknowledge receipt of your letter of Sept. 2 relative to the [applicant], who is unfortunately off work with tuberculosis which he has been informed has been caused by silicosis from working underground at a colliery. If [the applicant] contracted this disease prior to his admission into our union, he would not be entitled to legal aid. However, if the member so desires, we see no reason why he should not complete a schedule to be forwarded to this office for the attention of our legal department. We feel sure that department will tender some advice."

E On Sep. 29, that is to say just a week after that letter was written, the applicant did fill in the form of which we have a copy before us.

In my view in all the circumstances those were entirely proper and reasonable steps for the applicant to take. As was said by counsel for the applicant in another walk of life perhaps one would have gone to a solicitor, but it was quite reasonable for him to treat his union as his legal advisers in the circumstances. Unfortunately, as we know, Mr. George, the branch secretary, mislaid that form and did not come across it again until June, 1967, when he sent it to the union. The union acted then with the greatest promptness, which no doubt they would have done in 1966 if the schedule, as they call it, had been sent to them then.

G In my view prima facie the applicant here has fulfilled all the requirements of the Limitation Act 1963, and I agree accordingly that leave should be granted.

H RUSSELL, L.J.: The fact that the silicosis was attributable to negligence or breach of duty by the respondent National Coal Board is by definition a material fact under the Limitation Act 1963 s. 7 (3) and s. 1 (3), and clearly it is a material fact of a decisive character under s. 7 (4) and s. 1 (3). Was this fact outside the applicant's knowledge until July, 1967? Does he, in relation to this fact, pass, up to that date, the tests of relevant ignorance laid down by s. 7 (5) (a), (b) and (c)? I think so. Under para. (a) it is clear. Under para. (b) and para. (c)—which in this case seem to amount to the same thing—he took in my view all the steps and all the action as were reasonable by putting the matter in the hands of his trade union representative in a way which did lead to knowledge of the decisive fact, albeit late, due to the eccentricities of the filing system of the trade union representative. On the case as now presented, considerable additional material having been added since the hearing before the judge, I, too, agree that leave should be given.

Sellers who had 1,500 cartons of kidneys in a cold store in London sold six hundred of these cartons to buyers, who inspected some of the cartons in the store, on Oct. 13, 1964. On the morning of Oct. 14 the sellers' agent gave the buyers' carrier a delivery note authorising him to pick up six hundred of the cartons: the carrier went to the cold store at about 8 a.m. and found the six hundred cartons had already been put out of the cold store on to the pavement. He produced his delivery note, and the cartons were loaded into his lorry. Loading was not complete until about noon. There was a tea break at about 10 a.m., after which the carrier noticed that the cartons were dripping. The carrier switched on the refrigeration in his lorry, and the refrigeration became effective at about 3 p.m. At about noon, when he signed for the cartons, the carrier added a note that they were in soft condition. When the cartons arrived in Glasgow the next day most of the kidneys were found to be unfit for human consumption. On a claim by the buyers for damages, and a counterclaim by the sellers for the price,

Held: (i) the contract when made was for the sale of unascertained goods, and the six hundred cartons were unconditionally appropriated to the contract at 8 a.m. when, by accepting the delivery note and indicating to the carrier that the cartons on the pavement were those that he was to take, the official at the cold store acknowledged that the goods were held on the buyers' behalf (cf. s. 29 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893); accordingly the property in the goods then passed to the buyers under r. 5 of s. 18 of the Act of 1893, and thereafter the goods were at the buyers' risk (see p. 604, letter H, p. 605, letters H and I, and p. 606, letter E, post).

(ii) as there was no evidence that the kidneys had deteriorated by 8 a.m., the buyers' claim for damages would be dismissed, and the sellers were entitled to judgment for the sale price (see p. 604, letter I, and p. 606, letters D and E, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by W. Norwood & Sons, Ltd., the defendants in an action brought by the plaintiffs, Wardar's (Import and Export) Co., Ltd., by writ

A issued on Oct. 12, 1965, claiming the balance (£2,026 ls. 3d.) on an account for the price of the goods sold and delivered less payments made and less an amount for goods sold by the defendants to the plaintiffs. The defendants by their amended defence admitted indebtedness in the sum of £2,026 ls. 3d., but claimed to set off, among other sums, a sum of £1,840 6s. 11d.; and they counterclaimed in the action alleging that on or about Oct. 13, 1964, the defendants had sold and

B delivered to the plaintiffs six hundred cartons of kidneys, and that there was due to the defendants, as balance of the price £1,840 6s. 11d. By their reply and defence to counterclaim the plaintiffs alleged that a large part of the kidneys were unfit and not of merchantable quality. The plaintiffs having, so they pleaded, paid for the kidneys, alleged that £1,840 6s. 11d., being the price of the unfit kidneys, together with the cost of carriage, became due to them from the

C defendants. On Oct. 24, 1967, DANCKWERTS, L.J., sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division, awarded to the plaintiffs the sum that they claimed (£2,026 ls. 3d.) for the balance due as the price of goods sold by them to the defendants, and dismissed the defendants' counterclaim in regard to the sale of the kidneys. By notice dated Dec. 4, 1967, the defendants gave notice of appeal against the dismissal of their counterclaim and thus against the D rejection of their contention that £1,840 6s. 11d. was due to them from the plaintiffs and should be set off against the £2,026 ls. 3d. The appeal being thus concerned with a sale of kidneys by the defendants to the plaintiffs, the defendants are herein referred to as "the sellers" and the plaintiffs as "the buyers".

E T. J. F. Hobley for the buyers.

HARMAN, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of DANCKWERTS, L.J., sitting in the Queen's Bench, on Oct. 24, 1967. I sympathise heartily with DANCKWERTS, L.J., when he starts by saying that he had a very difficult task in finding out what the facts were. So have we. In fact I am not sure that

F we know them very well now, and there is a good deal of speculation.

The story begins when the defendant sellers, who are meat importers, bought two consignments of kidneys from the Argentine in the autumn of 1964. The consignments were delivered in London and put into cold storage by the sellers, who presumably then advertised them for sale. On Oct. 13, 1964, there was a telephone conversation between them and the plaintiff buyers at which there

G was an agreement to sell six hundred out of the 1,500 cartons to the buyers, who already, I gather, had subsold to their own purchasers. On that same day the buyers made some inspection of the cartons, which were presumably at that time in good condition, and indeed there was some outside evidence that apart from the six hundred cartons with which we are here concerned these goods were of merchantable quality.

H Some carriers were thereupon instructed to pick up the goods and take them to Scotland, in pursuance of the subsale to a firm called Drummond in Glasgow. One McBeath, who had come down from Scotland with a lorry-load of fresh meat, apparently called on some agents called McKay's on the evening of Oct. 13 and was told that he would be taking back to Scotland the next day these six hundred cartons. He attended apparently early in the morning of Oct. 14

I at McKay's office, and was there given what was described as a delivery note, which was his authority to pick up these six hundred cartons and load them on his lorry and take them off. His lorry was a refrigerated lorry, but it was not cool because it had brought down fresh, unchilled meat from Scotland and did not need to be chilled for that purpose.

Mr. McBeath apparently arrived at 8 a.m. at the warehouse in Smithfield and there he found the goods already outside the cold store and waiting on the pavement to be picked up. He delivered his authority, that is to say his delivery note, and the cold storage firm directed Smithfield porters who were on the spot to put the goods on the lorry. That process took from first to last from 8 a.m. till about noon, and Mr. McBeath got off at noon. There was in the course of it what was called a tea-break, of unknown length, said by some people to stretch for an hour but whether that is a libel or not it is not for me to say. Anyhow by the time these goods were loaded on to the lorry there was a good deal of evaporation of the freezing to which they had been subject when they were in the cold store, and Mr. McBeath had never turned on his refrigerating machinery; he did that during this tea-break, which was said to be at about 10 a.m. or a little after. He admitted that it would take three hours anyhow from then before the cooling process really spread to the insulation surrounding the lorry; so that the goods were in an unchilled lorry for several hours or at least the great part of that time. He signed for them and added the words at the bottom "In soft condition". He presumably signed towards 12 noon, just before he got off, so they were by then noticeably becoming unfrozen. He took them to Scotland. He had a night stop on the way, but he kept his refrigeration on all the time. He delivered them in Glasgow; and almost at once there were protests. The goods were condemned by the medical officer of health—or at least 470 out of the six hundred cartons were—and the whole consignment, I gather was treated as unfit for human consumption. The question is, on whom is the loss to fall; and that depends on when the property in the goods passed from seller to buyer.

Section 16 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, provides:

"Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained goods, no property in the goods is transferred to the buyer unless and until the goods are ascertained."

That applies here because the 1,500 cartons did not have any note or indication on them which were selected by the buyer: he simply bought six hundred out of the 1,500 and, therefore, there was no ascertainment at that point. Therefore there must be, for a transfer of the property, an ascertainment of the goods. Section 18 deals with intention: it deals with the sale of specific goods. Section 20 provides:

"Risk prima facie passes with property. Unless otherwise agreed, the goods remain at the seller's risk until the property therein is transferred to the buyer, but when the property therein is transferred to the buyer, the goods are at the buyer's risk whether delivery has been made or not..."

Section 29 (3) provides:

"Where the goods at the time of sale are in the possession of a third person, there is no delivery by seller to buyer unless and until such third person acknowledges to the buyer that he holds the goods on his behalf..."

Therefore as soon as the cold storage official (who was the third person in question) acknowledged to Mr. McBeath that the goods were his, the property seems to me to have passed, and I think that that moment must be the time when Mr. McBeath took delivery under his delivery note and that is acknowledged by the owner of the cold store as entitling Mr. McBeath to take the goods away.

Consequently, it seems to me that the property in the goods passed and the risk passed as soon as the goods already taken out of the cold store were acknowledged to be the goods of the buyer. If that is so, it seems to me that on the balance of probability it is fairly clear that the damage was done after and not before that moment and that therefore the risk was on the buyer. The counter-claim should succeed accordingly, and I would therefore allow the appeal.

SALMON, L.J.: I entirely agree, and I add a word only because we are differing from DANCKWERTS, L.J.; who decide this case at first instance.

The evidence, as he said, was rather meagre; but the correct inferences to be drawn from it are, I think, tolerably plain. The driver, Mr. McBeath, received the delivery order in the early hours of the morning of Oct. 14, 1964. He was

A instructed to go to St. John's Cold Store and collect six hundred cartons of frozen kidneys and take them to Scotland. His van was a refrigerated van, but the refrigeration had not been turned on when he received his orders for the day before, as HARMAN, L.J., has said, he had brought a cargo of fresh meat down from Scotland. Although he knew that he was about to pick up some frozen kidneys to take them to Scotland out of the cold store, he did not think of turning on the refrigeration in the van at once. He must have known that it would take some hours to become cold. Whether it is possible that the buyers have any claim against the carriers is not for me to say. Indeed there is hardly enough evidence before us on which one could even speculate on that topic.

C When the driver, Mr. McBeath, arrived at the cold store at 8 a.m. on Oct. 14, according to his evidence the load of frozen kidneys which he was to take to Scotland was there on the pavement waiting for him. There is no doubt that that load of six hundred cartons had been in the cold store, the day before and indeed had then been examined by the buyers soon after they made their oral contract of purchase. As far as the evidence goes, there was absolutely nothing the matter with the kidneys on Oct. 13. There is no evidence when these six D hundred cartons were taken out of the cold store. It seems unlikely that they would have been left on the pavement overnight. Had they been left on the pavement overnight, it is perhaps even more unlikely that they would all have been there in the morning. The natural inference, I think, is that they must have been taken out of the cold store at some time on the morning of Oct. 14 prior to 8 a.m.

E Now, as HARMAN, L.J., has said, these six hundred cartons were part of a consignment of 1,500 cartons of frozen kidneys that had been stored in the cold store. The evidence called at the trial showed that the rest of the cartons—that is, nine hundred of the cartons—had also been sold, and no complaint was made in respect of them. At the time of the sale it was a sale of unascertained goods: six hundred cartons were bought out of a total of 1,500 cartons. F This case really turns on when the property passed to the buyers. It is plain that as a rule the goods remain at the sellers' risk until the property does pass to the buyers. After the property passes, then the goods are at the buyers' risk (s. 20 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893). There are special circumstances (of which Sterns, Ltd. v. Vickers, Ltd. (1) is an example) when the risk may pass to the buyers even before the property has passed to them; but there are no G such special circumstances here. The case, as I say, depends entirely on when it was that the property passed.

Under r. 5 of s. 18, the property passes to the buyers in the case of unascertained goods such as these when the goods are unconditionally appropriated to the contract. At 8 a.m. the carrier arrived; and the carrier was the buyers' agent. There were the goods, which had been left on the pavement by the sellers' H agent for the purpose of fulfilling the contract. The carrier handed over the delivery note with the clear intention that those goods should be accepted for loading; and the loading commenced.

I It is unnecessary to decide the point whether there was an unconditional appropriation to the contract at the moment when the goods were put on to the pavement, which is perhaps fortunate, because we do not know precisely when that was; but in my view there can be no doubt that there was a clear, unconditional appropriation when the delivery order was handed over in respect of the goods which had been deposited on the pavement for loading. There is certainly no evidence that they were not then of merchantable quality. It would seem from the evidence of Mr. McBeath, the driver of the lorry, that at some stage the porters wished to take a tea-break. The driver was apparently concerned at the goods being left standing on the pavement, but he was told, according to his evidence, that the tea-break would take only five minutes. A

 It appears that it took about an hour; and it was after the tea-break, according to Mr. McBeath that he first noticed that some of the cartons were dripping, which would be a strong indication that the goods had by then started to deteriorate. Meantime, however, a good many of the cartons—we do not know how many—had already been loaded into the lorry. Since, however (as I think), the goods were appropriated to the contract when the delivery B order was handed over and accepted in respect of the goods standing on the pavement, any deterioration that occurred thereafter was at the risk of the buyers. We know that when the goods arrived at their destination the vast bulk of them were not of merchantable quality. We also know from the driver of the lorry that he did not turn on the refrigeration, so he says, until the tea-break was taken. At any rate, the refrigeration did not become effective until C 3 p.m. It may not be very material, but it does not seem to me to be at all unlikely, if the goods were left in a stuffy lorry, as they were, for some hours, that the deterioration may have occurred during that time. The driver said that this was a hot day. Unless it was a very exceptional day for Oct. 14 in this country, I cannot think that the sun had much strength in it by 8 a.m.
 In any event, none of this, I think, matters, because at 8 a.m. these goods were D appropriated to the contract and the risk of deterioration then fell on the buyers; and there is no evidence that there was any deterioration before eight o'clock in the morning.

Accordingly, I agree with HARMAN, L.J., that this appeal should be allowed.

PHILLIMORE, J.: I agree with the judgments which have been delivered E

Appeal.

D

The appellant, Robert Charles Angel, pleaded guilty on Nov. 7, 1967, at the York assizes to one count of gross indecency and two counts of buggery. All the offences concerned the same boy, who was nine years of age. The appellant had asked for other offences to be taken into consideration when he was sentenced. He appealed to the Court of Appeal on a point of law, viz., that the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions to the prosecution had not been obtained pursuant to s. 8* of the Sexual Offences Act 1967. LORD PARKER, C.J., having stated the nature of the appeal and indicated the legal question, continued: It has been ascertained that the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions was not obtained, and in the result the whole of the trial, including the committal proceedings, has been a complete nullity, as it has been instituted without that necessary consent. Accordingly, the court has no alternative but to quash the conviction on the ground that the trial was a complete nullity, and will allow the appeal for that purpose.

R. v. R.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Park, J.), May 8, 9, 1967.]

Divorce—Infant—Child of the family—Acceptance of child as one of the family—Knowledge of material facts necessary for acceptance—Child disowned as soon as husband knew of facts showing that child was not his—Whether child had been accepted as one of the family—Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 (c. 72) s. 46 (2) (b).

The respondent mother married the petitioner in 1943. In 1956 a child was born to her, whom the petitioner treated as their child. In 1961 the petitioner first discovered facts showing that the child was not his, but was the child of the respondent and co-respondent. He thereupon disowned the child and instituted divorce proceedings in which he was granted a decree nisi on the ground of the respondent's adultery. On an issue whether the child had been "accepted" by the petitioner as one of the family for the purposes of s. 34 and s. 46 (2) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965,

Held: a child was not accepted by a party to a marriage as one of the family unless that party's consent thereto was shown to have been given with knowledge of the material facts; in the present case the petitioner had not had knowledge of the material facts for the five years during which the child had been treated as one of the family, and, as he had disowned the child on first learning the material facts, the child had not been accepted by him as one of the family (see p. 609, letter H, post).

Issue.

In a divorce suit a decree nisi was granted to the petitioning husband on the ground of the wife's adultery; the court found that the child, who was born to the wife during marriage, was not the child of the petitioner but was the child of the wife and the co-respondent. By order dated Apr. 4, 1966, it was ordered that the child be at liberty to intervene in the suit and be separately represented, and the Official Solicitor was appointed guardian ad litem of the child. By order dated Oct. 14, 1966, an issue was ordered to be tried whether the child had been accepted as a child of the family. For the purpose of this issue the petitioner was to be the plaintiff, and the respondent and the Official Solicitor were to be defendants.

Roger Gray for the petitioner.

J. D. K. Burton for the respondent.

A. B. Hollis for the Official Solicitor.

PARK, J.: The issue which I have to try is whether a child born to the respondent in April, 1956, is a child of the family. The respondent bore no other children. The circumstances in which this issue arises are as follows. The parties were married in 1943 and thereafter lived together at various addresses abroad and in the United Kingdom. In July, 1961, when the respondent and the child were on holiday in Europe, the petitioner discovered certain letters and other documents which tended to show that from about the year 1955 and, possibly, earlier up to the discovery of the documents, the respondent had frequently committed adultery with the co-respondent and that the child was born as a result of this adultery. Immediately he made this discovery, the petitioner left the matrimonial home and disowned both the respondent and the

A child. He then presented a petition for divorce on the ground of the respondent's adultery with the co-respondent. In the petition he put in issue the paternity of this child. By her answer, the respondent denied adultery and denied that the child was not a child of the petitioner and herself. She prayed for an order for custody of the child and for maintenance. After a long trial in which I heard evidence of blood tests made from samples of blood taken from the parties and from the child, I held that the respondent had frequently committed adultery with the co-respondent in and between 1955 and 1961 and that the child was the child of the respondent and the co-respondent. I granted a decree nisi to the petitioner. In April, 1966, the Official Solicitor was appointed guardian of the child and this issue was directed to be tried.

C It is not disputed that from the date of the child's birth in 1956 up to the discovery of the letters and other documents in 1961, the petitioner believed the child to be his; that in that belief he maintained the child and in every respect treated her as his daughter, and that when the documents and letters indicated to him that he was not the child's father he immediately ceased to treat her as his daughter and in fact disowned her.

D Under s. 34 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, the court can make such order as it thinks just for the custody, maintenance and education of any relevant child. By s. 46 (2) (b) a relevant child means a child of one party to the marriage who has been accepted as one of the family by the other party. Thus, the question I have to decide is whether on these facts the petitioner can be held to have accepted the child as one of the family.

E There is no authority which assists on the meaning of the expression "accepted as one of the family" as it is used in the Act of 1965. Counsel for the petitioner, and counsel who, on the instructions of the Official Solicitor, appeared for the child both submitted that, in order to come within the Act of 1965, any acceptance must be an acceptance with full knowledge of the facts, and that there had been no such acceptance by the petitioner in this case. Counsel for the Official Solicitor also drew my attention to the definition of "accept" in the SHORTER F OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY. The first part of that definition reads as follows: "To take or receive what is offered one; to take or receive with a consenting mind."

I think that the child of one party to the marriage cannot be held to have been accepted as one of the family by the other party unless it is shown by the evidence, first, that the other party consented either expressly or impliedly to receive the child as one of the family, and, secondly, that that consent was given with knowledge of the material facts. Whether there has been an acceptance of a child is in each case a question of fact.

G The fact that for five years the petitioner maintained the child and treated her as his daughter would ordinarily be regarded as overwhelming evidence both of his consent to receive her and of his acceptance of her as one of the family. In this case, however, the petitioner acted in this manner throughout that period solely because he believed, and had every reason for believing, that the child was in fact his. It was not until 1961 that it became reasonably clear to him that she was not. It was then that he first had the opportunity with knowledge of the material facts either to consent to receive her as one of the family or to refuse to receive her. Without any hesitation he refused to receive her.

I In my judgment, the petitioner for these reasons has never accepted the child as one of the family and she is not therefore a relevant child.

KING v. REGINAM.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Hodson, Lord Upjohn and Lord Pearson), January 25, 29, 30, April 3, 1968.]

Privy Council—Jamaica—Drugs—Dangerous drugs—Evidence—Admissibility—Search of premises authorised by warrant—Warrant did not authorise search—Accused found on premises and searched—Warrant for search of person should expressly authorise such search—Dangerous drug found on accused—Discretion of court to admit evidence obtained as result of search.

A statutory power to search the premises does not of itself imply power to search persons found on those premises; moreover, if a warrant is issued under a statutory power which authorises the search, pursuant to warrant, of premises and of persons found there, the warrant should expressly authorise searching persons if it is to be valid authority for such search (see p. 612, letter H, and p. 612, letter I, to p. 613, letter A, post).

Seccombe v. A.-G. ([1919] S.A.L.R. 270) applied.

Police officers went with a search warrant to search a house for ganja, a dangerous drug. The warrant was read to a woman on the premises but not apparently directly to the appellant who was also there, but he was told that the police were there to carry out a search for ganja. The appellant was searched, ganja was found in one of his trousers' pockets, and he was arrested. The ganja was subsequently analysed by the government analyst and a certificate obtained on analysis put in evidence. The search of the appellant was not authorised by the Jamaican Dangerous Drugs Law or the Jamaican Constabulary Force Law, but there was no evidence that the appellant was wilfully misled by the police officers or any of them into thinking that there was such authorisation. One of the officers admitted at the trial that he knew that the warrant was to search the premises of a named woman and that it referred to the search of no-one else; he suspected that the appellant might have had ganja on him and did not offer him the opportunity of being searched in front of a justice of the peace under the Jamaican Constabulary Force Law although he knew of that right of a citizen. On appeal against conviction of being unlawfully in possession of dangerous drugs, to wit, ganja, the appellant contended that, as no legal justification for his being searched had been established, even if the evidence of the police were admissible the court should in its discretion have excluded it as being unfair to him.

Held: there was no ground for interfering with the way in which the court's discretion had been exercised, because this was not a case in which evidence had been obtained by conduct of which the Crown ought not to take advantage (see p. 617, letter H, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by Herman King by special leave from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica (HENRIQUES, MOODY and ECCLESTON, JJ.), dated July 29, 1966, dismissing the appellant's appeal against his conviction and sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labour by His Honour L. L. ROBOTHAM, resident magistrate, Kingston, dated Feb. 2, 1966, for unlawful possession of a dangerous drug, viz., ganja. The facts are set out in the judgment of the Board.

M. P. Solomon and B. Sinclair for the appellant.

J. G. Le Quesne, Q.C., and S. G. Davies for the Crown.

- F LORD HODSON: The appellant was charged as follows:

"Herman King of 4, Anglesea Avenue of the parish of St. Andrew with force at 20, Ladd Lane and within the jurisdiction of this court unlawfully was found in possession of certain dangerous drugs to wit ganja. Contrary to s. 7 (c) of ch. 90."

- G This Act is called The Dangerous Drugs Law. The appellant was convicted by the resident magistrate, Kingston, Jamaica, on Feb. 2, 1966, and his appeal to the Court of Appeal of Jamaica was dismissed on July 29, 1966.

The case against the appellant was that, on Jan. 11, 1966, at 20, Ladd Lane, Kingston, he was searched by a police officer in pursuance of a search warrant, under the Dangerous Drugs Law, and ganja was found on him. The appellant's case was that ganja was planted on him by the police officer who conducted the search. He said that he was first searched and that nothing was found on him, whereupon the only other man present, apart from police officers, was sent out of the room. He said that he was then searched again and ganja was produced which the police falsely claimed had been found on him. There was a conflict of evidence between the witnesses called on either side and, on the appellant being

- I disbelieved, the conviction followed.

The Dangerous Drugs Law, s. 7, provides as follows:

"Every person who . . . (c) has in his possession any prepared opium or ganja . . . shall be guilty of an offence against this law."

Section 21 (2) of the Law provides as follows:

"If a justice is satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for suspecting—(a) that any drugs to which this Law applies are, in contravention of the provisions of this Law or of any regulations made thereunder, in the possession or under the control of any persons in any premises; or (b) that any document directly or indirectly relating to or connected with any transaction or dealing which was, or any intended transaction or dealing which would if carried out be, an offence against this Law or, in the case of a transaction or dealing carried out or intended to be carried out in any place outside the Island, an offence against the provisions of any corresponding law in force in that place, is in the possession or under the control of any person in any premises; he may grant a search warrant authorising any constable named in the warrant, at any time or times within one month from the date of the warrant, to enter, if need be by force, the premises named in the warrant, and to search the premises and any persons found therein, and if there is reasonable ground for suspecting that an offence against this Law has been committed in relation to any such drugs which may be found in the premises or in the possession of any such persons, or that any document which may be so found is such a document as aforesaid, to seize and detain those drugs or that document, as the case may be."

The section thus authorised any constable named in a warrant to enter if need be by force the premises named in the warrant and to search the premises and any persons found therein.

The police search party went to 20, Ladd Lane on Jan. 11, 1966, armed with a warrant which was in the following terms:

"To any lawful constable of the parish of Kingston WHEREAS it appears to me W. Chambers, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the parish of Kingston by the INFORMATION and complaint an oath of Henry R. Isaacs, Sgt. of Police, that there is good reason to believe that dangerous drugs to wit: ganja is kept and concealed on the premises of Joyce Cohen of 20, Ladd Lane in the parish of Kingston THESE ARE THEREFORE in Her Majesty's name, to authorise and command you with proper assistance, to enter the said premises of the said Joyce Cohen in the day or night time and there diligently search for the said dangerous drugs and if any articles of dangerous drugs be found after such search, that you will bring the dangerous drugs so found and the body of the said Joyce Cohen before me, or some other of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said parish of Kingston to be disposed of and dealt with according to law.

"Given under my hand and seal at 32, Lenearl Street in the parish aforesaid, Jan. 11, 1966.

Justice of the peace for the parish of Kingston."

Although a warrant to search persons as well as premises was contemplated by this section, this warrant did not in terms authorise search of any person although it did contemplate the arrest of one person named in the warrant.

In these circumstances, the search was not on the face of it justified by the warrant nor, in their lordships' opinion, can authority for the search of any person be implied from the language of the section without express authorisation.

In a South African case on consideration of a statutory provision as to the issue of warrants to search premises, persons not being mentioned, it was held at first instance that a search warrant covered persons as well as premises where premises only were mentioned, since to hold the opposite would lead to the defeat of the objects of search warrants because persons on the premises would only have to take material documents and conceal them on their persons and defeat the objects of the search. This decision was reversed on appeal by the Transvaal Provincial Division in Seccombe v. A.-G. (1). Their lordships see no reason to take a different view of the Act in question here which, by referring to persons as well as premises, strengthens the argument that, if a warrant is to cover persons, it must say so in

A terms. The warrant is defective not only for the reason stated but also because the terms of the section were not complied with since no constable was "named" in the warrant. This, in their lordships' opinion, is sufficient to invalidate the warrant since the legislature has been at pains to authorise entry and search only by a constable named. The word "named" is to be taken literally and not to be given a wider meaning, such as "designated", "specified" or "identified", which it may often bear in an appropriate context. For example, the court has inclined in favour of the wider meaning where the context so requires so as to give effect to the intention of a testator: see Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell (2), where the words "such of my relatives hereinbefore named" were held not to be confined to relatives of whom Christian names and surnames had been mentioned in a will. In another case, Re Browne's Policy, Browne v. Browne (3), a man with a wife and children effected a policy of assurance on his life under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 11, expressed to be "for the benefit of his wife and children". The wife died, the man remarried and had a child by his second marriage. It was held that these were entitled to participate jointly with the children of the first marriage. There are no considerations here which lead to any expanded meaning of the word "named".

D A further point taken in the Court of Appeal of Jamaica that the constable who performed the search was not a lawful constable of the parish of Kingston but of the parish of St. Andrew was not pursued in view of the terms of s. 13 (2) of the Constabulary Force Law which makes all constables constables in every parish.

E In the Jamaica courts, the argument was conducted on the footing that the warrant for the search of the appellant was not justified by s. 21 of the Dangerous Drugs Law although justification under this Law has been urged by the Crown before their lordships who are of opinion that search of the appellant was not justified by that law. Turning to the Constabulary Force Law (c. 72) to which the attention of the Jamaica courts was directed, s. 18 and s. 22 read as follows:

F "18. It shall be lawful for any constable, without warrant, to apprehend any person found committing any offence punishable upon indictment or summary conviction and to take him forthwith before a justice who shall enquire into the circumstances of the alleged offence, and either commit the offender to the nearest jail, prison or lock-up to be thereafter dealt with according to law, or to take bail by recognizance, with or without security in such amount as such justice shall direct, for his appearance on such day as he shall appoint, before a court of competent jurisdiction, to be dealt with according to law.

G "22. It shall be lawful for any constable to apprehend without warrant any person known or suspected to be in unlawful possession of opium, ganja (Cannabis Sativa), morphine, cocaine or any other dangerous or prohibited drugs, or any person known or suspected to be in possession of any paper, ticket or token relating to any game, pretended game or lottery called or known as Peaka Peow or Drop Pan, or any game of a similar nature and to take him forthwith before a justice who shall thereupon cause such person to be searched in his presence."

H There is nothing in the language of s. 18 to justify the search here made. The word "found" does not authorise a search although arrest is authorised in the circumstances specified by the section. Section 22 makes provision for a search in a particular manner where a person is known or suspected of being in possession of, inter alia, ganja. The person to be searched must be taken before a justice who shall thereupon cause such person to be searched in his presence. This was not done. Accordingly, no legal justification for the search having been established, objection was taken to the evidence of the police on the footing that, even if it were admissible, the court should in its discretion exclude it. The magistrate held that, even if s. 22 of the Constabulary Force Law had not been complied with, the evidence was admissible on the authority of Kuruma, Son of Kanju v. Reginam (4). The Court of Appeal took the same view in dismissing the appeal.

The evidence adduced by the prosecution, if accepted as credible as it was, was relevant and amply sufficient to prove the charge. The following is a summary of the evidence: On Jan. 11, 1966, Sgt. Isaacs, A/Cpl. Gayle, A/Cpl. Linton and other police went to 20, Ladd Lane to search for ganja under the Dangerous Drugs Law. The warrant was read by Sgt. Isaacs on the premises. It was read to a woman on the premises and not apparently directly to the appellant, but the appellant and another man, who was also searched, were told that the police were there to carry out a search for ganja. Corporal Gayle searched the appellant and found the ganja in one of his trousers' pockets and arrested him. The ganja was subsequently analysed by the government analyst and a certificate obtained on analysis put in evidence. Although the search was not authorised by the Dangerous Drugs Law or the Constabulary Force Law, there was no evidence that the appellant was wilfully misled by the police officers or any of them into thinking that there was such authorisation. Corporal Gayle admitted at the trial that he knew that the warrant was to search the premises of Joyce Cohen and that it referred to the search of no-one else. He suspected that the appellant might have had ganja on him and did not offer him the opportunity of being searched in front of a justice of the peace although he knew of that right of a citizen. It can, therefore, be said that he should have had the advantage of a search before a magistrate and the choice of this was never offered to him.

The substantial argument on behalf of the appellant was that, in the discretion of the court, the evidence produced as a result of the search, which was the whole of the evidence against him, ought, though admissible, to have been excluded as unfair to him.

Before referring to the Kuruma case (4), it is convenient to refer to some earlier decisions. Jones v. Owens (5) was a decision of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division. There, a constable who had no right to search the person of the appellant did so and, finding twenty-five young salmon in his pocket, summoned him under the Salmon Fishery Acts for illegally having these in his possession. The appellant was convicted by the justices, and on appeal it was said by MELLOR, J. (LUSH, J., concurring) (6):

"I think it would be a dangerous obstacle to the administration of justice if we were to hold, because evidence was obtained by illegal means it could not be used against a party charged with an offence. The justices rightly convicted the appellant."

This matter has been discussed in a number of Scottish cases which were reviewed in the Kuruma case (4). It should be prefaced that, in the Scottish cases to which reference will be made, the court is directing its mind to the admissibility of evidence, and in this connexion to a discretion to be exercised whether or not to admit evidence in cases where it could be said to be unfair to the accused to do so.

In the English cases, the evidence under consideration is admissible in law (whether illegally obtained or not) and the exercise of discretion is called for in order to decide whether, even though admissible, it should be excluded in fairness to the accused. The same end is reached in both jurisdictions though by a slightly different route. There is a passage in the opinion of the Lord Justice General (LORD COOPER) in Lawrie v. Muir (7) which points to some of the difficulties of the question which is involved. He said (8):

A "From the standpoint of principle it seems to me that the law must strive to reconcile two highly important interests which are liable to come in conflict—(a) the interest of the citizen to be protected from illegal or irregular invasions of his liberties by the authorities, and (b) the interest of the State to secure that evidence bearing upon the commission of crime, and necessary to enable justice to be done shall not be withheld from courts of law on any merely formal or technical ground. Neither of these objects can be insisted upon to the uttermost. The protection of the citizen is primarily protection for the innocent citizen against unwarranted, wrongful and perhaps high handed interference, and the common sanction is an action of damages. The protection is not intended as a protection for the guilty citizen against the efforts of the public prosecutor to vindicate the law. On the other hand, the interest of the State cannot be magnified to the point of causing all the safeguards for the protection of the citizen to vanish, and of offering a positive inducement to the authorities to proceed by irregular methods."

He proceeded (9):

D "Irregularities require to be excused, and infringements of the formalities of the law in relation to these matters are not lightly to be condoned. Whether any given irregularity ought to be excused depends upon the nature of the irregularity and the circumstances under which it was committed. In particular the case may bring into place the discretionary principle of fairness to the accused which has been so fully developed in our law in relation to the admission in evidence of confessions or admissions by a person suspected or charged with crime. That principle would obviously require consideration in any case in which the departure from the strict procedure had been adopted deliberately with a view to securing the admission of evidence obtained by an unfair trick . . . On the other hand, to take an extreme instance figured in argument, it would usually be wrong to exclude some highly incriminating production in a murder trial merely because it was found by a police officer in the course of a search authorised for a different purpose or before a proper warrant had been obtained."

In a later case, Fairley v. Fishmongers of London (10), another salmon case where a prosecution for stealing unclean or unseasonable salmon was brought without a search warrant or other authority, the Lord Justice General (LORD COOPER), applying Lawrie v. Muir (11), said that he could find nothing to suggest that any departure from the strict procedure was deliberately adopted with a view to obtaining the admission of evidence obtained by an unfair trick. On the other hand, in H.M. Advocate v. Turnbull (12), a case in which the accused was charged with making false income tax returns on behalf of a client, LORD GUTHRIE, after referring to the two preceding decisions of the Lord Justice General, excluded documents which had been illegally obtained on the ground of unfairness to the accused, since the legal action of the police was not justified by any circumstances of urgency, but was deliberately undertaken in order to obtain from the accused's private papers evidence on which further charges against him might be founded.

H The discretion in criminal cases to disallow evidence if the strict rules of admissibility would operate unfairly against an accused has been emphasised before this Board in Noor Mohamed v. Regem (13), and in the House of Lords in Harris v. Director of Public Prosecutions (14) as was pointed out by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Kuruma's case (15). In that case, he said (16):

"In their lordships' opinion, the test to be applied in considering whether evidence is admissible is whether it is relevant to the matters in issue. If it is, it is admissible and the court is not concerned with how the evidence was obtained."

He said later in commenting on the Scottish cases to some of which reference has been made (17):

"If, for instance, some admission of some piece of evidence, e.g., a document, had been obtained from a defendant by a trick, no doubt the judge might properly rule it out."

An instance of the exclusion of evidence on appeal on the ground that it has been obtained unfairly, although clearly admissible, is to be found in R. v. Payne (18). The defendant was taken to a police station following a car collision. He was there asked if he was willing to be examined by a doctor, and it was made clear to him that the purpose of the examination was to see if he was suffering from any illness or disability and that it was no part of the doctor's duty to examine him in order to give an opinion as to his fitness to drive. The defendant then agreed to the doctor's examination. At his trial on charges of driving while unfit through drink and being in charge of a car while likewise unfit, the doctor gave evidence for the prosecution to the effect that the defendant was under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be unfit to drive. On appeal against conviction, although the doctor's evidence was clearly admissible it was held that, in the exercise of his discretion, the chairman of London Sessions should have refused to allow it to be given since, had the defendant realised the doctor would give evidence as to his fitness or unfitness to drive, he might have refused to allow himself to be examined. The appeal was allowed and the conviction quashed. Callis v. Gunn (19) is another case where the Kuruma case (20) was considered. It was held that evidence of finger prints was relevant and admissible. It had been excluded by magistrates and on appeal by the prosecutor, which was allowed, it was held by the Divisional Court that, while the court had an overriding discretion to disallow evidence if its admission would operate unfairly against a defendant, there were no representations by the police officer who took the finger prints and nothing to justify the justices in excluding the evidence. LORD PARKER, C.J., in referring to the discretion, said that, as he understood it (21),

"... it would certainly be exercised in excluding the evidence if there was any suggestion of it having been obtained oppressively, by false representations, by a trick, by threats, by bribes, anything of that sort."

In R. v. Murphy (22), LORD MACDERMOTT, C.J., giving the judgment of the Courts-Martial Appeal Court, made valuable observations on circumstances which will or will not render it unfair to allow admissible evidence to be given against an accused person. There the appellant, a soldier serving in the army, was charged before a district court-martial with the offence of disclosing information useful to an enemy, contrary to s. 60 (1) of the Army Act, 1955. The substance of that case against him was contained in the evidence of police officers who had posed as members of a subversive organisation with which the authorities suspected the appellant to have sympathies, and had elicited the information the subject of the charge, by asking the appellant questions about the security of his barracks. The appellant was convicted and appealed on the ground that the court-martial ought, in its discretion, to have rejected the evidence. The appellant relied in his argument on the use of the word "trick", which appears in Kuruma's case (20) and Callis v. Gunn (19) and in other cases as well. The court reviewed these and other authorities and, commenting on the passage in LORD PARKER, C.J.'s judgment to which their lordships have already referred, used this language (23):

(23) [1965] N.I. at pp. 147, 148.

- A "We do not read this passage as doing more than listing a variety of classes of oppressive conduct which would justify exclusion. It certainly gives no ground for saying that any evidence obtained by any false representation or trick is to be regarded as oppressive and left out of consideration. Detection by deception is a form of police procedure to be directed and used sparingly and with circumspection; but as a method it is as old as the constable in plain clothes and, regrettable though the fact may be, the day has not yet come when it would be safe to say that law and order could always be enforced and the public safety protected without occasional resort to it. We find that conclusion hard to avoid on any survey of the preventive and enforcement functions of the police, but it is enough to point to the salient facts of the present appeal. The appellant was beyond all doubt a serious security risk; this was revealed by the trick of misrepresentation practised by the police as already described; and no other way of obtaining this revelation has been demonstrated or suggested. We cannot hold that this was necessarily oppressive or that LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON intended to lay down any rule of law which meant that it was the duty of the court-martial, once the trick used by the police had been established, to reject the evidence that followed from it."
- B

Their lordships agree with the judgment of the Courts-Martial Appeal Court in holding that unfairness to the accused is not susceptible of close definition. It was said (24):

- E "... it must be judged of in the light of all the material facts and findings and all the surrounding circumstances. The position of the accused, the nature of the investigation, and the gravity or otherwise of the suspected offence may all be relevant. That is not to say that the standard of fairness must bear some sort of inverse proportion to the extent to which the public interest may be involved, but different offences may pose different problems for the police and justify different methods."

- F The appellant relied in support of his submission that the evidence illegally obtained against him should be excluded on the argument that it was obtained in violation of his constitutional rights, and reference was made to an Irish case of The People (A.-G.) v. O'Brien (25), where the point was discussed by the Supreme Court of Eire. The provision of the Jamaican Constitution scheduled to the Jamaica (Constitution) Order in Council, 1962 (26) (para. 19) gives protection to persons against search of persons on property without consent. This constitutional right may or may not be enshrined in a written constitution, but it seems to their lordships that it matters not whether it depends on such enshrinement or simply on the common law as it would do in this country. In either event, the discretion of the court must be exercised and has not been taken away by the declaration of the right in written form.
- G

- H Having considered the evidence and the submissions advanced, their lordships hold that there is no ground for interfering with the way in which the discretion has been exercised in this case. This is not, in their opinion, a case in which evidence has been obtained by conduct of which the Crown ought not to take advantage. If they had thought otherwise, they would have excluded the evidence even though tendered for the suppression of crime.

- I Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed.

Re WOOTTON'S WILL TRUSTS.

TROTTER AND ANOTHER v. DUFFIN AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Pennycuik, J.), January 30, 1968.]

Charity—Power—Collateral power—Objects of power not exclusively charitable—Gift by will to trustees of residuary estate on trusts for accumulation or for payment of income, and power after certain period to pay, or apply capital—Class of beneficiaries defined to include some clearly charitable objects and also some which might not be charitable objects in law—Whether provisions valid.

Charity—Uncertainty—Opinion of trustees—Trust for such other organisation or body not being registered as a charity but in the opinion of the testatrix' trustees having charitable objects—Whether a valid charitable trust.

A testatrix made her will on July 7, 1961. By cl. 13 she bequeathed her residuary estate to her trustees and directed as follows: “(ii) to accumulate the income . . . for a period of twenty-one years from the date of my death and invest such accumulations . . ., or at the absolute discretion of my trustees to pay the whole or any part of such income . . . to such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof in such shares and manner and at such times as my trustees shall in their absolute discretion think fit (iii) After the expiration of twenty-one years to pay the whole of the said income to such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof in such shares and manner and with such direction as aforesaid until the vesting date mentioned in cl. 15 hereof (iv) Notwithstanding cl. (ii) and (iii) hereof . . . my trustees may at any time until the said vesting date pay, or during such period apply, the whole or any part of the capital then representing my residuary estate to such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof in such shares and manner and at such times as my trustees in their own absolute discretion think fit (v) Subject as aforesaid, my trustees shall on the vesting date stand possessed of that part of the capital and income of my residuary estate as shall then remain in the hands of my trustees and subject to the trusts of this my will for such of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof who shall have received income or capital from my trustees as aforesaid during the period immediately prior to five years of the said vesting date and if more than one in equal shares”. By cl. 14 of the will the beneficiaries were defined to mean “(a) any charitable institution or other charitable body in England or (b) such other organisation or body not being registered as a charity but in the opinion of my trustees as having charitable objects or such other person or persons who owing to age or ill health shall be in need of financial help for their respective care or maintenance as my trustees shall in their absolute discretion from time to time select or determine”. By cl. 15 the testatrix defined the vesting date as sixty years from the date of her death or on twenty years after the death of the last lineal descendant of His Majesty King George V. She died on Oct. 25, 1962. On application for determination of questions arising on cl. 14 and cl. 13 of her will,

Held: (i) the objects defined in the first limb of cl. 14 (b), viz., an organisation or body not registered as a charity but in the opinion of the trustees having charitable objects, were not limited to objects that in law were charitable because the qualification was not the intrinsic character of the organisation or body but the opinion of the trustees, and not only might their opinion be mistaken but also the qualification, literally construed, need apply only to some of the objects of the organisation or body; accordingly the trust of income contained in cl. 13 (iii) was void (see p. 621, letter G, and p. 622, letter D, post).

(ii) as it would be possible to determine under cl. 14 (a) whether any organisation or body was charitable, under the first limb of cl. 14 (b) what was the opinion of the trustees as regards any organisation or body, and under the second limb whether any person complied with the requirements of that clause, the test for the validity of a power was complied with, viz., that it must be possible to ascertain with certainty whether any particular person or organisation complied with the requirements of cl. 14; accordingly the powers contained in cl. 13 (ii) and (iv) were valid (see p. 623, letters D and G, and p. 624, letter D, post).

D

(iii) the ultimate trust of capital in cl. 13 (v) was for such of the beneficiaries as had received income or capital "during the period immediately prior to five years of the said vesting date" and accordingly it would be valid if the specified period were certain; cl. 13 (v) contained a plain misdescription of the period which the testatrix clearly intended, and accordingly the words last quoted would be construed as "during the period of five years immediately preceding the vesting date" with the consequence that the trust so construed was valid (see p. 624, letter G, post).

Adjourned Summons.

This was an application by originating summons dated Oct. 24, 1966, by the plaintiffs, Hugh Stuart Stucley Trotter and Laurence Parsons, who were the executors and trustees of the will and codicil of Clara Henrietta Wootton ("the testatrix"), for the determination of the following questions:—(i) whether on the true construction of the will, cl. 14 thereof effectively defined the persons or objects entitled or eligible to receive any part of the income or capital of the residuary estate of the testatrix or whether such clause was void on the ground of uncertainty or otherwise; (ii) if it were determined that cl. 14 effectively defined the persons entitled or eligible as aforesaid, whether on the true construction of the will the plaintiffs as trustees might lawfully apply the residuary estate in accordance with the direction of the testatrix contained in all or any one or more and, if so, which of the following sub-clauses of her will, viz., cl. 13 (ii), (iii), (iv), (v). The relevant provisions of the testatrix' will are set out at letters F to I, below, and p. 621, letter A, post. The defendants were Angela Phyllis Duffin, who claimed as a next-of-kin of the testatrix to be entitled to participate in any property as to which she had died intestate and Her Majesty's Attorney-General.

M. W. Cockle for the first defendant, the next-of-kin.

N. C. H. Browne-Wilkinson and Jonathan Parker for the Attorney-General.

PENNYCUICK, J.: This originating summons raises certain questions on the construction and effect of the will of Clara Henrietta Wootton to whom I will refer as "the testatrix". The principal question is concerned with the validity and effect of the trusts and powers created in relation to her residuary estate. The testatrix made her will on July 7, 1961. She appointed the plaintiffs on the summons, Mr. Trotter and Mr. Parsons, to be her executors and trustees. She made a number of specific and pecuniary legacies. By cl. 13 of her will she bequeathed her residuary estate to the trustees and directed them to invest it. I will read the succeeding sub-clauses of cl. 13 and cl. 14:

"13 . . . (ii) To accumulate the income arising therefrom for a period of twenty-one years from the date of my death and invest such accumulations in any of the investments hereby authorised or at the absolute discretion of my trustees to pay the whole or any part of such income as aforesaid to such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof in such shares and manner and at such times as my trustees shall in their absolute discretion think fit.

"(iii) After the expiration of twenty-one years to pay the whole of the said income to such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof in such shares and manner and with such direction as aforesaid until the vesting date mentioned in cl. 15 hereof

"(iv) Notwithstanding cl. (ii) and (iii) hereof I declare that my trustees may at any time until the said vesting date pay or during such period apply the whole or any part of the capital then representing my residuary estate to such one or more exclusively of the other or others of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof in such shares and manner and at such times as my trustees shall in their own absolute discretion think fit.

"(v) Subject as aforesaid my trustees shall on the vesting date stand possessed of that part of the capital and income of my residuary estate as shall then remain in the hands of my trustees and subject to the trusts of this my will for such of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 14 hereof who shall have received income or capital from my trustees as aforesaid during the period immediately prior to five years of the said vesting date and if more than one in equal shares

"14. The beneficiaries for the purpose of cl. 13 of this my will shall mean: (a) any charitable institution or other charitable body in England or (b) such other organisation or body not being registered as a charity but in the opinion of my trustees as having charitable objects or such other person or persons who owing to age or ill health shall be in need of financial help for their respective care or maintenance as my trustees shall in their absolute discretion from time to time select or determine."

By cl. 15 the testatrix defines the vesting date as meaning sixty years from the date of her death

A "or the date of expiration of the period of twenty years after the death of the last to die of the lineal descendants living at the date of the death of his late Majesty King George V (whichever shall first occur) . . ."

The testatrix made a codicil to her will which is not material. She died on Oct. 25, 1962. Her will was duly proved. Her net residuary estate is of the order of £68,000.

B The originating summons raises a number of questions on the will. The plaintiffs are the executors and trustees; the first defendant is Mrs. Duffin who is joined to represent the next-of-kin of the testatrix, and the Attorney-General is the second defendant. The first question raised by the summons is in these terms:

C "1. Whether upon the true construction of the said will cl. 14 thereof effectually defines the persons or objects entitled or eligible to receive any part of the income or capital of the residuary estate of the testatrix or whether such clause is void upon the ground of uncertainty or otherwise."

That question is closely bound up with question 2 which is in these terms:

D "2. If it shall be determined that the said clause effectually defines the persons entitled or eligible as aforesaid whether upon the true construction of the said will the plaintiffs as trustees thereof may lawfully apply the said residuary estate in accordance with the direction of the testatrix contained in all or any one or more and if so which of the following sub-clauses of her will that is to say: 13 (ii) 13 (iii) 13 (iv) and 13 (v)."

E It is, I think, now common ground that the two questions are linked together but do not fall to be answered in quite those terms. The first question to be considered is whether the class of beneficiaries as defined in cl. 14 of the will includes non-charitable as well as charitable objects. It is clear that the class of beneficiaries under cl. 14 (a) are charitable, namely "any charitable institution or other charitable body in England". It is also clear that the class named in

F the second limb of cl. 14 (b), namely "persons who owing to age or ill health shall be in need of financial help for their respective care or maintenance", represents the proper object of a charitable gift, that is, a gift for the relief of poverty. The difficulty has been occasioned by the first limb of that cl. 14 (b), namely "such other organisation or body not being registered as a charity but in the opinion of my trustees as having charitable objects . . ." It is, I think,

G really clear that the object comprised in that limb of cl. 14 (b) cannot be regarded as a charitable object. There are two objections to its being so regarded. First, the qualification is not the intrinsic character of the organisation or body, but the opinion of the trustees, and the trustees might be mistaken in their opinion that the objects of any given organisation or body were in law charitable. In the second place it would, on the literal meaning of the words used, be sufficient
H that the trustees should be of the opinion that certain of the objects of the organisation or body were charitable, notwithstanding that even in the opinion of the trustees the organisation or body had other objects which were not charitable. There is there no such word as "exclusively" or "only".

I Counsel for the Attorney-General contended, without any show of optimism, that the trustees can only properly form the opinion that the objects of a given body are charitable if those objects are in truth charitable. That, I think, is simply to strike out the opinion of the trustees as part of the qualification, and such a construction is, I think, not legitimate. If this point were otherwise doubtful it would be concluded by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Oxford Group v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), where one of the objects of the company concerned was to do all such other things as are incidental or conducive or the association may think conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any of them. It was held that the object was not charitable (see per COHEN, A.L.J. (2):

"Then, again, under para. (10) of sub-cl. (C), the association is empowered to do, not merely things which are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the main object, but also such things as the association may think conducive to it. In other words, the question which the court would have to decide, if any activity of the association was being challenged as being ultra vires, would be not whether, in the opinion of the court, the activity was conducive to the main object, but whether the association, in undertaking it, had thought it conducive."

It would follow that if there were a trust of the residuary estate for the beneficiaries as defined in cl. 14, that trust would be void. (See, for example, Chichester Diocesan Fund and Board of Finance (Incorporated) v. Simpson (3). However, that is by no means the end of the matter because the testatrix has not purported to create a trust for the beneficiaries as defined in cl. 14. What she has done in cl. 13 is to create a number of powers and trusts in favour of the beneficiaries or some of them. To get it out of the way, the trust in sub-cl. (iii) is clearly void after the expiration of twenty-one years to pay the whole of the income between the beneficiaries.

It remains to consider the powers in cl. 13 (ii) and cl. 13 (iv) and the ultimate trust in cl. 13 (v). I will consider first the powers. The general principle as to the validity of a power, where it is impossible to make a complete list of the possible objects of the power, has been considered in a number of cases, in particular Re Gestetner (decd.), Barnett v. Blumka (4), Re Coates (decd.), Ramsden v. Coates (5) and Re Sayer Trust, MacGregor v. Sayer (6). I will cite the last-mentioned case because it raises in a clear form the distinction between the validity of a trust in such circumstances and the validity of a power in such circumstances. In that case it was held (i) that as, on the evidence, it was impossible to make a complete list of persons who had been employed by the company since its incorporation, the trust to distribute the surplus was necessarily void, and the ultimate surplus was held on a resulting trust for the settlor. Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Broadway Cottages Trust, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Sunninglands Trust (7) applied. (ii) That since, to exercise the powers collateral, it was not necessary to ascertain a whole class of beneficiaries, but only whether a particular praepositus was an object of the power (see Re Gestetner (decd.) (4) and Re Coates (decd.) (5)), and since there was sufficient certainty in cl. 4 of the deed to make that possible, the question whether any particular praepositus was a "dependant" or a "dependent relative" could be answered by the committee or by the court. (iii) That the absence of a gift over on failure to exercise any of the powers did not make the power invalid and inoperative so that the fund was held on trust for the settlor from the execution of the deed, as, in default of the execution of the trust to distribute the surplus, there arose by operation of law a trust in favour of the settlor which the court would execute.

UPJOHN, J., said this (8):

"A different and difficult problem arises, however, with regard to the exercise of the powers during the life of the fund under cl. 4 and on the winding-up of the fund under cl. 6, those both being, as I have said, not trust powers but powers collateral. In such a case the authorities establish that it is not necessary that the whole class of possible beneficiaries should be ascertained or ascertainable. That is in complete contrast, of course,

A with the case of a trust power. It is enough, if it is possible to treat it with sufficient certainty, whether any particular praepositus is an object of the power or not."

He then refers to the cases which I have mentioned.

B I should, I think, at this stage refer to the recent case of Re Gulbenkian's Settlement Trusts, Hacobian v. Maun (9) in which the Court of Appeal followed the principle laid down in such cases as Re Gestetner (decd.) (10) and Re Sayer Trust (11). LORD DENNING, M.R., however, used slightly different language. He said this (12):

C "4: Powers collateral. These are cases where a trustee has a power, but not a duty, to apply the capital or income of a fund amongst a group of persons. In such cases, even though the group may be uncertain and imprecise, nevertheless the gift is not bad so long as there are some persons who come fairly and squarely within it."

D That is not quite the same test as laid down in Re Gestetner (decd.) (10) and Re Sayer Trust (11), as I read them. In those cases the test laid down was that it would be possible to say of any given individual whether or not he was an object of the power. In the passage in LORD DENNING's judgment it is sufficient to show that there are some persons who come fairly and squarely within the power. I am not concerned in the present case with any distinction there may be in the test as laid down in those authorities. I am content to take the more stringent test as laid down in Re Sayer Trust (11).

E In the present case the qualification of a beneficiary is such that it would be possible to determine with certainty whether any given organisation or body fell within it. The first group is charitable institutions or other charitable bodies: it would always be possible to tell of any institution or body whether or not it was charitable. The second group is organisations or bodies which in the opinion of the trustees have charitable objects. Again it would always be possible to determine with certainty what is the opinion of the trustees as regards any given organisation or body. The third group is persons who owing to old age or ill health are in need of financial help for their respective care or maintenance. Again, one can always determine with certainty, given all the facts, whether any particular person complies with that requirement.

F Unless there is any more to it, it follows that the power contained in cl. 13 (ii) is valid, that is to say the trustees during the twenty-one year period have power to apply any part of the income for any one or more bodies or persons who possess the qualification as beneficiaries laid down in cl. 14. Equally, the power to apply capital contained in cl. 13 (iv) is valid. It is always possible for the trustees to determine with certainty whether any given body or person complies with the requirements of cl. 14.

G Counsel for the next-of-kin contended that a different rule applied according to whether the objects of the power were individuals or objects other than individuals such as here, institutions, bodies and organisations. He was not able to suggest any ground in principle for that distinction, and he cited no authority which bore it out. He did, however, refer to the speech of VISCOUNT SIMONDS in the Chichester Diocesan Fund case (13) where he said this:

H "It is a cardinal rule, common to English and to Scots law, that a man may not delegate his testamentary power: to him the law gives the right to dispose of his estate in favour of ascertained or ascertainable persons. He does not exercise that right if in effect he empowers his executors to say what persons or objects are to be his beneficiaries. To this salutary rule there is a single exception: a testator may validly leave it to his A executors to determine what charitable objects shall benefit, so long as charitable and no other objects may benefit."

It seems to me that that passage is addressed entirely to the case of a trust and that LORD SIMONDS is not addressing himself to the case of a collateral power which was not before the court. I would add that if that passage were addressed B to the case of collateral powers, such powers would not only be invalid where they are in favour of objects, they would equally be invalid where they are in favour of individuals, so that such cases as Re Gestetner (decd.) (14), Re Sager Trust (15) and Re Galbenkian's Settlement Trusts (16) would have been wrongly decided.

I was referred on this point to Re Shaw (decd.), Public Trustee v. Day (17).
 That was a case of a trust, and HARMAN, J., held that he was bound by authority C to treat the trust as invalid and he held, again on authority, that it was not open to the court to validate the trusts by treating them as powers. He said this (18):

"In my judgment, I am not at liberty to validate this trust by treating it as a power."

I think that it is implicit in his judgment, that if he could have treated the trust D as a power and not as a trust, then he would have held it to be valid.

I conclude, therefore, that the powers in sub-cl. (ii) and (iv) of cl. 13 are valid. It remains to consider sub-cl. (v). This point is not, perhaps, of very great practical importance since, if sub-cl. (v) were invalid, the trustees could effec- E tively devote the whole estate to charity by exercising the power under sub-cl.
 (iv). However, I must decide the point. Sub-clause (v) represents an ultimate trust of capital, not for the beneficiaries as a whole which would admittedly be void, but for such of the beneficiaries mentioned in cl. 13 "... who shall have received income or capital from my trustees as aforesaid during the period immediately prior to five years of the said vesting date and if more than one in equal shares." The effect of that provision is that capital is divisible in equal F shares amongst those of the beneficiaries to whom there has been a distribution of either income or capital during a specified period. If the period is certain there appears to be no reason why that trust should not be valid. The difficulty lies in the extremely odd words which the testatrix has used to describe the period. I will repeat those words: "... during the period immediately prior to five years of the ... vesting date ..." Those words are on the face of G them neither sense nor grammar. There are, I think, two possible alternatives: either to treat the period as so uncertain that the court cannot give effect to the clause or to treat the words as a plain misdescription of a certain period, namely the period of five years immediately preceding the vesting date. I feel no doubt reading the clause that that was the intention of the testatrix and it is the obvious period to choose. A period calculated back from any other date would H be extraordinarily capricious and I think with some hesitation that I am at liberty to treat the words that she has used as a mere garbled misdescription of that period.

Gift—Disclaimer—Knowledge of nature of donee's possible claim—Finality of oral disclaimer of attempted gift inter vivos—Disclaimer operating by way of avoidance not by way of disposition of equitable interest—Writing not required under Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5 c. 20), s. 53.

C

In the compulsory liquidation of a company questions arose whether there had been an effective gift by W. of 350 shares in the company to J. and whether, if W. had intended such a gift, J. had disclaimed it. At the age of sixteen J., who was W.'s stepson and had previously been in the custody of J.'s father, came to live with W. and his wife and was treated by W. as a member of the family. W. had built up the company's prosperous business; he was a working mechanical engineer, and a dominant, secretive and difficult man. During service in the army J. married; he returned to live with W. and his wife for three weeks only in 1948 and then moved into his own home. In 1948 W. bought the 350 shares and directed that they be put in the name of J. The transfer did not name the transferee, but it bore a signature purporting to be that of J. J. denied that he had signed it.

By art. 8 of the company's articles of association a transfer of shares had to be signed by both transferor and transferee and had to be attested; and by s. 75 of the Companies Act, 1948, it was not lawful to register a transfer unless a proper instrument of transfer were delivered to the company. The register of members showed 350 shares transferred to J. in 1948 and a transfer of three hundred of them by J. to W. in 1954. Certificates for the 350 and the fifty shares were issued in J.'s name and signed by W. On subsequent changes of the company's name fresh certificates were issued and signed by W. W. alleged that in 1956 J. executed a transfer of fifty shares to him. In September, 1965, the liquidator wrote to J. telling him of these matters and asking whether he claimed to be a shareholder. J. returned the letter with the answer "no" against each question. In March, 1966, according to the evidence, a message was communicated to W. from J. in answer to a question put to him at W.'s request by a third person, that J. said that he had no shares, wanted no shares, and, if any money were to come to him from W., he, J., would not take it. J. did not substantially dispute this in his evidence, and he testified that he first learnt of the matters stated in the liquidator's letter when he received it in September, 1965.

H

Held: (i) (a) the relationship between W. and J. was such as to give rise in 1948 to a presumption of advancement, and, on this ground, as well as on the evidence, an intention on the part of W. to make a gift of the 350 shares was established (see p. 629, letter I, post).

I

(b) the phrase "proper instrument" in s. 75 of the Companies Act meant an instrument such as would attract stamp duty, not an instrument complying with every formality required by the articles of association (see p. 630, letter H, post); and, in the circumstances, having regard to the lapse of time and the issue and revisions of share certificates, the failure to procure the execution of the transfer of the 350 shares by J. amounted only to an irregularity, and W. had made an effective gift, so far as it lay in his power to do so, of the 350 shares (see p. 630, letter E, post).

(i) J. had effectively and bindingly disclaimed the gift of the 350 shares because—

(a) having sufficient knowledge of the nature of his possible claim to the shares, the message that he had sent to W. in March, 1966, constituted a disclaimer, and writing was not made necessary for a disclaimer by s. 53 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, since a disclaimer operated by way of avoidance not by way of disposition (see p. 632, letters B and C, post).

(b) the company's register was rectifiable without any execution of a transfer by J. for the purposes of s. 75 of the Act of 1948, as disclaimer related only to the beneficial interest and avoided the gift (see p. 632, letter E, post).

(c) a disclaimer of an attempt inter vivos to make a gift could not be withdrawn (see p. 632, letter F, post).

Appeals.

These were appeals from two orders of PENNYCICK, J., both dated May 4, 1967, and made respectively on applications by two summonses, one dated Apr. 14, 1966, by Mr. Albert Edward Watson, seeking an order that the list of contributories be varied by substituting his name for that of Mr. Eric Johns. Mr. Eric Johns was the registered holder of fifty shares in Paradise Motor Co., Ltd. ("the company"). On this summons the trial judge made an order declaring that Mr. Johns's name was never validly entered on the register. The second summons, dated Apr. 22, 1966, was issued by Mr. Johns, who thereby sought an order that his name should be included in the list of contributories as the holder of 350 shares in the company; three hundred of these shares were shares registered in Mr. Watson's name and fifty were the shares to which the first summons related. On May 4, 1967, the trial judge dismissed Mr. Johns' summons. Mr. Johns appealed by two notices of appeal, each dated Aug. 11, 1967, against the declaration made on Mr. Watson's summons and the dismissal of Mr. Johns' summons. By a respondent's notice dated Oct. 6, 1967, Mr. Watson gave notice that he would contend on the appeal that the order of May 4, 1967, should be varied by ordering Mr. Johns's name to be removed from the list of contributories and, if necessary, that the liquidator should re-settle the list of contributories. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

- B This is an appeal in the winding-up of the company from a judgment of PENNYCUICK, J. The appeal is in respect of 350 shares, or alternatively fifty shares out of the company's one thousand issued shares of £1 each.

- The compulsory winding-up order on the petition of a creditor was made on Nov. 23, 1965. Usually in such a situation there is no competition to be included in the list of contributories, but on this occasion, as the result of the sale of the company's business, there is a surplus of £12,000 to be divided between the shareholders of the company. By one summons in the liquidation dated Apr. 14, 1966, Mr. Albert John Watson claims an order that the list of contributories be varied by substituting his name for that of Mr. Eric Johns in respect of fifty shares. By the other summons dated Apr. 22, 1966, Mr. Eric Johns seeks an order that the list of contributories be varied by including his own name as holder of 350 shares. The fifty shares claimed by Mr. Watson are part of the 350 shares claimed by Mr. Eric Johns.

- The company carried on the business of motor repairers. It was incorporated on June 27, 1946, as a private company under the name of Kirkstall Motors (Leeds), Ltd. by Mr. Watson and one John Dean, to each of whom 350 fully paid shares were allotted for cash. The name was changed in 1949 to Spread Eagle Motor Co., Ltd., and in 1956 the company's name was changed to its present name.

- E In 1948 Mr. John Dean sold his 350 shares to Mr. Watson for £300 and some vehicles. Mr. John Dean executed a transfer of his 350 shares, and the validity and effect of that transfer is one of the issues in this case.

- The evidence at the hearing was by affidavit, but the deponents were all cross-examined and an additional witness (Mr. Dennis Watson) was called. The main issue in the case was whether a gift of the 350 shares had been made and completed by Mr. Watson to Mr. Eric Johns. The transfer of the 350 shares bore the name of Mr. Eric Johns (who is a son of Mrs. Watson by her former marriage), but he in his evidence denied that he had ever executed it, and this is one of the mysterious features of the case. The transfer did not name the transferee in the space provided but this is not material. The presence of the Johns signature can be taken only as indicating that Mr. Eric Johns was intended as transferee. Article 8 of the company's articles of association provides:

- H “(a) The transfer of a share shall be in writing signed by both the transferor and the transferee and attested and the transferor shall be deemed to remain the holder of the shares until the name of the transferee is entered in the register of members in respect thereof. (b) The instrument of transfer of any share shall be in writing in the usual common form.”

Mr. Watson seems to have handed the transfer to Mr. Kirkman, the secretary of the company, and he entered the transfer in the register of transfers and the name of Mr. Eric Johns in the register of members.

- I The judge's estimate of the characters of the witnesses is very material. He said in his judgment:

“Mr. Watson is a working mechanical engineer, now in his sixties. He built up a prosperous business by his own exertions. He possesses great industry and resolution. He does not pretend to education, but has a full share of cunning. His own assessment of himself was that he was as honest as he could afford to be. In 1942 he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for conspiracy to defraud an insurance company. Mr. Johns describes him as a 'domineering, secretive and difficult man with whom to deal'. After hearing his evidence, I find this description justified. I would not be disposed to accept his evidence except where it is corroborated. Mrs. Watson gave evidence on one particular incident. I do not regard her evidence as adding anything to that of her husband. The other witness called on behalf of Mr. Watson was Mr. Kirkman, a certified accountant practising at 57, Headrow, Leeds, who was the secretary of the company. Mr. Kirkman is a very elderly man; he was not meticulous in carrying out his duties as secretary, at any rate in regard to transfers. His recollection of events which took place more than ten years ago was not very clear, but I thought he did his best to be truthful. Mr. Johns is a man of about forty. He was during certain periods employed by the company. On two occasions by his own admission he misappropriated moneys of the company, although on the second occasion he was compelled to restore them. He now runs a business of his own with his half-brothers. He was himself not above reproach as a witness in every particular, but his evidence was forthright, and on the whole seemed to me to be truthful. The only other witnesses were Mr. Johns's two half-brothers. Their evidence was rather on the edge of the cardinal issue in the case. I saw no reason to disbelieve them."

The facts as found by the judge were as follows:

"Mr. Watson has at all material times lived with Mrs. Watson in the Leeds district. From 1948 onwards he had the entire control of the company's business. Mr. Johns came to live with Mr. and Mrs. Watson at the age of fourteen. He was in the army from 1946 to 1948, during which period he married. On his discharge from the army he came to stay with Mr. and Mrs. Watson for some three weeks before moving to a house of his own. He has not since lived with them. He was employed by the company before he went into the army, and thereafter again until 1954. In 1953 Mr. Watson dismissed him on the first occasion when he misappropriated the company's moneys, but took him back the next day. His name appears as a director of the company from 1949 to 1953, but he never received notice of or attended board meetings. Indeed, according to Mr. Kirkman, there never were any board meetings. He never took part in the management of the company, and Mr. Watson regarded him simply as a workman."

The judge accepted the evidence of Mr. Eric Johns that he did not execute the transfer in 1948. If he did not sign the transfer, what purports to be his signature must be a forgery, and must have been put on either by Mr. Watson or by Mr. Kirkman, whose signature "J. Kirkman, 57 Headrow, Leeds, accountant" appears as attesting witness, and there is no suggestion that his signature is not genuine as well as Mr. Kirkman's signature attesting that of Mr. John Dean. The judge understood indeed that Mr. Kirkman in his evidence said that he remembered Mr. Eric Johns executing the transfer in his office, but Mr. Kirkman's evidence is so confusing, and at times impossible to interpret, that not much reliance can be placed on this.

A curious feature of the case is that the signature "Eric Johns" on the 1948 transfer, and the signature "Eric Johns" on an alleged transfer by which it is alleged that three hundred of the shares were re-transferred by Mr. Eric Johns to Mr. Watson in 1954, are very like and have a resemblance to the signature "E. Johns" on Mr. Eric John's affidavit.

Mr. Watson in his evidence, of course, said that he never made any gift of the shares to Mr. Eric Johns. His expression as: "I did not give no shares to no-one." But as the judge rejected his evidence, this denial cannot carry any weight.

The two main questions, therefore, seem to us to be—(i) Did Mr. Watson intend to make a gift of the 350 shares to Mr. Eric Johns in 1948? (ii) If he did,

A did he complete the gift in such a way that his intention to make such a gift took effect?

Mr. Kirkman's evidence was that Mr. Watson's instructions were to put the 350 shares in Mr. Eric John's name, and that he (presumably Mr. Watson) said that he would like to do something with them. Mr. Kirkman said: "I do not know of anything, but the 350 shares were put in his name at the beginning"; that must refer to Mr. Eric Johns. In the same passage, however, Mr. Kirkman says: "From the beginning we seemed to hold the 350 in abeyance somewhat." In re-examination it seems Mr. Kirkman was asked: "Was the word 'gift' ever used?" and his answer was: "I would not say that, I do not know, not with me it was not." Mr. Kirkman's evidence is not made any easier to understand by the fact that sometimes he is talking of the 1954 transfer by which it is alleged that three hundred of the shares were transferred back to Mr. Watson by Mr. Johns, leaving fifty shares only in Mr. Johns's name.

Finally the judge said that he felt little doubt, and he so found, that Mr. Watson's intention was to make a beneficial disposition in favour of Mr. Johns which would be effective unless and until he chose to recall it. We are a little puzzled by the reference to recall of the gift, because the rule is that a gift cannot be recalled once it has been made unless an arrangement has been made with the donee to that effect. There could not be any such arrangement in the present case. Perhaps the judge meant that the intention to recall, if in Mr. Watson's mind, could not be effective.

The judge, however, had rejected the argument that Mr. Eric Johns was in the position of a "quasi-child" (as it has been called) of Mr. Watson. On this point (which the judge described as a border-line case) we think that he came down on the wrong side. We have been taken through the numerous cases on the subject of a person assuming the position of a parent to a person under the age of twenty-one, and there are certainly some cases which seem to limit the relationships in which such a situation can arise rather strictly. SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Bennet v. Bennet (1), however, re-stated the law on the subject in such a way that the matter is dependent on the circumstances of the individual case. The position is in our view stated correctly in SNELL'S PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY (1966 Edn.) at pp. 192, 194, supported by UNDERHILL ON LAW OF TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES (11th Edn.) at pp. 193, 194. The matter is of importance on the question of onus of proof, for if there is a presumption of advancement, the onus is on those who dispute the gift, while if there is no presumption of advancement, there is primarily a resulting trust in favour of the person who paid the money, which has to be rebutted by effective evidence. The judge was, we think, mistaken in thinking that Mr. Eric Johns came to live with Mr. Watson and his mother at the age of fourteen; we think that it must have been at the age of sixteen. On the dissolution of his mother's first marriage, his father was given the custody of Eric, and we think that it was not until that order expired when he was sixteen that Eric went to live with Mr. Watson. Mr. Watson was, however, obviously very fond of him and treated him as a member of the family and as one of his sons, and on the same footing as his three sons by Eric's mother both before and after he actually married Eric's mother.

Eric went into the army in 1946, but when he was demobilised in 1948, though he married before he left the army, he rejoined the Watson family with his wife until he obtained a home of his own. Mr. Watson treated him with the indulgence which a father would show to a son until the final break when the step-brothers left with Eric to set up their own business. We think that there was the necessary relationship to create a presumption of advancement. We see no reason, therefore, to differ from the judge's finding of an intention to make a gift of the 350 shares, though we differ from him in his rejection of the presumption of advancement.

The next question then is whether the gift was effective. As has been mentioned, the transfer does not comply with the articles of the company (art. 8) because it has not been signed by the transferee. A further difficulty is caused by the provisions of s. 75 of the Companies Act, 1948, which provides as follows:

“Notwithstanding anything in the articles of a company, it shall not be lawful for the company to register a transfer of shares in or debentures of the company unless a proper instrument of transfer has been delivered to the company: . . .”

The transfer to the present case is certainly an instrument, and it appears that the section was passed to make sure that there was an instrument which could be stamped with stamp duty. The question is whether in the present case it is a proper instrument of transfer so as to satisfy the section, and whether the absence of the transferee's signature makes the transfer a nullity. Mr. Dean, the transferor, duly signed the transfer, and Mr. Watson (who had paid the price for the 350 shares) directed Mr. Kirkman, the company's secretary, to register the transfer and to register Mr. Eric Johns as the owner of the shares, which Mr. Kirkman accordingly did. Further, share certificates were issued showing Mr. Eric Johns as the owner of the 350 shares, and these were signed by Mr. Watson as director of the company, and fresh certificates were issued and signed by Mr. Watson each time that the name of the company was changed.

There is plenty of authority for the proposition that neglect of unessential matters on a transfer may not be fatal to the transfer's validity, and may amount to mere irregularities; see BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS (13th Edn.) at pp. 810-811 in the notes to art. 22 of Table A. It is stated on p. 811: “. . . lapse of time, coupled with recognition of the transferee as a shareholder, may render the transfer incapable of being impeached.” In view of the lapse of time and Mr. Watson's actions in regard to the shares, Mr. Watson surely cannot now be allowed to take advantage of his own failure to procure execution of the transfer by Mr. Eric Johns. This can be treated as a mere irregularity. The transfer was not invalid and Mr. Watson may be treated as having done everything which was needed on his part to complete the gift of the shares; compare Re Rose, Rose v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2).

The judge considered that the transfer was a nullity for lack of the transferee's signature, but as indicated, these being fully paid shares, we consider that it may be regarded as an irregularity. He also considered that it was not a “proper instrument” for the purposes of s. 75, and that therefore the registration was illegal, and consequently void; but we do not consider that a “proper instrument” necessarily means an instrument complying with the formalities prescribed by the articles; indeed, the section includes a case in which the articles may not provide for any transfer by instrument. Having regard to the purpose of the section, we would construe the phrase as meaning an instrument such as will attract stamp duty under the relevant fiscal legislation.

We come finally to the question whether the gift was disclaimed by Mr. Johns. The material relevant to this point consists partly in correspondence, and partly in evidence of statements by Mr. Johns. In July, 1965, the liquidator wrote to Mr. Johns asking whether he was a shareholder, and if so would he send his share certificate, and whether he had transferred fifty shares to Mr. Watson in 1956. There being no answer, the liquidator repeated his requests and said: “It is in your own interests to let me have this information as, if you are a shareholder, it may be that you will be entitled to share in any return of capital that is made in this liquidation.” Mr. Johns replied that he could not help in any way about the share certificate or about the fifty shares transferred to Mr. Watson in 1956. On Sept. 8, 1965, the liquidator wrote telling Mr. Johns that according to the register of members, 350 shares were transferred to Mr. Johns by Mr. Dean in February, 1948; that Mr. Johns transferred three hundred

A of those to Mr. Watson in August, 1954; that it would appear that a certificate for fifty shares was issued in Mr. Johns's name in 1954, and that Mr. Watson said that the fifty shares were transferred by Mr. Johns to Mr. Watson in about 1956, a proper form of transfer having been executed by Mr. Johns in the presence of Mr. Watson and Mrs. Watson in the front room of Mr. Watson's home at Birstall. He then asked four questions. First, did Mr. Johns receive the share certificate for fifty shares mentioned? Secondly, did Mr. Johns transfer those fifty shares to Mr. Watson in 1956 or to anyone else? Thirdly, does Mr. Johns claim to be a shareholder of the company (if so, for how many shares)? Fourthly, has he any share certificates of the company? In his evidence, Mr. Johns said that he did not know that he had any claim at all until Sept. 8, which is, of course, a reference to that letter. On Oct. 1, he returned the letter with the word "No" against all four questions. These matters, put together, seem to amount to a disclaimer ("I do not claim") of any right to shares in the company at a time when he understood that it was being suggested that he might have such a right, and had been told that if he had such a right, it might result in him getting money from the company in liquidation.

Then there is the evidence of the message sent by Mr. Johns to Mr. Watson via Ronald. Mr. Watson in an affidavit said that in March, 1966, Ronald said to him: "All he [Mr. Johns] has to say is: 'I have no . . . shares. I want no . . . shares, and if I had any money to come of the bastard I wouldn't even take it' ". Ronald, in cross-examination said that Mr. Johns gave him a message to give to Mr. Watson that he did not want now to do with it, and he were not going to sign it. This referred immediately to an attempt by Mr. Watson to get a transfer for fifty shares signed. Asked if he gave that message to Mr. Watson, Ronald said that he told Mr. Watson. Asked whether the message was in the terms as stated in Mr. Watson's affidavit, he agreed except for a different expletive. Mr. Johns in evidence agreed that he had given Ronald a message to give to Mr. Watson from him, said that he had heard Ronald's evidence and when asked whether that was the message he had given Ronald to give Mr. Watson answered: "Well, it was near enough true except for the swear words", which shows that he was referring to the passage with expletives in it.

The judge was unable to find either in the answer to the letter or in the message to Mr. Watson via Ronald a disclaimer. In the case of the message he doubted whether Ronald could properly be treated as giving the message to Mr. Watson on behalf of Mr. Johns, but the evidence appears to us to be quite clear on that point. In the case of both, he considered that for a disclaimer of a gift to be effective as such, the donee must possess reasonably full information as to the nature and amount of the gift. We do not think with respect that that generalisation is of universal application, and we do not think that it applies here. The message to Mr. Watson was quite plainly couched in language that showed that he was in no circumstances accepting entitlement to any shares.

That that was then his attitude is made the more likely by the fact that in his evidence (when he knew for certain the value of the subject-matter) he asserted that he did not want any of the money for himself if he won, but would give it to charity, to someone who needs it.

Whether or not the answer to the letter of Sept. 8 was a disclaimer in our judgment the message in March, 1966, to Mr. Watson can have no other colour.

I In this connexion our attention was drawn to Naas v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (3) and in particular to two passages. LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said (4): "Disclaimer can only be made with knowledge of the interest alleged to be disclaimed, and with an intention to disclaim it." LORD WRIGHT said (5):

"Disclaimer of a deed has been rightly described as a solemn irrevocable act. If it is alleged, the court must be satisfied that it is fully proved by the party alleging it, who must also establish that it was made with full knowledge and with full intention. In this case, I can find no evidence that the first appellant ever desired to disclaim."

(3) [1940] 1 All E.R. 485; [1940] A.C. 366.

(5) [1940] 1 All E.R. at p. 506; [1940] A.C. at p. 400.

That was a case in which the person allegedly disclaiming had been led to believe that she had no interest to disclaim, that the deed was no deed. Here, as we have said, there was a sufficient knowledge of the nature of the possible claim; and we may add that before the oral disclaimer the evidence shows that Mr. Johns's solicitor had had a long telephone conversation with the official receiver.

After reserving judgment we heard further argument on two points. The first argument was that there could be here no disclaimer of the beneficial interest in the shares because a disclaimer would be, by re-transfer, a disposition of an equitable interest in property, and neither of the suggested disclaimers was in writing, signed by Mr. Johns; see Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 53. We think that the short answer to this is that a disclaimer operates by way of avoidance, and not by way of disposition. For the general characteristics of disclaimer we refer briefly to the discussion in Re Stratton's Disclaimer, Stratton v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6). Further it was argued that, in the case of the fifty shares still registered in the name of Mr. Eric Johns, disclaimer cannot be effective without alteration of the share register, and this was not possible in law under the section already mentioned of the Companies Act, 1948. The question of the gift, and of the disclaimer of the gift, however, is concerned only with the beneficial interest. The answer to this point is that if the gift is avoided by disclaimer, the company's register is rectifiable as of right without the execution of any transfer.

The second argument was based on decisions that in a case of disclaimer of a benefit under a will, a disclaimer may be withdrawn if no-one has changed his position on the faith of it. We do not decide whether these decisions (or dicta) are correct: they are Re Young, Fraser v. Young (7) and Re Cranstoun's Will Trusts, Gibbs v. Home of Rest for Horses (8). It seems to us, however, that disclaimer of an attempt inter vivos to make a gift cannot be withdrawn. Maybe a will remains an outstanding offer of a gift; but surely this is not so when the proposing donor, rebuffed, is still alive.

Counsel proposed that if A tenders to B by post a deed poll conveyance of property by way of gift, and B returns it by post with refusal and contumely, but telephones later to withdrawn his refusal, the gift is effective. We can but say that this would be a remarkable situation that we cannot accept. We see no reason why a rebuffed would-be donor, no longer willing because of the rebuff, should be held to his offer of benevolence. A dead testator is no longer conscious, in worldly terms of rebuff. Assuming, therefore, the cited cases to be correct, they are quite different, and bear no relation to disclaimer of an attempted gift inter vivos, and we note the word "irrevocable" in the passage cited from LORD WRIGHT.

Accordingly, in our judgment, the claim of Mr. Eric Johns to the shares must fail; but the form of the orders to be made may need some discussion.

*Appeals dismissed. Order dated May 4, 1967, made on the summons dated Apr. 14, 1966, varied and, in lieu of the declaration therein, declaration that the appellant had disclaimed the gift of such shares as had been given to him and that the list of contributories of the company be varied by substituting in respect of fifty shares for the name of Mr. Johns the name of Mr. Watson; order varied, affirmed (9). Evidence—Tribunal—Rules of evidence governing admissibility in court of law not applicable—Logically probative evidence admissible before tribunal—Town planning inquiry—Letter written admitted in evidence—Other evidence given by witnesses on oath—Letter relied on—Finding based on letter upheld.

D A tribunal, acting under statutory authority, is entitled, unless the statute provides to the contrary, to act on any material which is logically probative: accordingly, where an inspector conducting a town planning inquiry, received evidence of witnesses testifying on oath and also a letter, written by a person who did not attend the inquiry and not verified on oath, the statements in which were relevant and were put to the witnesses who contradicted them, the inspector, and the Minister on appeal, were entitled to rely on the letter if they thought fit (see p. 634, letters H and I, and p. 635, letters B and C, post).

Application for leave to appeal.

I In 1961 the appellants, T. A. Miller, Ltd., had bought the business of Fogwills, Ltd., who occupied the Burnt Common Nurseries at Send near Woking, which Fogwills, Ltd. had used as a nursery for producing seeds and plants and also for selling seeds and plants bought from other suppliers. The appellants, having opened a garden centre at these nurseries, where they sold garden ornaments, furniture, garden accessories, tools and fertilisers, etc., were served with an enforcement notice issued in July, 1966, by the second respondents, Guildford Rural District Council, on the ground that there had been a material change in the use of the land for which planning permission had not been obtained. The appellants appealed to the Minister against the notice. An inquiry was held by an inspector who heard evidence on oath from witnesses, who were cross-examined and re-examined. He admitted also in evidence a letter, dated Nov. 19, 1964, from a Mr. Fogwill, who had been managing director of Fogwills, Ltd., in which Mr. Fogwill stated:

"When we occupied the premises referred to, it was broadly true that only produce produced at those premises was sold there, except that stock of packeted seeds produced elsewhere was normally kept there... we can assure you that no gardening equipment or furniture of any bulk was ever stocked at the premises or even trans-shipped there, unless there were some very isolated occurrences which may have escaped our attention."

The inspector relied on the contents of this letter, and in his report found that—

"Between 1946 and the winter of 1960/61 retail sales of imported goods, except packeted seeds, diminished to an almost non-existent level, as stated by Mr. G. M. Fogwill, managing director of the firm who only some 3½ years previously had vacated the nursery."

The inspector came to the conclusion that on the evidence before him development had taken place within a period of four years before July 28, 1966, which was the date of the enforcement notice. The appellants appealed to the Minister, who dismissed their appeal. By notice dated June 27, 1967, the appellants applied to the Divisional Court for an order remitting the matter to the Minister for re-hearing and determination. By order dated Dec. 5, 1967, the Divisional Court dismissed the appeal. By notice of motion dated Jan. 17, 1968, the appellants sought leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal from this order.

Nigel Bridge for the Minister.

The second respondents, the council, did not appear.

LORD DENNING, M.R., stated the facts and continued: The inspector relied on Mr. Fogwill's letter. So did the Minister in his decision. Counsel for the appellants said that they ought not to have relied on it at all. It ought not even to have been admitted because it was hearsay. It was not on oath, no opportunity was given to test it by cross-examination, and it was objected to. Counsel said that in these circumstances it was contrary to natural justice for it to be admitted.

In my opinion this point is not well founded. A tribunal of this kind is master of its own procedure, provided that the rules of natural justice are applied. Most of the evidence here was on oath, but that is no reason why hearsay should not be admitted where it can fairly be regarded as reliable. Tribunals are entitled to act on any material which is logically probative, even though it is not evidence in a court of law (see R. v. Deputy Industrial Injuries Comr., Ex parte Moore (1)). During this very week in Parliament we have had the second reading of the Civil Evidence Bill. The Bill will abolish the rule against hearsay, even in the ordinary courts of the land. It allows first-hand hearsay to be admitted in civil proceedings, subject to safeguards. Hearsay is clearly admissible before a tribunal. No doubt in admitting it, the tribunal must observe the rules of natural justice, but this does not mean that it must be tested by cross-examination. It only means that the tribunal must give the other side a fair opportunity of commenting on it and of contradicting it (see Board of Education v. Rice (2) and R. v. Deputy Industrial Injuries Comr., Ex parte Moore (1)). The inspector here did that. Mr. Fogwill's letter of Nov. 19, 1964, was put to the witnesses and they contradicted it. No application was made for an adjournment to deal further with it. In these circumstances I do not see that there was anything contrary to natural justice in admitting it.

(2) [1911-13] All E.R. Rep. 36; [1911] A.C. 179.

A [HIS LORDSHIP said that the inspector's conclusion (see p. 634, letters C and D, ante) determined the case, as it meant that the garden centre was new development and that, therefore, as the appellants did not have planning permission, the enforcement notice was good.]

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: I agree and have nothing to add.

B EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: For my own part, I should have entertained greater confidence in the correctness of the decision arrived at by the Minister in the light of his inspector's report had Mr. Fogwill, to whose letter the inspector clearly attached considerable importance, been called as a witness and been cross-examined on the assertions in his letter. But that is not the point at issue here. Having regard to such authorities as R. v. Deputy Industrial Injuries Comr., Ex parte Moore (3), it cannot, in my judgment, be said that it was not open to the inspector, and the Minister in turn, to attach such weight to the letter as they thought fit, nor that the rules of natural justice were breached by their so doing.

For that reason I agree with my lords that this application must be refused.

At about 1 a.m. on a Sunday morning in December, 1963, a van crashed D through a fence which contractors had put across a road. As a result the van driver, his wife, who was with him, and another passenger suffered injuries. The driver and his wife brought an action for damages for negligence against the contractors. The passenger brought a similar action against the driver and the contractors. The action by the driver and his wife was heard first. In it the driver was asked in cross-examination whether his capacity to drive was impaired by drink; he replied that he had drunk E only three half-pints of beer during the evening, a social evening at an R.A.F. mess, and that he had gone straight to the mess from his house, making a detour en route only to pick up some petrol. The contractors had not pleaded, and the trial judge did not find, that the driver's capacity was impaired by drink. The trial judge found that the contractors were negligent in not lighting the fence, and gave judgment for the driver and his wife F against the contractors. It was then agreed that the passenger's action must also succeed, and the trial judge gave judgment (on July 10, 1967) for him against the contractors and the driver. At the time of the accident there was, as the defendant contractors had discovered long before the trial, also another passenger, H., in the van. After the trial H. apparently became disgruntled because he received no money from the driver, and G told people that the accident occurred because the driver was hopelessly drunk at the time, having drunk with his passengers for several hours at a public house before going to the mess and having drunk many pints of beer that evening. The contractors heard rumours of H.'s allegations, their solicitor then saw H., who confirmed these. The solicitor then saw the publican and obtained affidavits from H. and from the publican stating that H the driver had been drinking on that evening as previously described. The contractors then appealed and applied for leave to adduce this evidence of
H. and of the publican on the hearing of the appeal.

Held: new trials of both actions would be ordered because—

(i) the contractors' solicitor was not in default in not approaching H. I before the trial, because it was reasonable to suppose that H. would be extremely unlikely to give evidence against his friend, the driver, and that H. himself might at any time bring an action for damages against the contractors; accordingly the evidence of H. was evidence which could not have been discovered by the contractors with reasonable diligence before the trial (see p. 639, letters E and G, p. 640, letter I, p. 642, letters C and F, and p. 643, letter E, post).

(ii) if believed, the evidence must have a most important effect on the

A court's findings as to responsibility for the accident (see p. 639, letter H, p. 641, letter I, p. 642, letter G, and p. 643, letter F, post).

(iii) there was nothing to show that the evidence which it was desired to adduce was unworthy of credence or unlikely to be true (see p. 640, letter B, and p. 642, letter I, post).

Ladd v. Marshall ([1954] 3 All E.R. 745) applied.

B Per SALMON, L.J.: if it is part of a party's case that the other party was guilty of negligence because he was driving when under the influence of drink, that ought to be expressly pleaded (see p. 641, letter D, post).

Appeals and Applications.

In the first of two actions arising out of the same motor accident the plaintiffs, the driver Frederick Raymond Roe and his wife Dorcen Jean Roe were awarded damages by KARMINSKI, J., at Nottingham Assizes on July 10, 1967, against the defendants, Robert McGregor and Sons, Ltd., contractors responsible for certain road works, who were held wholly responsible for the accident. In the second action heard immediately afterwards, KARMINSKI, J., awarded damages to the plaintiff Charles Bills, a passenger in the driver's car, against the contractors and the driver. The contractors appealed against both judgments, and by their notices of appeal asked that the judgments be set aside and that judgment should be given for the contractors, or that new trials be ordered.

F The contractors applied, before the appeals were heard, for leave to adduce further evidence in both appeals. The Court of Appeal adjourned the applications to adduce further evidence to be heard together with the appeals, which were heard together. The facts are set out in the judgment of HARMAN, L.J.

A. de Piro, Q.C., and M. Pearson for the road contractors, the defendants.
G Bernard Caulfield, Q.C., and B. J. Appleby for the driver and his wife, the plaintiffs in the first action.

John Wilmers, Q.C., and F. B. Smedley for the passenger Mr. Bills, the plaintiff in the second action.

H HARMAN, L.J.: These are two motions, heard together, for new trials in two cases arising out of the same accident. The accident occurred as long ago as December, 1963, I am sorry to say. The writs were not issued until June of 1966—inside the three years, it is true, but very stale claims. The claim in one of them was by a man named Roe and his wife, he being the driver of, and she a passenger in, a van (not theirs, I think) going home on a Saturday night at one a.m. in the (Sunday) morning, taking the wrong road, driving through a fence, going over an embankment, and falling thirty feet. By extraordinary luck no very serious damage was done. That was the case of the driver and his wife. The second action was a case by a passenger in the car, Mr. Bills, who sued the driver for negligence and sued over against Robert McGregor and Sons, Ltd., the second defendants in that case, who were road contractors and were responsible for the fence. As the matter turned out, the plaintiff driver and his wife succeeded against the road contractors on the ground of their negligence and it was agreed that if he succeeded so indeed must his passenger, Mr. Bills. So that there were two judgments, one for the driver and his wife against the road contractors, and one for Mr. Bills against the road contractors and against the driver, if Mr. Bills chose to enforce it, for a sum of damages. A

In the course of the driver's action some question was raised, as this was a return from a social evening on a Saturday night at one in the Sunday morning, whether the driver had not had his capacity to drive impaired by the taking of drink. As to that he said that his total intake for the evening was three half-pints of beer, and the judge rightly said that he could not think that that had impaired his capacity at all. The judge therefore held that this was a completely sober driver driving home. The judge found that the obstruction across the road was not lighted, that the two beacons were not lighted which were supposed to warn people that the road was blocked in this way, and that a notice which was there saying "Road Closed" or words to that effect was not something which an ordinary driver would see unless he was looking for it; and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs. B C

There was another man in the car, a man named Harrison. Part of the immunity which they all preserved was perhaps due to the fact that the car was tightly wedged with people: this does happen. When, however, the news of the driver and Mr. Bills's victory went round the public-houses of Newark, as apparently it soon did, Mr. Harrison at once began to protest against it, saying that to his knowledge the whole accident was caused by the fact that the driver was absolutely drunk at the time, quite unfit to drive, and that there had been a miscarriage of justice. Mr. Harrison had kept quiet up till that time. He says that he supposed that the driver had no right of action against the road contractors, but he thought that the driver might recover on his own insurance and that he had promised Mr. Harrison to do something for him out of it. Mr. Harrison therefore kept quiet, thinking that the best chance of getting any redress at all was the hope that the driver would do something for him out of what he got from the insurance company. D E

It was apparently evident by the time of the trial (which was not until comparatively recently July 10, 1967) that Mr. Harrison realised that there was nothing for him. The solicitor for the road contractors was notified by the road contractors of the rumours which they had heard about Mr. Harrison's complainings, and she made some enquiries. As a result, she got into touch with Mr. Harrison, who said that to his knowledge he and every other male occupant of the car were hopelessly drunk and that was why the accident happened. Mr. Harrison said, moreover, that she would find that not only did they go to the social occasion, about which we have heard, but also that they had spent several hours previously in a public-house of which he could not tell her the name. Further enquiries were made and the publican of that house has now come forward. He says that these people, the driver and his wife and Mr. Bills and his wife, were in his public-house that evening and that the men at any rate had been drinking heavily, the driver a good deal more heavily than Mr. Bills. F G H

The gravamen of the charges made against the driver does not end there. It is not merely that he said that he had had only a pint and a half of beer when he had twenty—so the road contractors say—but he also told the judge that he had gone straight to this social occasion from his home, making no detour except one to pick up some petrol. He said further that he did not know about the new by-pass, which was the cause of the closing of this road, which was quite within his area, because during that year he had been in hospital for ten or twelve weeks. It is said now that that was quite untrue, that if he had been in hospital part of that time he had been out of it at the week-ends and that he had been seen in the public-house on a number of occasions in the weeks before the accident. So there is involved not only evidence of new facts but evidence which, if it be believed, will show that the driver was guilty of deliberate deceit of the court, that he was perjuring himself on three subjects, first the amount of drink which he had taken, second the place from which he came, and third his ignorance of I

A the roadway—all of them deliberate untruths if the evidence to the contrary be believed.

It is by no means, of course, to be taken on these motions that this evidence is likely in the end to be believed. These motions are brought for leave to adduce this extra evidence; but in my judgment that would be, in a case of this sort, a hopelessly inconvenient course to take, because quite clearly, if Mr. Harrison and the publican are to have their evidence admitted, evidence to rebut what they say must also be admitted and there must be evidence on one side and the other which will very greatly alter the whole shape of the testimony. The only course for this court, if it thinks that it should do anything, is to order a new trial, and I think that really counsel in the end conceded that that was the proper course to take if the court were moved to take any course.

- C The court has always held its face against new evidence and will only admit it in very exceptional circumstances. The leading case on the subject, which is Ladd v. Marshall (1), says that first of all it must be evidence which could not with reasonable diligence have been obtained earlier, secondly it must be evidence which, if believed, would or might have a very important effect on the mind of the tribunal, thirdly, that it is evidence which is of a sort which inherently is not improbable. It was argued before us that those conditions, and in particular the first of them, were not satisfied here. It was said that the road contractors' solicitor knew that Mr. Harrison had been in the car: she had only, as it is said, to go to him and ask him for a statement and the whole matter would have come out at a much earlier stage and there could have been no need to come at this date and ask for the admission of fresh evidence. It is said that the solicitor made an error of judgment which, although perhaps understandable, be it said, was not excusable in the sense that she could have been said to have acted with reasonable diligence. In my opinion that charge entirely fails. I cannot see that there was any default at all on the part of the very experienced solicitor acting for the road contractors in not approaching Mr. Harrison. He was a man directly in the other camp. He might be expected at any moment to start proceedings himself for damages, although he had not done so nor sent any letter making any claim hitherto. He was a person who was unlikely in the extreme, it might reasonably be supposed, to be willing to give evidence against his friends in the car that they were all drunk at the time; and I cannot think that it was any part of the duty of this lady acting as solicitor to the defendants, the road contractors, to go and try to worm something out of Mr. Harrison. Indeed she expressed the view on oath that her opinion was that it would not have been a proper course to take, and I am far from saying that was not a view which she might reasonably hold. That being so, I think that this is evidence which has come to light since the trial and could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered before it. As to the publican, of course, it is not pretended that he was known or available or could have been with reasonable diligence discovered.
- H I think, therefore, that the first of the conditions in Ladd v. Marshall (1) is satisfied.

If that be so, it goes without saying almost, in my opinion, that this evidence, if believed, must have a most important effect on the judge's view of the contributory negligence or even indeed of the total responsibility of the driver for the accident. The learned judge accepted the driver's view that he had had no drink to speak of at all and came to his conclusion expressly on that view, having put to counsel for the road contractors the alternative either to abandon any reliance on alcohol or to amend his pleadings. Counsel in his discretion did not amend at that time, and I think that he was justified in not doing so, because as far as I can see he did not know, nor did his solicitors know, enough to justify them in making a charge of that sort at that time. Therefore it seems to me that the second condition in Ladd v. Marshall (1) is amply satisfied.

Then it is said, that Mr. Harrison is a man who is disgruntled: that he is not to be credited; that he is a man who has not got out of his friend, the driver, what he hoped that he would get, and his evidence is that of a person who is not to be trusted. As to the publican, it is asked who can say that he remembers which night it was out of the number that have passed since December, 1963. It is said that, therefore, the evidence is not credible. As to that, I think that when the word "credible" is used in this connexion it means that on the face of it the evidence is not worthy of any credence, and I do not think that in this case one can possibly go as far as that. It seems to me that this is evidence as to which, when one reads it without hearing cross-examination and without hearing what rebuttal there may be, one feels that this is not an unlikely story; and that, I think, is enough for the purpose of satisfying the third head in Ladd v. Marshall (2).

The road contractors did not, as I should have expected them to have done, combine this application with an application for leave to amend their pleadings. Without such an amendment I certainly should not think that they ought to be allowed to embark on a new trial, because their opponents are entitled to know at the earliest possible moment what the case is. At a very late stage during the adjournment today, they did produce what seems to us, I think, satisfactory information showing in written form the exact amendment that they propose to make. So I would move the court to make this order: that there be leave to amend in each case and that there be an order for a new trial of each of these two actions.

I ought, I think, perhaps to say something about Mr. Bills's case as opposed to the driver's case. It was said, as far as Mr. Bills is concerned, that he was only a passenger and that therefore whatever happened, unless the blame was held to be solely that of the driver, he must succeed against both defendants (the driver and the road contractors) and was therefore at liberty to execute his judgment against either of them, and that, therefore, in his case the matter was not of any great importance. That would be so, I think, unless the road contractors had applied to amend, as has now been done, by saying that Mr. Bills was guilty of negligence because he knew or ought to have known that the driver was entirely unfit to drive through drink and yet committed himself as a passenger to the car in which the accident occurred. That plea too is made against the driver's wife. It seems to me that there may or may not be something in it, but that it is a matter which should be ventilated in a new trial.

SALMON, L.J.: I entirely agree, and add only a word because we are ordering a new trial.

During the course of the argument certain criticisms were levelled against the ruling of the judge when the driver was being cross-examined in the action which he and his wife brought against the road contractors, Robert McGregor and Sons, Ltd. Certain criticisms were also made of the judgment in that case. In my view there is no foundation for those criticisms. The ruling of the judge and his judgment were both impeccable. On the pleadings as they stood at the date of the trial, substantially the only allegation of contributory negligence made against the driver was that he was driving too fast and was not keeping a proper look-out. The road contractors knew that this accident had occurred at one o'clock on a Sunday morning, when the driver and his wife and the other passengers in the vehicle were returning from a convivial Saturday night spent at a local Royal Air Force mess. It may well be that the road contractors were suspicious as to the sobriety, or lack of sobriety, of the driver of the van. This is not unusual when accidents occur in such circumstances as these. Nor is it unusual that there should be nothing more than suspicion. When the defence was drawn, there was no evidence, and I am quite satisfied that reasonable diligence could not then have discovered any evidence, to the effect that the driver was other than strictly sober. Since there was no material for suggesting that he was drunk, it would obviously have been improper to have made an allegation of drunkenness

A against him, in the hope that one might be able to substantiate it in cross-examination. When the driver went into the box, he deposed to the fact that he had called on his way from home at a petrol station and had then gone straight to the R.A.F. mess, where he had consumed no more than three half-pints of beer. He was being cross-examined by counsel and it looked to the judge, from the questions that were being asked, as if counsel for the road contractors might

B be going to suggest to this witness that he had taken a good deal more than the three half-pints to which he admitted. The judge ruled that on the pleading as it stood counsel would not be justified in challenging the witness's statement that he had only had three half-pints of beer. Counsel, very rightly, accepted that ruling by the learned judge. He said that he would not take the case any further than the suggestion that the driver was very tired and that possibly, being very

C tired, three half-pints of beer which he had drunk in the course of the evening might have affected his driving.

I think that the judge was plainly right. If it is going to be part of a defendant's case—or of a plaintiff's case for that matter—that the other party is guilty of negligence because he has driven when he was under the influence of drink, that ought to be expressly alleged in the pleading. It would be grossly

D unfair to confront a man at the trial for the first time with an allegation that he was driving under the influence of drink and thereby committing a criminal offence. If, however, such an allegation is pleaded, the man against whom it is made will have the opportunity of meeting it. He will go to trial prepared perhaps to prove that he was completely sober. If, however, the issue does not appear on the pleadings he will obviously not bring any witnesses as to the state of his sobriety because he will think, rightly, that that is not in issue. Therefore

E I do not think that any possible criticism can be made of the ruling of the judge.

He found, having very carefully considered the evidence, that he could not place reliance on the evidence called on behalf of the road contractors that they had lighted the fence with which they had closed the road. The road contractors conceded, as I read the evidence, that they recognised that it was necessary, in the interests of safety, to light this obstacle. Their case was that they had lit it.

F There was a great deal of evidence, including police evidence, the other way: that is to say that, although at one time this obstacle had been lit, for several weeks before the accident, the road contractors had forgotten or at any rate had neglected to light the obstacle. Undoubtedly some distance back from the obstacle there was a "Road Closed" sign. The driver was driving with his headlights on, though dipped. The learned judge came to the conclusion on those

G facts that there was negligence on the part of the road contractors in failing to light the obstacle; and I am not at all surprised that he came to that conclusion. He also came to the conclusion, which at first sight may seem perhaps a little more difficult to understand, namely, that the driver was not negligent although he failed to observe the "Road Closed" sign which he had passed well back from the obstacle, or to see the fence that stretched across the whole road, but crashed

H through it on to the embankment below; the judge, however, having accepted, as he was bound to accept, the driver's testimony that he had only had three half-pints of beer during the whole evening, approached the question on the basis that here was a man who was sober and apparently a careful, decent driver. No doubt the learned judge also appreciated that sometimes signs are so placed

I that they are very difficult to see, and that, even although one is keeping a proper look-out it may be possible to miss seeing a paling fence such as this stretching across the road.

The judge's finding certainly was one which, on the evidence before him, I do not think could successfully be challenged; but the position, if the evidence which the road contractors now seek to adduce is adduced at the new trial and is believed, would be very different. HARMAN, L.J., has stated it. I will not recapitulate it. There is the evidence of Mr. Harrison and of the bar steward Gregory, which, if true, shows that the driver and the whole party were drunk when they left the public-house at 10.30 p.m., having spent some three hours or thereabouts in the public-house, drinking at what to some people may seem the astonishing rate of a pint every ten minutes, though I have no doubt that in some parts of the world it is not such a rare feat as perhaps it sounds. Then again, Mr. Harrison deposes to the fact that once they had got to the R.A.F. mess he, the driver and the passenger, Mr. Bills, continued to drink and that they were all, to put it euphemistically, extremely merry when they set off from the R.A.F. club. Now this evidence, as HARMAN, L.J., has said, was revealed in this way. The fact that the accident had occurred must have gone round Newark like wildfire. Mr. Harrison knew very well what had occurred that evening, and Mr. Gregory, if he is speaking the truth, must have remembered what happened during that evening after he heard of the accident; but they kept quiet.

It is said that the first rule or principle laid down in Ladd v. Marshall (3) has not been observed because the very experienced solicitor acting for the road contractors could, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, have discovered this evidence before the trial, or, as I think it was put, half-way through the trial. To my mind there is not substance in that contention. Mr. Harrison was a friend of the driver and his wife and of Mr. Bills, the plaintiff passenger. Putting oneself in the place of the road contractors' solicitor, it would be, I think, only natural to assume that if Mr. Harrison was able to give evidence at all he would be called by his friends to give it for them. Moreover, Mr. Harrison had a clear case for damages for negligence—either against the driver if he chose to sue him, or against the road contractors, or both. The road contractors' solicitor says in her affidavit that she thought—and no one can doubt for a moment that this is no more than the exact truth—that it was likely that Mr. Harrison had a legal aid certificate, limited to issuing a writ but not serving it. I understand that that solicitor is not altogether unacquainted with how the legal aid system works, and any of us who knows anything about it knows that this was the practice in those days, because it was thought that that practice might save costs. It is however a practice that has recently been discouraged by this court, but it had not been discouraged at the relevant time. In those circumstances, not only was it not the duty of the solicitor to go and see Mr. Harrison but also she might well have been criticised had she done so. Therefore to my mind the first principle in Ladd v. Marshall (3) is here satisfied.

That the evidence of Mr. Harrison and Mr. Gregory, the bar steward, if believed, would be likely to have an important influence on the result of both actions really cannot be doubted for a moment: it is self-evident. As far as the driver is concerned, if the evidence to which I have referred is true, then obviously he was guilty of a high degree of contributory negligence. As far as his wife is concerned, if the evidence is true, again, she must have known of her husband's condition—unless hers was such that she was unable to appreciate it; and, if this is so, here again she would be guilty of some contributory negligence. In Mr. Bills's action exactly the same criticism can be made in respect of Mr. Bills's claim. He is in the same position, or may be in the same position, as the driver's wife. It may well be that, although he may still recover in the new action, if the fresh evidence is believed he will bear a substantial proportion of the blame and the damages which he recovers would be correspondingly reduced.

On the question whether the evidence is credible, all that we have before us are the affidavits sworn by Mr. Harrison and by Mr. Gregory. It is true that Mr. Harrison appears to be a disappointed and disgruntled man who may have some grudge against the driver, and I have no doubt that when he gives evidence he will be strenuously—and may be successfully—cross-examined. But there is nothing in his evidence, apart from the matters to which I have referred, which makes it at all unlikely that he may be speaking the truth when he says that during this evening the driver had a good deal more to drink than he should

- A have done. As far as Mr. Gregory's affidavit is concerned, again there is nothing on the face of it which is at all unlikely, and he may be believed. I do not, of course, wish to be understood as saying that in my view these witnesses will be believed. I have not any idea at all whether they will or will not be believed. Everything will depend on the impression which they make on the judge who tries the case, and the impression which Mr. Bills and the driver and his wife and any
- B of the other witnesses who may give evidence on this issue make on the judge.

I have no doubt at all that, this evidence having now come to light, justice demands that there should be a new trial, and I therefore agree with the order proposed by HARMAN, L.J.

WIDGERY, L.J.: I agree that there should be a new trial in this case.

- C The road contractors' first task on their notice of motion is to persuade this court that fresh evidence should be heard. For that purpose they have to establish the three points in Ladd v. Marshall (4) to which reference has already been made.

So far as the first point is concerned, namely whether the road contractors have shown that the evidence could not have been obtained with reasonable diligence, I agree with everything which has been said. This is an issue on which the

- D respondent must, of course, be heard, and one on which no doubt the respondent can lead evidence if he wishes, because it is a matter which has to be finally decided at this stage: but counsel for Mr. Bills, the passenger, no doubt for good reasons, has not sought to dispute the primary facts relied on in the road contractors' affidavits and in the ensuing argument arising out of those facts. I am quite satisfied that the road contractors have succeeded in establishing that the new
- E evidence could have not been obtained with reasonable diligence earlier.

The second and third points arising at this stage seem to me to depend primarily on taking a look at the evidence proffered and considering it against the background of the original trial. On that footing, as it has been said, it is beyond argument, I think, that evidence of the driver's insobriety would have an important influence on the hearing of this case, and would also have an important

F influence on the hearing of Mr. Bills's case, assuming that the pleadings are amended, as now proposed, so as to allege contributory negligence against Mr. Bills in allowing himself to be driven by the driver in that condition.

Of course, once the evidence is admitted in this court, the conclusion that there must be a new trial is a very obvious one. The admission of the fresh evidence raises a new issue of fact which has never been decided and which has to be

G correlated to the other issues which were canvassed in the original trial.

The only course which is appropriate to a consideration of those matters is a new trial, and accordingly, so it seems to me, a new trial is inevitable in each of these cases. Though I recognise and accept the contention of counsel for Mr. Bills that there will be some instances—albeit somewhat special ones—in which a respondent may seek to contest in this court, at this stage, the quality of the

H new evidence which is relied on and its bearing on the need for a new trial, in this case a new trial seems to me to be quite inevitable; and I content myself with that.

*Appeal allowed in each case. Order for new trials before different judge. ## R. v. BONE.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION (Lord Parker, C.J., Widgery, L.J., and Roskill, J.), May 3, 1968.]

Criminal Law—Duress—Defence—Burden of proof—Prosecution has onus of negating duress.

Criminal Law—Evidence Corroboration—Accomplice—Duress by one accused alleged as defence by other accused—Direction to jury.

The appellant and one H. were charged with housebreaking and larceny. H. pleaded guilty and gave evidence for the prosecution. The appellant's defence was that, although he admitted committing the acts charged, he had acted throughout under duress by H., who threatened him with a knife. H. denied this. The jury were given no direction on the way in which they should approach the evidence of H., who was an accomplice, nor were they given any direction to the effect that it was for the prosecution to negative duress; but they were told that it was for them to decide whether they believed the appellant or not. On appeal against conviction,

Held: the conviction would be quashed, because—

(i) the jury should have been directed to approach the evidence of H. that he had not had a knife with great care, should have been given the usual warning with regard to the need for corroboration and should have been told that there was no corroboration (see p. 645, letter G, post); and

(ii) the jury should have been directed that it was for the prosecution to negative duress, and that, if the jury had thought that the appellant's account of duress might be true, then he should be acquitted (see p. 645, letter I, and p. 646, letter C, post).

Appeal allowed.

Appeal.

This was an appeal by Michael Edward Bone, who was fifteen years old, against his conviction at Norfolk Quarter Sessions before the chairman (ROGER NORTH, Esq.) and a jury on a charge on indictment for housebreaking and larceny contrary to s. 26 (1) of the Larceny Act, 1916, in that on Sept. 30, 1967, in the county of Norfolk the appellant broke and entered the dwelling-house of Thomas William George Bone and stole £44 in Bank of England notes, two hundred Reyno cigarettes, eleven Castella cigars, two ounces of Old Holborn tobacco, two packets of Rizla cigarette papers and a Ronson cigarette lighter, the property of Thomas William George Bone in the dwelling-house. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

A The authority and the case noted below* were cited during the argument.

F. P. Keysell for the Crown.

LORD PARKER, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court:
 What happened was that the appellant, who was fifteen, and another youth,
 B Hadley, who was seventeen, were cycling out in the country on Sept. 30 and came near a public house which was occupied by the appellant's uncle. One of them apparently suggested breaking in. At any rate they did break in, and they stole £44 in cash and a small amount of tobacco and a cigarette lighter. That resulted in their being jointly charged with this offence. Hadley pleaded guilty and was dealt with, and gave evidence for the prosecution. The defence was
 C the defence of duress. The appellant said that the older boy Hadley had a knife and had threatened him with that knife unless he went into his uncle's public house and stole; the appellant thereby admitted that he did in fact go into his uncle's public house and did steal. In the course of the case for the prosecution Hadley gave evidence that the appellant did go in, and, because of the question of duress had already been raised in a statement given by the appellant to the D police, Hadley was asked whether he did threaten the appellant. Hadley denied that he had threatened him and, indeed, said that he had not had a knife at all. There was the issue, and the jury convicted.

There are two points that arise in this case. The first, and that on which leave to appeal was given, concerns the absence of any direction by the chairman as to the way in which the jury should approach the evidence of Hadley, who
 E was clearly an accomplice. There was no direction at all along the usual lines in this case, and when the chairman had concluded his summing-up counsel for the appellant rose to his feet and suggested that there ought to have been a direction. It is clear to this court that the chairman felt that he had been right in not giving a direction because in fact the appellant had admitted that he had broken in and stolen. In other words, in an ordinary case it would have
 F been academic to tell the jury the usual formula in regard to corroboration, since the chairman would have gone on to tell the jury that they need not bother about that because it is admitted that the appellant broke into his uncle's public house.

In the opinion of the court, however, that is not in this case a complete answer. The chairman should have directed the jury along the usual lines in regard to G this matter of duress. He should have told the jury that they must approach the evidence that Hadley had given that he had not had a knife and had not threatened the appellant with great care, and given the usual warning in regard to corroboration. Finally, he should have told them that, in fact, there was no corroboration. On that ground alone this court feels, though reluctantly, that this conviction must be quashed.

H There is, however, another ground to which the court would like to draw attention. It concerns the burden of proof. Duress, like self-defence and like drunkenness, is something which must in the first instance be raised by the defence; but at the end of the day it is always for the prosecution to prove their case, which involves negating the defence which has been set up. It has been
 I said in many cases, particularly self-defence cases, that to ensure that the jury are not confused it is not sufficient to give the general direction at the beginning in regard to the burden and standard of proof, but the jury should be told specifically that it is for the prosecution to negative, in that case, the self-defence (1). In the present case the chairman gave an impeccable direction at the beginning as regards the burden and standard of proof, but thereafter in dealing with this matter of duress he gave no further direction, and time and again referred to the issue as being whether the jury believed that a knife was used. He said: A

"... but [the appellant], if you believe him, and it is a matter for you to decide whether you believe him or not, if you believe him, that his companion produced his knife and pointed it towards him and [the appellant] says 'I was so frightened for my life I thought I had to do as he told me'. If you think that to be the case, it is your duty to acquit... If you do believe it, do you think the threat was such as to deprive [the appellant] of the power to resist. If you think he was so afraid that he had to do what he was told, you must find him not guilty." B

Throughout the issue was being left to the jury as a matter of whether they believed the appellant, and not on the basis that if they thought what the appellant said might be true they should acquit. On that ground also the court has come to the conclusion that the verdict should not be allowed to stand. Accordingly, this appeal is allowed. C

CARTWRIGHT v. POST OFFICE. E

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Willis, J.), March 11, 12, 13, 18, 1968.]

Telegraphs and Telephones—Telegraphic lines—Placing of telegraph line across private land—Public interest—Consent of land owner sought by Post Office—Failure to give consent—"Amenities" not impaired—Two farming households in neighbourhood thereby deprived of telephone service—Whether failure to give consent was contrary to public interest—Wayleave—Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5 c. 40), s. 1. F

By notice given in August, 1966, in the exercise of statutory powers under the Telegraph Acts, 1863-1962, the Post Office required (pursuant to s. 1 of the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916*) the consent of C., as landowner and occupier, to the placing of a telegraphic line across three sections of her property and the fixing of a telegraphic wall-bracket on a farmhouse which she owned and had let, so as to enable two neighbouring farmhouses to have their own telephone service. The area was remote and exposed, and communications in winter were sometimes precarious due to snow. Both farms (twenty acres and 120 acres in size respectively) carried livestock and were approximately 2½ miles from the nearest village (at which a fire engine was located) and seven miles from a town which was the centre for veterinary and other farming services; their households, including in one case three school children at different schools, comprised nine persons. C.'s property consisted of a restored seventeenth century house on land which was partly wooded and of some, but not of very great, landscape value. The court was satisfied, for the purposes of the proviso to s. 1 of the Act of 1916, that the route proposed by the Post Office for their line (a flying wire over two sections of C.'s property and taking the wire under the surface of C.'s drive in the remaining section) involved no depreciation in value of the land nor any reduction in its amenities†. C. did not give her consent. On appeal from an order of the county court giving consent G

A under s. 1 to the Post Office's proposal subject to a small annual wayleave payment,

Held: consent would be granted for the placing of the telegraphic line on the route proposed by the Post Office (see p. 654, letter D, post.), since C.'s failure to give consent was contrary to the public interest for the following reasons—

B (i) an efficient farming industry was in the public interest, and the telephone service was necessary for the efficient operation of the two farms, as also for the emergencies of accidents, sickness and fire (see p. 653, letter F, and p. 653, letter I, to p. 654, letter A, post.).

C (ii) although neither a class of persons nor a large number of persons was involved but only two households were denied a telephone, the court was not precluded from finding that the failure to give consent was contrary to the public interest, for the public interest was to be considered on the facts of each case at the time when the question arose for decision (see p. 653, letter E, post.).

D Semble: the maintaining of personal contacts between members of the community, particularly in remote areas, was also in the public interest (see p. 654, letter B, post.).

Appeal.

G This was an appeal by way of re-hearing under s. 4 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, as substituted by the Railway and Canal Commission (Abolition) Act, 1949, s. 2 (1), by the appellant, Mrs. Lucy Cartwright, of Sharpcliffe Hall, Ibstones, Stoke-on-Trent, in the county of Stafford, from an order of His Honour JUDGE HARRINGTON made in the Leek county court on Sept. 4, 1967, whereby he gave consent to the placing of a telegraph line by the respondents, the Post Office, across land owned by the appellant ("Mrs. Cartwright") and to the placing on a farm known as Cottage Farm all telegraphs and contrivances necessary for provision of a telephone service to the occupants of the building. The telegraphic line was to be carried across (a) the northern part of Whitehough Wood, (b) under the drive of Sharpcliffe Hall, at positions shown on a plan, and (c) across Sharpcliffe Wood at a position shown on the plan to the building known as Cottage Farm. The purpose of the placing of the line was to enable telephone facilities to be enjoyed by two neighbouring farms, of which Cottage Farm was one. The consent given by the court was subject to certain terms, one of which was for the carrying of the telegraphic line underground between positions shown on the plan, i.e., crossing under the drive to Sharpcliffe Hall; and the other was for the payment to Mrs. Cartwright of annual sums of 2s. 6d. in respect of the wayleaves first and last referred to above. By notice dated Dec. 30, 1967, Mrs. Cartwright appealed, seeking that the order of the county court judge be set aside and alleging, among other grounds, that his judgment was contrary to provisions of the Telegraph Acts, 1863-1962, including s. 1 of the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916, the terms of which are set out at p. 651, letters D to F, post.

The following statement of fact is summarised from the judgment of WILLIS, J. The area in question was land with an attractive landscape rising to the north of Sharpeliffe Hall and falling to the south, this being of importance in relation to the siting of telegraph poles from the point of view of their appearance. Sharpeliffe Hall itself was a seventeenth century house, restored in 1860. During the world war of 1939-45 it was occupied by the Red Cross, later by the Youth Hostel Association, and in 1955 it was bought by a firm and application was made in 1956 for outline planning permission to site caravans. Mrs. Cartwright acquired it in 1959, when it was unoccupied; she made application for a siting of further caravans, which was refused. The telegraph lines were to cross at a neck of Whitehough Wood by flying wires, by a route which would not involve the topping of trees. The other section which was not to be carried underground was again a flying wire, in this instance across Sharpeliffe Wood to Cottage Farm. Mrs. Cartwright was in process of clearing rhododendron and undergrowth from the wood there, but, although the wire would be clearly visible, it would not be obtrusive. Mrs. Cartwright had objection to the wires, but this was a general objection to overhead wires. His Lordship (WILLIS, J.) intimated that he was quite satisfied that the Post Office's proposals would involve no depreciation in value of the land nor result in any significant reduction in its amenity, using that word as referring to its visual appearance and the pleasure of its enjoyment. The siting of the poles on the route proposed by the Post Office was such that all the poles would be on the land of Home Farm which was not owned or occupied by Mrs. Cartwright.

Three hereditaments were concerned: Sharpeliffe Hall, which was a house and estate owned by Mrs. Cartwright; Home Farm, owned by a Mr. Barker, and Cottage Farm, which was a smaller farming unit, owned by Mrs. Cartwright and leased to a Mr. Morris. Before Mrs. Cartwright acquired Sharpeliffe Hall in 1959, Mr. Morris and Mr. Barker both had telephones, and there had previously been a coin-operated private box at Sharpeliffe Hall. Mrs. Cartwright's husband became a subscriber for a telephone at Sharpeliffe Hall and remained a subscriber between 1959 and 1965, during which time some £82 arrears of Post Office dues accumulated. In June, 1965, a sum of £70 was owing to the Post Office. This sum had never been paid. On June 9, 1965, the Post Office, having given Mr. Cartwright considerable latitude, eventually cut off the telephone. His LORDSHIP said that thereafter Mrs. Cartwright had conducted a skilful and determined guerilla against the Post Office. She required the Post Office to remove all telegraph poles from her property. Various other steps were taken. His LORDSHIP intimated that the Post Office had shown themselves ready to consider any reasonable alternative to the removal of the telephone line, which would cut off the other two subscribers, but that Mrs. Cartwright was not prepared to compromise in relation to a wayleave claimed in respect of the period for which the poles had been on her land at a rate, it seemed, of £26 annually. By letter in February, 1966, she offered the Post Office three alternatives: first, that the arrears of the wayleave as claimed should be paid off and that the Post Office should thereafter pay an annual wayleave of £2 per pole; alternatively that the suggested wayleave of £26 per annum should be paid as from May, 1965; and last, the alternative that all poles and equipment should be removed from her property. Agreement on these terms was not reached. On Apr. 27, 1966, the Post Office removed the equipment which at that date was still on Mrs. Cartwright's property. The line was reconstructed, in so far as it had passed over Mrs. Cartwright's land, so as to afford some telephone service to Mr. Barker and Mr. Morris. In May, 1966, the Post Office requested that the line should be re-routed, using poles of the Electricity Board which were in the vicinity of Sharpeliffe Hall. That move was checked by Mrs. Cartwright. On Aug. 15, 1966, the Post Office requested Mrs. Cartwright, pursuant to s. 1 of the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916, for consent to the construction of a line over three sections of her property and to allow apparatus to be fixed to Cottage Farm.

- A The route which the Post Office requested, which was the subject of the consent, involved the placing of no poles on her land, but that there should be flying wires over the neck of land, part of Whitebough Wood, and over Sharpeliffe Wood to Cottage Farm, but that the line should pass underground under the drive leading to Sharpeliffe Hall. There was an alternative route, on which apparently agreement with Mrs. Cartwright could have been reached. This, however,
- B would involve the line being taken up a drive which led from the main road to Sharpeliffe Hall for something like a mile. It was feasible from an engineering point of view but was rejected by the Post Office for four reasons: first, that it would be too near the trees; secondly, in effect, that they would be unwilling to have the whole of this line dependent on such security as there might exist for a line which was solely on Mrs. Cartwright's property; thirdly, this alternative
- C would involve greater cost, and fourthly, as all poles, or almost all poles, would be on Mrs. Cartwright's land that fact might give rise to demand of wayleave payment of £2 per pole. His LORDSHIP intimated that the Post Office officials had endeavoured to meet Mrs. Cartwright's reasonable requirements and to continue the service both to her and to her neighbours, but that Mrs. Cartwright had shown herself to be obstructive in these matters and prepared to
- D conduct a vendetta with the Post Office rather than to pay the money which was due. No alternative route, at any rate by reference to a plan, had been put forward until some eighteen months' negotiations had elapsed.

- Mr. Morris, the tenant of Cottage Farm, was not a farmer, but an employee of Leek Rural District Council. His wife farmed some twenty acres. He had a grown-up daughter and a brother living with him and his wife, both of whom
- E worked outside some distance away, so that his wife used the telephone for shopping and in connexion with the farm. The next village, Ibstones, was two and a half miles away. Leek, which was the centre of a number of services in relation to farming, was about seven miles away. The main farming needs, e.g., ordering corn, communication with the artificial insemination service, communication with the veterinary surgeon and communication with the agriculture advisory services, all required the use of the telephone; the communications being to points seven to ten miles distant. The fire engine was at Ibstones and the doctor was at Leek. Mr. Barker bought Home Farm in 1952, with a telephone in situ. He was married and had three children of school age, all of whom went to different schools. This was a remote and exposed area and, particularly in winter, communications were a bit precarious. Mr. Barker
- G farmed 120 acres and had 105 head of cattle on his land. He needed the telephone in connexion with the farm, e.g., to summon the veterinary surgeon quickly, particularly in connexion with fever or magnesium deficiency. There was evidence that unless the veterinary surgeon was on the spot within half-an-hour of getting the complaint, the matter might prove fatal. There was evidence that some ninety-nine per cent. of farms in remote areas did have telephones
- H and a witness, Mr. Kenny, the vice-chairman of the National Farmers' Union in Staffordshire, testified that the business of farming made the telephone essential.

- Mrs. Cartwright raised a number of points on appeal by way of objection. She claimed that no consent had been asked for by, or given to, the Post Office for the line which provided a service to the three hereditaments prior to that
- I line's partial dismantling in April, 1966. His LORDSHIP intimated that, if that were right, the matter was covered by s. 4 (1) of the Telegraph Act, 1892, which was incorporated in s. 2 of the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916, whereby lawful presumption was given to a line which was constructed without compliance with the requirements of the Acts until removal was requested. Mrs. Cartwright further claimed that the consent of the "occupier" had not been sought by the Post Office, nor given, as required by s. 21 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, on the basis that the occupier was her husband who was rated as such. His LORDSHIP intimated that Mrs. Cartwright owned the estate, lived in the house with her husband and family and was plainly an occupying owner. Accordingly, in serving Mrs. Cartwright the Postmaster-General had complied with the requirement to serve the owner and occupier. Mrs. Cartwright further claimed that under s. 1 of the Act of 1916 the Post Office must give her a service. She based this on an interpretation of the proviso to s. 1 which, His LORDSHIP intimated, he could not accept and would not deal with. Mrs. Cartwright submitted that it was not permissible to take into account, for the purposes of the re-hearing, a cost of £220 incurred in April, 1966, by the Post Office in removing the telegraph poles from her land and re-routing such service as thereafter could be given to Mr. Barker at Home Farm. His LORDSHIP intimated that the Post Office were right to recognise their moral obligation to Mr. Barker, and that in so far as His LORDSHIP took cost into account, he would have regard to this matter. Mrs. Cartwright finally asked that the alternative route was to be preferred to that for which the Post Office sought consent. His LORDSHIP intimated that he entertained no real doubt that the alternative route was only a tactical move. Any doubt that he might have had would have been dispelled by Mrs. Cartwright's scarcely covered threat during the case that if the route proposed by the Post Office were to be approved they could expect refusals of consent each time that they sought to maintain that route.

The case noted below* was cited in argument in addition to the case referred to in the judgment.

Mar. 18. WILLIS, J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal by Mrs. Cartwright from the decision of His Honour JUDGE HARINGTON at the Leek, Staffordshire county court, under s. 4 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, as amended (1) by the Railway and Canal (Abolition) Act, 1949 (2). This section provides for an appeal by way of re-hearing to a nominated judge of the High Court from the determination of a county court judge, on the reference to him of a difference arising between the Postmaster-General and a private landowner (to use a compendious phrase). By his order the county court judge gave his consent to the placing of telegraph lines across the land owned by Mrs. Cartwright and attached to Sharpcliffe Hall, Ibstones, Stoke-on-Trent, in the county of Stafford. The order then specified three sections of the line crossing Mrs. Cartwright's land, and, further, gave consent to the placing of what is called in the order, a contrivance, which in fact is a telegraph bracket, on the wall of a house called Cottage Farm, and then continued by imposing certain conditions on the consent. The counterclaim, or what was treated as a counterclaim by Mrs. Cartwright, was dismissed by the county court judge.

I am told that this is the first time since its enactment ninety years ago that a High Court judge has been invited to exercise this appellate jurisdiction and to thread his way through the labyrinthine provisions of the Telegraph Acts (3). Even with such an expert guide as counsel for the Post Office, it is easy to lose one's way in the jungle of cross-references. Indeed, both parties went off on a false trail in this case and found themselves in the Court of Appeal: a very venial error, if I may say so, for which there is respectable precedent since in an earlier case to which I have been referred (4) it was not until the parties were on appeal from a county court judge to the Railway and Canal Commission that it was discovered that the county court judge had had no jurisdiction and

- A that the matter of difference should have been determined by the Railway and Canal Commission at first instance. It is against this background that I should like to congratulate Mrs. Cartwright on the skill with which she has argued her case, and to express the hope that those who are concerned to look into legislation of antique provenance and considerable obscurity might be able to consider whether some simplification of the Telegraph Acts is possible and desirable.
- B In the course of his most able and helpful opening counsel for the Post Office took me through the various Acts, which start with the Telegraph Act, 1863 (5), when landowners had an absolute right to refuse telegraph companies consent to place works on their land, and which show how the development of the telegraph and telephone required frequent legislation, and the extent to which, and the conditions subject to which, the Postmaster-General can exercise what is called
- C monopolistic right and perform his duties. I do not find it necessary to refer to any of them, at all events at this stage, except, of course, s. 1 of the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916, under which the present difference arises, and which reads as follows:

- D “ If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any land or building refuses or fails to give his consent to the placing of a telegraphic line under, in, upon, over, along or across the land or building within two months after being required to do so by notice from the Postmaster-General, a difference shall be deemed to have arisen between the Postmaster-General and that owner, lessee, or occupier, and ss. 3, 4 and 5 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, shall apply accordingly as if it were a difference arising under that Act (6): Provided that the tribunal to which the difference is referred under these sections shall not
- E give its consent to the placing of the line unless satisfied that such refusal or failure is contrary to the public interest; and in deciding whether to give its consent or to impose any terms, conditions, or stipulations, including the carrying of any portion of the line underground, the tribunal shall, among other considerations, have regard to the effect, if any, on the amenities or value of the land of the placing of the line in the manner proposed: Provided
- F also that, subject as aforesaid, all the provisions of the Telegraph Act, 1863 (5), shall apply in the case of the exercise of any powers authorised to be exercised under this section and such owner, lessee, or occupier, shall have and enjoy all the benefits of such provisions.”

- There is, as is to be expected, no definition of “ the public interest ”; but the onus of satisfying the tribunal that the refusal of, or failure to grant, consent is
- G plainly on the Postmaster-General, and this, I take it, is to be discharged on a balance of probabilities. I take it also that the question of public interest is to be decided not only by reference to the matters enjoined by s. 1 of the Act of 1916, but in the light of all the circumstances and conditions as they exist at the present time, notwithstanding that they would probably not have been specifically envisaged by the legislature in 1916.

- H [His LORDSHIP then reviewed the facts and circumstances and the guerilla which Mrs. Cartwright had conducted against the Post Office since the telephone to Sharpcliffe Hall was cut off in June, 1965, and referred to the circumstances of Mr. Morris and Mr. Barker, to their need for the telephone, to the area itself and the amenity or value of the land, and to the matters raised by Mrs. Cartwright by way of claim or objection. His LORDSHIP said that as counsel for
- I the Post Office had asked him to express a view on the position in regard to possible refusals of consent each time the Post Office might seek to maintain the route that they had proposed, His LORDSHIP would comply with the request, though the matter did not arise in the context of the present hearing, and he would express a view on the position. His LORDSHIP continued:] Under s. 4 of the Telegraph (Construction) Act, 1916, it is provided that:

(5) For the Telegraph Act, 1863, see 24 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 962.

(6) For the Telegraph Act, 1878, see 24 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1013.

"Before entering on land or buildings for the purpose of the construction or maintenance of any telegraphic line the Postmaster General shall, except in case of emergency, endeavour to make an arrangement with the occupier of the land as to the times of entry for such purpose, and if any difference arises between the Postmaster General and the occupier it shall be determined in manner aforesaid."

The opening shots in respect of that question have already been fired, because after the learned county court judge had given his decision, and before Mrs. Cartwright had decided to appeal, the Postmaster-General desired to enter on the land (7) to construct the line and Mrs. Cartwright has refused consent. Therefore, there is already before the county court judge a difference as between the parties as to the times of entry for the purpose of constructing the line, and that has been stayed pending the decision of this appeal. It seems to me that this is a consequential provision. Section 1 of the Act of 1916 provides for the question of principle to be determined, whether consent shall be granted to a line on a proposed route, and when that is decided s. 4 seems to me to provide that the Post Office shall act reasonably in relation to their requirements for constructing and maintaining the line; that is to say, they are required to try, except in the case of emergency—whatever that means—to make suitable arrangements with the occupier of the land, so that he is as little disturbed as possible, no doubt whether they wish to construct a line or whether they wish to maintain it. Parliament seems to me to have made provision for the Post Office to act reasonably in the matter, and, at the same time, to have given an intransigent owner the opportunity to delay the construction of the line and to make it inconvenient for the Postmaster-General to carry out his duties, notwithstanding that he would get permission to put the line there under s. 1. I do not know whether it is proper to say this, but I intend to: I can only express the hope, in the circumstances, that Mrs. Cartwright may feel, when the question of principle has been established, that she would not take advantage of whatever rights she has under s. 4, merely to be obstructive and difficult.

I hope I have fairly considered and dealt with most, if not all, of the points—and of course there were many of them—raised by Mrs. Cartwright. None of them seems to me to go to, or affect the root point of this appeal, which is, whether her failure to give consent is contrary to the public interest. This, as is made clear in the judgment in the unreported case of Postmaster-General v. Pearce (8) decided in 1923, is a question of fact. The failure to give consent in this case means that two households, comprising nine people, those of Mr. Morris and Mr. Barker, would be denied a telephone in their houses. They clearly cannot be regarded as "a class of persons", nor "a large number of persons". If, therefore, the test set forth by Mr. Tindal Atkinson, in Pearce's case (8) was the correct one, then the Post Office, on whom the onus lies, must fail. I am not satisfied that that is the correct test.

Counsel for the Post Office referred me to s. 2 of the Telegraph Act, 1892, which opens with these words in sub-s. (1):

"If the Postmaster General considers that the inhabitants of any district or any public authority are debarred from the public convenience of telegraphic communication owing to the refusal or failure of any person . . ."

and he points out that that subsection has been repealed (9) and that there is an inference to be drawn that, in the rather more general words under which I have to consider this matter there is a bias on the construction against the wide and specific words of s. 2 (1), and there seems to me to be some force in that

(7) The Post Office had applied to the county court under s. 4 of the Act of 1916 for the determination when their employees might enter on Mrs. Cartwright's land to construct the lines, and the application had been suspended pending the appeal to the designated judge.

(8) (Nov. 22, 1922), Railway and Canal Commission, unreported.

(9) Repealed by the Act of 1916, s. 5 (3).

A argument. However, the way in which the matter was put by Mr. Tindal Atkinson in Pearce's case (10) was this:

B “The word ‘public’ must, in my opinion, in this connexion be treated as comprising a considerable body of persons. I do not think that the public interest is involved because one person or a few persons are unable to obtain the telephone service by the refusal of an owner to allow his land to be used for the purpose. In any case there must be no reasonable alternative method open to the Postmaster-General to effect a service.”

C As I have said, in my judgment that is not the correct test, and I am fortified in that view by the reference to what was said by ATKIN, L.J., when Pearce's case (10) went to the Court of Appeal (11). It is true that what he said was obiter, but, coming from that source, it is a statement obiter which would necessarily carry the greatest weight. He said this:

D “It is said the Railway and Canal Commission in dealing with this matter have laid down as a general rule that a refusal could not be contrary to public interest unless either a district or a large number of persons were prevented from enjoying the telephone. I do not think it is necessary to lay down whether that would in itself be a true proposition; I am inclined to think it would be too wide and not correct.”

E I think that the public interest is to be considered on the facts of each case at the time when the question arises for decision and that I am not inhibited from considering whether, on the facts, the failure to give consent is contrary to the public interest because only two households are denied a service. Since I am satisfied that the granting of consent would have no significant effect on the amenity or value of Mrs. Cartwright's land and that Mr. Morris and Mr. Barker will suffer hardship by the denial of services, for which the present make-shift arrangement is no real remedy, I have to consider, it seems to me, whether this hardship goes beyond a private inconvenience which would not justify a consent being imposed on Mrs. Cartwright, however capricious and unneighbourly F her attitude might, at the time, be. In other words, is it in the public interest that these two farmers and their households should have the telephone? If it is, it seems to me that it must be contrary to the public interest that they should be denied it.

G The learned county court judge has set out the matter of public interest which seemed to him to be involved and he said this:

H “I accept that it is in the public interest that many private difficulties be either prevented or speedily remedied. If a child is ill I think it is the public interest that a doctor be called as quickly as possible. We provide a free medical service for this purpose and it is in the public interest. On farms accidents sometimes happen with machinery and, although it is an individual who is hurt, there appears to be a public interest that the individual should be treated and cured as efficiently as possible. If a beast is sick, it should be possible to summon the vet. speedily. If a hayrick catches fire it is in the public interest that the fire brigade should be called to put out the fire as quickly as possible. There is an Agricultural Advisory service and it is desirable that it should be possible to call for its services. In winter I made for taking children to and from school.”

I I respectfully agree with that catalogue of matters, all of which seem to me to be in the public interest. Farming is an important national industry: it seems to me that it must be in the public interest that it should operate as efficiently as possible, and it seems to me that there is great force in Mr. Kenny's view,

(10) (Nov. 22, 1922), Railway and Canal Commission, unreported.

(11) (Feb. 23, 1923), C.A., unreported that in these modern days a farmer, particularly in a remote area, cannot operate efficiently without a telephone. One has only to mention the artificial insemination service, the need to be in communication with the vet., and in communication with dairies, and milk supplies; the whole matter being underlined by the recent outbreaks of foot-and-mouth disease. I agree with JUDGE HARINGTON that in 1967 and 1968 the public interest in schooling and medical care is involved in telephonic communication, if possible, between parents and school, and patient and doctor. Indeed, I would go further and hold that it is also in the public interest that personal contact between members of the community, particularly in remote areas, be maintained by telephone. Whether or no what I have called the social needs—which I have just enumerated—of these two households for a telephone are in the public interest, as I think they are, it seems to me to be beyond argument on the facts of this case that it must be in the public interest that these two farms should be on the telephone.

I have considered whether there is a practical alternative to the line for which consent is asked. In all the circumstances, which I need not repeat, I am satisfied that neither the route shown on the plan nor the variant further to the north of the avenue offers a practical alternative. I conclude, therefore, that the failure to give consent is contrary to the public interest, and that consent should be granted for the three sections of the kind which are set out in the county court decision and for the fixing of the contrivance on Cottage Farm.

I have considered what conditions should be imposed on the Post Office and I see no reason to differ from the conditions imposed by the county court judge. These are, first, that the section [crossing the drive of Sharpcliffe Hall], as, indeed, is offered by the Post Office, should be constructed underground. So far as the wayleave payments for the two spans of wire are concerned, I have been told that the normal practice is that no payment is asked for, but that in the rare cases in which it is no more than 4s. a span is paid, and in the circumstances I see no reason to differ from the figure of half-a-crown which was chosen by the county court judge in respect of each of the two spans of wire. I should not leave this matter without mentioning, at Mrs. Cartwright's request, that one of the conditions, if consent were to be granted, should be that the Post Office should make a contribution to the making up of the drive, in respect of which there are apparently already covenantors, by reason of such use as they would make of it when they had to use their vehicles for maintenance. This seems to me to be a quite unreal and unreasonable request to make. No one, of course, can possibly tell how many times a year—or if it will be more than, perhaps, once a year—that the Post Office would need to use the avenue. There seems to me to be some contest as to whether there is some public right of way over the avenue. The Post Office consider, on evidence which I do not have to determine, that there is at least a public footpath, a right of pedestrian way, over the whole length of the avenue. This is not accepted by Mrs. Cartwright, but, as I say, happily that is not a matter on which I have to give any decision. At all events, I have certainly not got evidence before me which would enable me to judge this matter one way or the other, and I do not impose on the Post Office any condition in relation to the making up of the avenue.

A BAMFORD AND ANOTHER v. BAMFORD AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Plowman, J.), March 21, 22, 26, 27, April 3, 1968.]

Company—Ultra vires—Allotment of ordinary shares by directors to counter take-over bid—Directors empowered by articles to issue unissued shares—Directors' action approved by company in general meeting—Whether, assuming directors' action was not in best interests of company and in excess of their powers, the allotment could be ratified by the company in general meeting—Inherent residual power of company over unissued shares.

By way of a defence to a take-over bid directors allotted five hundred thousand unissued ordinary shares of the company to a third company at par for cash. By art. 12 of the company's articles of association all unissued shares were to be at the disposal of the directors. Two shareholders issued a writ against the directors of the company and the company seeking a declaration that the allotment was void and should be set aside. This claim was based on the allegation that the allotment was not made in good faith in the interests of the company and was therefore in excess of the director's power. There was no suggestion that the directors had acted fraudulently. A general meeting of the members of the company was convened at which the action of the directors in making the allotment was approved by a majority of votes. On a preliminary point of law in the action whether, assuming that the directors had not acted bona fide in the interests of the company, the allotment was capable of being ratified by an ordinary resolution of the members of the company,

Held: assuming, as was required for the decision of the preliminary point of law, that the allotment was not made bona fide in the interests of the company, nevertheless the company had a residual power over allotments of shares, which power was exercised at the general meeting and could be validly exercised by the members at the meeting for their own interests, they not being subject to the fiduciary duty of directors to act in the best interests of the company; therefore, the ordinary resolution of the members in general meeting was effective, on the assumption mentioned, to ratify the allotment and did not constitute a usurpation of the powers conferred by the articles on the directors (see p. 665, letters A and H, and p. 668, letters G and H, post).

Preliminary point of law.

This was a preliminary point of law in an action begun by writ issued on Nov. 21, 1967, by the plaintiffs, Rupert Cyril Bamford and Anthony Paul Bamford, suing on their own behalf and on behalf of other shareholders of Bamfords, Ltd. other than the defendants, against Henry Vincent Bamford, Richard F Hawthorn Bamford, John George Bamford and Frederick H. Burgess, Ltd. (herein called "Burgesses") and Bamfords, Ltd. (herein called "Bamfords").

On Nov. 9, 1967, J. C. Bamford (Excavators), Ltd. made a take-over bid for Bamfords. On Nov. 20, 1967, the directors of Bamfords allotted five hundred thousand ordinary shares in Bamfords at par for cash to Burgesses. The directors' meeting on Nov. 20, 1967, at which the allotment was approved, was G attended by the four members of the board of Bamfords, viz., the first three defendants and the plaintiff Rupert Cyril Bamford, who voted against the allotment. The first plaintiff was a substantial shareholder in Bamfords; the second plaintiff was also a shareholder in that company. On Nov. 20, 1967, the first plaintiff resigned as a director of Bamfords. On the following day the writ beginning this action was issued whereby the plaintiffs claimed a declaration H that the allotment of five hundred thousand shares by Bamfords to Burgesses was void and ought to be set aside, and an injunction restraining the first three defendants and Bamfords from issuing any unissued shares of Bamfords without the sanction of a general meeting. By notice dated Nov. 28, 1967, an extraordinary general meeting of Bamfords was convened for Dec. 15, 1967, at which a resolution would be proposed to ratify and approve the allotment to Burgesses I of five hundred thousand shares. By writ issued on Dec. 1, 1967, the plaintiffs claimed against defendants who included the first three defendants in the present action, Bamfords and two other defendants, a declaration, among other relief, that the allotment of the five hundred thousand shares could not be ratified by the members of the company in general meeting. At the meeting of Bamfords on Dec. 15 the resolution ratifying and approving the allotment was duly passed. By order made on Mar. 8, 1968, in the present action, it was ordered that the preliminary point of law set forth in the schedule should be set down for hearing

A and be disposed of forthwith. The terms of the point of law are bellow at letter I, post: the question raised was whether, assuming that the allotment of five hundred thousand shares was not made bona fide in the interests of Bamfords, it was capable of being effectively ratified or approved by an ordinary resolution at a general meeting of Bamfords. It was not alleged that in making the allotment the board had acted fraudulently, but the assumption on which the point

B of law came before the court was that the board had exceeded its powers.

The cases noted below* were cited during the argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment.

H. E. Francis, Q.C., and Paul V. Baker for the plaintiffs.

Michael Wheeler, Q.C., and C. Drake for the first, second and third defendants and for Bamfords (the fifth defendants).

Muir Hunter, Q.C., and R. A. K. Wright for Burgesses (the fourth defendants).

Curr. adv. vult.

Apr. 3. PLOWMAN, J., read the following judgment: This is a preliminary point of law which was ordered to be set down for hearing in the following

D circumstances: early in November, 1967, a company called J. C. Bamford (Excavators), Ltd. (which I will call "Excavators") made a take-over bid for the shares of the fifth defendants, Bamfords, Ltd. (which I will call "Bamfords"). On Nov. 20 the directors of Bamfords allotted half a million unissued 4s. shares of Bamfords to the fourth defendants, Frederick H. Burgess, Ltd. (which I will call "Burgesses") for cash at par. This allotment was attacked by the plain-

E tiffs, who were in favour of the take-over, on the ground that it was not made in good faith for the benefit of Bamfords but in order to thwart Excavators' efforts to obtain control. As a counter to this attack, the board of Bamfords called an extraordinary general meeting of that company for Dec. 15, to consider an ordinary resolution ratifying and approving the allotment to Burgesses. The notice convening the meeting was accompanied by a circular explaining

F the position and stating that the board had been advised that it was right and proper that the opinion of the members should be obtained whether or not they wished the allotment to stand. The extraordinary general meeting was duly held and passed the proposed resolution by a substantial number of votes. Burgesses' half million shares were not voted.

The writ in this action was issued on Nov. 21, 1967, that is to say three weeks or so before the extraordinary general meeting and claimed, among other relief,

G a declaration that the allotment made by the board of Bamfords to Burgesses in November was void and ought to be set aside. Since, however, the question whether the board's allotment had been made bona fide for the benefit of Bamfords would be irrelevant if the resolution of the extraordinary general meeting was effective to cure any possible defect in the board's action the parties

H consented to the following order being made on Mar. 8 last:

"It is ordered that the preliminary point of law set forth in the schedule hereto be set down for hearing and be disposed of forthwith and before the trial of the issues of fact and other issues in this action."

The schedule is as follows:

I "On the assumption (which is made solely for the purposes of the hearing of this preliminary point of law) that the allotment by the board of Bamfords, Ltd. of five hundred thousand shares at par to Fredk. H. Burgess, Ltd. on Nov. 20, 1967, was not made bona fide in the interests of Bamfords, Ltd. because it was a tactical move in a battle for control of Bamfords, Ltd.,

Mills & Co., Ltd.*, [1918-19] All E.R. Rep. 313; [1920] 1 Ch. 77; Re Surrey Garden Village Trust, Ltd., [1964] 3 All E.R. 962.

having as its primary purpose to make it more difficult for J. C. Bamford (Excavators), Ltd. to obtain such control

"Whether as a matter of law and on the true construction of the memorandum and articles of association of Bamfords, Ltd. such allotment was capable of being effectively ratified and/or approved by an ordinary resolution of a general meeting of Bamfords, Ltd."

I should make it clear that though I am to assume that the directors did not exercise their power of allotment bona fide in the interests of the company, there is no suggestion and never has been any suggestion that they acted fraudulently. The assumption is merely that the board exceeded its powers, not that it acted mala fide.

Bamfords' articles, which were adopted in 1958, include the following:—art. 6 provides:

"The present capital of the company is £1,000,000, divided into 2,500,000 ordinary shares of 4s. each and 2,500,000 deferred ordinary shares of 4s. each."

A special resolution was subsequently passed amalgamating the issued and unissued ordinary and deferred shares into one class of ordinary shares, and, prior to the allotment to Burgesses, all the company's shares had been issued except for five hundred thousand.

Article 12 is as follows:

"Subject as provided by art. [53], all shares for the time being unissued shall be at the disposal of the directors, who may allot, grant options over or otherwise dispose of them to such persons on such terms and at such times as the directors may think fit, and provided that no shares shall be issued at a discount except as provided by s. 57 of the Companies Act, 1948. The directors may for valuable consideration enter into any agreement giving to any person any call or right of pre-emption in respect of or any option to take shares and may (subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament for the time being in force) issue any shares as fully or partially paid up as the consideration or part of the consideration for any property acquired by or work or services done or rendered or to be done or rendered for or at the request of the company."

Article 53 is as follows:

"The company may by ordinary resolution direct that the new shares or any of them shall be offered in the first instance to the then members or any class thereof for the time being in proportion to the number of shares or shares of the class held by them respectively or make any other provisions as to the issue of the new shares."

It is common ground that the five hundred thousand shares in question were not new shares for the purposes of art. 53.

If the decision of BUCKLEY, J., in Hogg v. Cramphorn, Ltd. (1) is good law, the question which I am called on to decide must be answered in the affirmative, because I can see no difference in principle between that case and the present case. Hogg v. Cramphorn, Ltd. (1) concerned a company, the articles of which conferred on the directors a power similar to that conferred on the directors of Bamfords by art. 12. A take-over bid was made for the company's shares. The directors, acting in good faith and believing that their actions were for the benefit of their company, devised a scheme the primary purpose of which was to ensure that the board would retain control of the company. The scheme involved the issue of shares to certain trustees with special voting rights.

BUCKLEY, J., in a reserved judgement, held that the power to issue shares was a fiduciary power; that if it was exercised for an improper motive, the

A allotment was liable to be set aside even if it was made in the bona fide belief that it was in the interests of the company. He went on to hold that, the primary purpose of the scheme being to retain control for the directors, the issue of shares pursuant to that scheme was ultra vires the board and—this is the important point in the present case—invalid unless ratified by the company in general meeting.

B I will read the part of his judgment dealing with this aspect of the matter (2):

“Counsel for the plaintiff says, no doubt rightly, that the company in general meeting could not by ordinary resolution control the directors in the exercise of the powers under art. 10. He goes on to say, I think with less justification, that what they could not ordain a majority could not ratify. There is, however, a great difference between controlling the directors’ exercise of a power vested in them and approving a proposed exercise by the directors of such a power, especially where the proposed exercise of the power is of a kind which might be assailed if it had not the manifest approval of the majority. Had the majority of the company in general meeting approved the issue of the 5,707 shares before it was made, even with the purported special voting rights attached (assuming that such rights could have been so attached conformably with the articles), I do not think that any member could have complained of the issue being made; for in these circumstances, the criticism that the directors were, by the issue of the shares, attempting to deprive the majority of their constitutional rights would have ceased to have any force. It follows, in my opinion, that a majority in a general meeting of the company at which no votes were cast in respect of the 5,707 shares could ratify the issue of those shares. Before setting the allotment and issue of the 5,707 shares aside, therefore, I propose to allow the company an opportunity to decide in general meeting whether it approves or disapproves of the issue of these shares to the trustees. Counsel for the defendants will undertake, on behalf of the trustees, not to vote at such a meeting in respect of the 5,707 shares.”

E A footnote (3) to the report states that in due course a general meeting gave its approval. As I said, if that case was rightly decided, the plaintiffs in the present action must, in my opinion, fail; but counsel, on their behalf, has argued that the decision is wrong and that I ought not to follow it.

I approach the matter in the light of what LORD GODDARD, C.J., said in Huddersfield Police Authority v. Watson (4):

G “... I think the modern practice, and the modern view of the subject, is that a judge of first instance, though he would always follow the decision of another judge of first instance, unless he is convinced the judgment is wrong, would follow it as a matter of judicial comity. He certainly is not bound to follow the decision of a judge of equal jurisdiction.”

H I will say at once that I am not convinced that the decision of BUCKLEY, J., was wrong, but as the matter was very fully argued before me, and does not appear to have been very fully argued before BUCKLEY, J. (5), I will consider the arguments in some detail.

I Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted the following propositions. (i) The articles of a company constitute a contract binding on the company and all its members, and each member is entitled as against the company and every other member to require that the affairs of the company shall be conducted according to the articles for the time being in force. This proposition is merely an exegesis of s. 20 (1) of the Companies Act, 1948 (6). Its purpose is to demonstrate that the plaintiffs are suing in respect of their own individual contractual rights and that the rule in Foss v. Harbottle (7) is therefore excluded (see Edwards v. Halliwell (8)). This proposition is not challenged by the defendants. (ii) A simple majority of shareholders in general meeting has only such powers as the articles expressly or by necessary implication confer on it. It cannot alter the articles and is contractually bound by them according to their tenor. (iii) Whether a simple majority of members in general meeting has, in any particular case, a power to direct how unissued shares of the company shall be allotted, depends on the construction of the articles. (iv) On the true construction of the articles of Bamfords the power to allot the half million unissued shares was vested by art. 12 in the directors and in them alone; they had no power to delegate that power to the shareholders in general meeting and any concurrent power in the company itself was necessarily excluded.

In support of his second proposition counsel for the plaintiffs referred to Wood v. Odessa Waterworks Co. (9), and in particular to a citation in the judgment of STIRLING, J., from the judgment of the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., in Oakbank Oil Co. v. Crum (10), where he said:

"It appears to me that directors and general meetings of companies of this sort can have no powers by implication except such as are incident to, or properly to be inferred from, the powers expressed in the memorandum and articles of association. Their powers are entirely created by the law and by the contract founded upon the law which enables such companies to be constituted."

No exception is taken on behalf of the defendants to this statement as a statement of principle; any dispute lies in the area of implication; counsel for the plaintiffs does not, as I understand it, dissent from the view that in the absence of anything in its articles to the contrary, a company would have an inherent power to allot its unissued shares by ordinary resolution. He cited to me the judgment of SIR RICHARD BAGGALLAY in the Privy Council in North-West Transportation Co., Ltd. v. Beatty (11), where he said:

"The general principles applicable to cases of this kind are well established. Unless some provision to the contrary is to be found in the charter or other instrument by which the company is incorporated, the resolution of a majority of the shareholders, duly convened, upon any question with which the company is legally competent to deal, is binding upon the minority, and consequently upon the company, and every shareholder has a perfect right to vote upon any such question, although he may have a personal interest in the subject-matter opposed to, or different from, the general or particular interests of the company."

Counsel for the plaintiffs, of course, relied on the opening words of that passage—"Unless some provision to the contrary is to be found in the charter or other instrument by which the company is incorporated."

Nor, I think, is counsel's third proposition challenged. The main dispute concerns the fourth proposition and is whether there is any residual power of allotment in the company, notwithstanding art. 12.

Counsel for the plaintiffs relied on a number of cases to which I will now refer. The first was Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate, Co., Ltd. v. Cuninghame (12). The headnote to that case is as follows:

"A company had power under its memorandum of association to sell its undertaking to another company having similar objects, and by its articles

A of association the general management and control of the company were vested in the directors, subject to such regulations as might from time to time be made by extraordinary resolution, and, in particular, the directors were empowered to sell or otherwise deal with any property of the company on such terms as they might think fit. At a general meeting of the company a resolution was passed by a simple majority of the shareholders for the sale of the company's assets on certain terms to a new company formed for the purpose of acquiring them, and directing the directors to carry the sale into effect. The directors being of opinion that a sale on those terms was not for the benefit of the company, declined to carry the sale into effect:—
B Held (affirming the decision of WARRINGTON, J.) upon the construction of the articles, that the directors could not be compelled to comply with the
C resolution.”

I would like to read one or two passages from the judgment of WARRINGTON, J. He said (13):

“The question I have to determine in this case is whether the shareholders of a company have power by a resolution passed by a simple majority of their number to order the directors to seal an agreement for the sale of the whole of the assets of the company notwithstanding that the directors may think that the sale is improvident, and that the terms on which it is to be carried out are not fit terms on which the company ought to carry out such a sale. To my mind this question depends upon the true construction of the articles. The only articles which are material are arts. 96 and 97
D [His LORDSHIP read the articles and continued:] The effect of this resolution, if acted upon, would be to compel the directors to sell the whole of the assets of the company, not on such terms and conditions as they think fit, but upon such terms and conditions as a simple majority of the shareholders think fit . . . It seems to me on the true construction of these articles that the management of the business and the control of the company are vested
E in the directors, and consequently that the control of the company as to any particular matter, or the management of any particular transaction or any particular part of the business of the company, can only be removed from the board by an alteration of the articles, such alteration, of course, requiring a special resolution.”

Then in the Court of Appeal SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R., said (14):

G “...the question is whether under the memorandum and articles of association here the directors are bound to accept, in substitution of their own view, the views contained in the resolution of the company. WARRINGTON, J., held that the majority could not impose that obligation upon the directors, and that on the true construction of the articles the directors were the persons authorised by the articles to effect this sale, and that unless the H other powers given by the memorandum were invoked by a special resolution, it was impossible for a mere majority at a meeting to override the views of the directors. That depends, as WARRINGTON, J., put it, upon the construction of the articles.”

A little later on SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R., said (15):

I “In these circumstances it seems to me that it is not competent for the majority of the shareholders at an ordinary meeting to effect or alter the mandate originally given to the directors, by the articles of association. It has been suggested that this is a mere question of principal and agent, and that it would be an absurd thing if a principal in appointing an agent should in effect appoint a dictator who is to manage him instead of his managing the agent. I think that that analogy does not strictly apply to this case. No doubt for some purposes directors are agents. For whom are they agents? You have, no doubt, in theory and law one entity, the company which might be a principal, but you have to go behind that when you look to the particular position of directors. It is by the consensus of all the individuals in the company that these directors become agents and hold their rights as agents. It is not fair to say that a majority at a meeting is for the purposes of this case the principal so as to alter the mandate of the agent. The minority also must be taken into account. There are provisions by which the minority may be overborne, but that can only be done by special machinery in the shape of special resolutions. Short of that the mandate which must be obeyed is not that of the majority—it is that of the whole entity made up of all the shareholders. If the mandate of the directors is to be altered, it can only be under the machinery of the memorandum and articles themselves. I do not think I need say more.”

That, I think, is all I need read of that case. What it decides, and what the cases which follow, to which I will refer in a moment, decide, in my judgment, is this: that a company cannot by ordinary resolution dictate to or overrule the directors in respect of matters entrusted to them by the articles. To do that it is necessary to have a special resolution.

That case was applied by the Court of Appeal in Gramophone and Typewriter, Ltd. v. Stanley (16), where FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., said this (17):

“It has been decided in this court, in Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate Co., Ltd. v. Cuninghame (18), that in an English company, by whose articles of association certain powers are placed in the hands of the directors, shareholders cannot interfere with the exercise of those powers by the directors, even by a majority at a general meeting. Their course is to obtain the requisite majority to remove the directors and put persons in their place who agree to their policy. This shows that the control of individual corporators is something wholly different from the management of the business itself. Nor is this principle less true when the holding of the individual corporator is so large that he is able to override the wishes of the other corporators in matters relating to the control of the business of the company.”

Then BUCKLEY, L.J., said (19):

“This court decided not long ago in Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate Co., Ltd. v. Cuninghame (18), that even a resolution of a numerical majority at a general meeting of the company cannot impose its will on the directors when the articles have confided to them the control of the company’s affairs. The directors are not servants to obey directions given by the shareholders as individuals; they are not agents appointed by and bound to serve the shareholders as their principals, they are persons who may by the regulations be entrusted with the control of the business, and if so entrusted they can be dispossessed from that control only by the statutory majority which can alter the articles. Directors are not, I think, bound to comply with the directions even of all the corporators acting as individuals; of course, the corporators have it in their power by proper resolutions, which would generally be special resolutions, to remove directors who do not act as they desire, but this in no way answers the question here to be considered, which is whether the corporators are engaged in carrying on the business of the corporation. In my opinion, they are not. To say that they are involves a complete confusion of ideas.”

A That was, of course, in the days before s. 184 of the Companies Act, 1948 (20).

These cases were followed in the third of the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiffs under this head, Salmon v. Quin & Axtens, Ltd. (21). The headnote of this case reads:

B “By the articles of association of a company the general management of the business of the company was vested in the directors subject to such regulations (being not inconsistent with the provisions of the articles) as might be prescribed by the company in general meeting, and it was provided that no resolution of a meeting of the directors having for its object (among other things) the acquisition or letting of any premises should be valid unless twenty-four hours’ notice of the meeting should have been given to each of the managing directors A and B and neither of them should have dissented therefrom in writing before or at the meeting. A and B held the bulk of the ordinary shares in the company. Resolutions were passed by the directors for the acquisition of certain premises and for the letting of certain other premises, but B dissented from each of these resolutions in accordance with the articles. At an extraordinary general meeting of the company resolutions to the same effect were passed by a simple majority of the shareholders. Held, applying the principle of Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate Co. v. Cuninghame (22), that the resolutions of the company were inconsistent with the provisions of the articles and that the company ought to be restrained from acting upon them.”

FARWELL, L.J., said this (23):

E “Now the management is entrusted to the board of directors, and there is a curious provision which I will read in a moment. The difficulty has arisen in this way. The majority of the board desired to acquire a lease of certain premises for the sum of £2,000 or upwards. They also desired to demise certain vacant premises belonging to the company. The material articles are arts. 75 and 80. Article 75 provides as follows: [HIS LORDSHIP read it]. F Pausing there for a moment, it appears to me to be plain that this is a contract by which the business of the company shall be managed by the board. The articles, by s. 16 of [the Companies Act, 1862] are made equivalent to a deed of covenant signed by all the shareholders.”

That is now s. 20 of the Act of 1948 (24). Then FARWELL, L.J., continued:

G “Now the general power of the board to manage here is qualified by the stipulation which follows, that it is to be subject to the provisions of these articles. I therefore turn to art. 80, and I find this provision to which these general powers of management are made subject.”

He then read the article, and continued (25):

H “In the present case Mr. Salmon did so dissent according to the terms of that article, and therefore the veto therein provided came into operation. That was met by the company being called together by a requisition of seven shareholders and by passing general resolutions for the acquisition of this property and the letting of the vacant premises. It is said that those resolutions are of no effect, and I am of opinion that that contention is right. I base my opinion on the words of art. 75, ‘subject, nevertheless, to the provisions of any Acts of Parliament or of these articles’, which I read to be ‘subject, nevertheless, to art. 80’, ‘and to such regulations (being not inconsistent with any such provisions of these articles) as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting'. That is to say, 'subject also to such regulations not inconsistent with art. 30 as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting'. But these resolutions are absolutely inconsistent with art. 80; in truth this is an attempt to alter the terms of the contract between the parties by a simple resolution instead of by a special resolution. The articles forming this contract, under which the business of the company shall be managed by the board, contain a most usual and proper requirement, because a business does require a head to look after it, and a head that shall not be interfered with unnecessarily. Then in order to oust the directors a special resolution would be required. The case is, in my view, entirely governed, if not by the decision, at any rate by the reasoning of the lords justices in Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate Co. v. Cuninghame (26), and Gramophone and Typewriter, Ltd. v. Stanley (27). I will only refer to one passage in BUCKLEY, L.J.'s judgment in the latter case. He says (28) 'This court decided not long ago, in Automatic Self-Cleansing Filter Syndicate Co. v. Cuninghame (26), that even a resolution of a numerical majority at a general meeting of the company cannot impose its will upon the directors when the articles have confided to them the control of the company's affairs. The directors are not servants to obey directions given by the shareholders as individuals; they are not agents appointed by and bound to serve the shareholders as their principals; they are persons who may by the regulations be entrusted with the control of the business, and if so entrusted they can be dispossessed from that control only by the statutory majority which can alter the articles. Directors are not, I think, bound to comply with the directions even of all the corporators acting as individuals.' That appears to me to express the true view. Any other construction might, I think, be disastrous, because it might lead to an interference by a bare majority very inimical to the interests of the minority who had come into a company on the footing that the business should be managed by the board of directors."

That was therefore a case of a bare majority of the company in general meeting trying to nullify a power of veto given to one of the managing directors by the articles.

The last case cited by counsel for the plaintiffs was John Shaw & Sons (Salford), Ltd. v. Shaw (29). In that case, GREER, L.J., having reached the conclusion that the articles of the company conferred the power to bring actions in the name of the company on the permanent directors, and that they had given the necessary authority, said this (30):

"I am, therefore, of opinion that the learned judge was right in refusing to dismiss the action on the plea that it was commenced without the authority of the plaintiff company. I think the judge was also right in refusing to give effect to the resolution of the meeting of the shareholders requiring the chairman to instruct the company's solicitors not to proceed further with the action. A company is an entity distinct alike from its shareholders and its directors. Some of its powers may, according to its articles, be exercised by directors; certain other powers may be reserved for the shareholders in general meeting. If powers of management are vested in the directors, they and they alone can exercise these powers. The only way in which the general body of the shareholders can control the exercise of the powers vested by the articles in the directors is by altering their articles, or, if opportunity arises under the articles, by refusing to re-elect the directors of whose actions they disapprove. They cannot themselves

- A   usurp the powers which by the articles are vested in the directors any more than the directors can usurp the powers vested by the articles in the general body of shareholders.”

What the lord justice is saying is that a bare majority of shareholders cannot “control” the exercise of or “usurp” the powers vested in the board by the articles except by altering the articles.

- B   Did the extraordinary general meeting of Bamfords on Dec. 15, 1967, attempt to do any such thing? I think not. What happened was that the directors referred to a general meeting of the company, to which they were answerable, the question whether it wished the allotment to stand, and the general meeting said “Yes”. There was no question of the general meeting usurping the powers of the directors under art. 12 or controlling or dictating their exercise, and none
- C   of the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiffs, in my judgment, goes to the length of saying that the result was a nullity.

Nevertheless, replies counsel, if you allow a general meeting to determine how shares shall be allotted you are altering the whole nature of the power; it is a fiduciary power for the protection of the minority and if you allow it to be exercised in general meeting you are allowing it to be exercised by persons

D   who (as was decided in Pender v. Lushington (31)) are entitled to consult their own interests and who, unlike the directors, are not bound to consult only the benefit of the company. Further, counsel argues, the fact that under art. 53 the company can give directions in regard to the issue of new shares implies that it has so much power in regard to old shares.

- E   The validity of these arguments depends, I think, on the question whether arts. 12 and 53 leave a residual power of allotment in the company. If they do, then, in my judgment, there is no question of altering the nature of the power, because the residual power is the company’s, not the directors’, and the company exercises it in its own right and not in right of the board.

- F   The arguments submitted by both counsel for the defendants may be summarised as follows: (i) Subject to any provision to the contrary in the articles, the power to issue capital validly created is in the company in general meeting. (ii) Article 12 confers a power of allotment on the directors but this is subject to the built-in limitation which applies to all powers of directors, namely that it is to be exercised bona fide in the best interests of the company. (iii) This power is less extensive than the company’s inherent power, which is not subject to any such implied limitation. (iv) Ergo, the company has a residual power of allotment. (v) The only limitation on this residual power is that it cannot,
- G   except by special resolution, be exercised in such a way as to conflict with the express power given by art. 12. Thus, the company cannot by ordinary resolution usurp that power or dictate to the board how it shall exercise it. (vi) The assumption being, for the purposes of the issue, that the board exceeded its own power of allotment, the action of the extraordinary general meeting on Dec. 15
- H   was an exercise of the company’s residual power which did not involve any conflict with art. 12 and was effectual to validate the allotment.

I accept these arguments. Moreover, they appear to me to derive some support from two earlier decisions to which I was referred. The first is Irvine v. Union Bank of Australia (32). I refer first to part of the headnote:

- I   “By art. 50 of the articles of association of the O.R. Company (which was limited by guarantee, and registered in Victoria under a local Act corresponding with the English Companies Act, 1862), it was provided that the directors’ power of borrowing sums on the credit of the company ‘should not exceed in the aggregate as an existing debt at the same time one-half of the then actually paid-up capital’. The articles contained no restriction upon the company’s power of borrowing; and the directors’ power to borrow was capable of being extended under art. 31, by one-half of the votes of all the shareholders given at a general meeting ... Held, that the limitation of the power of borrowing and mortgaging contained in art. 50 was merely a limitation of the authority of the directors conferred by the same article; that it was not a limitation of the general powers of the company, and that the acts of the directors in excess of their authority might be ratified by the company and rendered binding. The ratification of the report of Oct. 29, 1868, did not authorise the directors to obtain letter of credit number 153, in September, 1869, or to borrow £5,000 thereon in February, 1871. The ratification of letter of credit number 150, for £10,000 did not authorise the renewal of it, or the acting upon it after the time originally limited had expired. Although it might be competent for a majority of shareholders present (though not a majority of the shareholders of the company) at an extraordinary meeting convened for that object, and of which object due notice had been given, to ratify an act previously done by the directors in excess of their authority; yet if the object was to give the directors in future an extended authority beyond what is given by art. 50, that could only be effected by a vote of one-half of all the shareholders of the company."

The judgment in the Privy Council was delivered by SIR BARNES PEACOCK, and I will quote certain passages from his judgment. He said this (33):

"The articles of association contain no restriction or limitation on the company's powers of borrowing. As regards the directors, however, their authority to borrow was limited; for it was expressly stipulated by art. 50 ..."

He went on to say (34):

"It was, therefore, clearly beyond the authority of the directors to borrow or take up upon the credit of the company as an existing debt at the same time an amount or amounts exceeding one-half of the actually paid-up capital of the company. There is no doubt that the authority of the directors, limited as it was by the articles of association, was capable of being extended under the provisions of art. 31. But by that article one-half of the votes of all the shareholders given at a general meeting called for the purpose was necessary."

After referring to art. 31, he said this (35):

"It was not contended that the authority of the directors either to borrow or to mortgage was ever extended at a general meeting of the shareholders called for the purpose, but it was contended by the learned counsel for the respondent, that the limitation of the power of borrowing and of mortgaging, contained in art. 50, was merely a limitation of the authority of the directors conferred by the same article; that it was not part of the constitution of the company, which, if the company had been originally formed under the Companies Act of 1862, must have been contained in the memorandum; and, consequently, that it was not a limitation of the general powers of the company, or of the whole body of shareholders; and that the acts of the directors in excess of their authority might be ratified by the company and rendered binding. Their lordships are of opinion that the above contention is correct, and they will proceed to consider whether the acts of the directors in borrowing in excess of their authority was ever duly ratified by the company."

Later he said (36):

"Their lordships think that it would be competent for a majority of the shareholders present (though not a majority of the shareholders of the

A company), at an extra-ordinary meeting convened for that object, and of which object due notice had been given, to ratify an act previously done by the directors in excess of their authority; and they are not prepared to say that if a report had been circulated before a half-yearly meeting distinctly giving notice that the directors had done an act in excess of their authority, and that the meeting would be asked by confirming the report to ratify the act, this might not be sufficient notice to bring the ratification within the competency of the majority of the shareholders present at the half-yearly meeting. But if the object was to give the directors in future an extended authority beyond what is given by art. 50, their lordships think that it would be an alteration of the provisions contained in the articles which, under cl. 31, could only be made by a vote of one-half of all the shareholders of the company. There is a wide distinction between ratifying a particular act which has been done in excess of authority, and conferring a general power to do similar acts in future."

The other case was Grant v. United Kingdom Switchback Rys. Co. (37). The headnote which, in the interests of accuracy, I slightly amend, is, so far as material, as follows:

"The [memorandum] of the T. Company authorised the sale of part of its undertaking to any other company, and [the articles] contained a provision prohibiting any director from voting in respect of any contract in which he was interested. The directors entered on behalf of the company into a contract for sale of part of its undertaking to the U. Company, of which all the directors of the T. Company except one were directors. A general meeting of the T. Company was called by a notice stating that it was called to consider a resolution for approving and adopting the agreement, but not stating any ground for a meeting being necessary. The resolution was passed as an ordinary resolution, but not as a special resolution. Held, that though a resolution giving the directors powers to do certain acts in future which they were not authorised by the articles to do, would be an alteration of the articles, and would require to be passed as a special resolution, the adoption of a contract which was within the objects of the company, but which the directors had entered into without authority, was not an alteration of the articles, and could be effected by ordinary resolution."

Counsel who argued the case in the Court of Appeal on behalf of the appellant said, (38):

"I contend that, so long as the articles were in force, a contract entered into by directors who were interested in the subject matter, and therefore had no right to vote, was void, and a resolution confirming it was an alteration of the articles which could only be made by a special resolution. The agreement was ultra vires the directors, was a nullity, and could not be ratified in this way . . ."

As will appear in a moment, that argument was rejected. COTTON, L.J., said this (39):

"It was urged for the appellant that the directors could not, being interested, make a contract which would bind their company, and that a general meeting could not, by a mere ordinary resolution, affirm that contract, for that this would be an alteration of the articles, which could only be effected by a special resolution. This is a mistake. The ratifying a particular contract which had been entered into by the directors without authority, and so making it an act of the company, is quite a different thing from altering the articles. To give the directors power to do things in future which the articles did not authorise them to do, would be an alteration of the articles, but it is no alteration of the articles to ratify a contract which has been made without authority. It was urged that the contract was a nullity, and could not be ratified. That is not the case. There was a contract entered into on behalf of the company, though it was one which could not be enforced against the company. Article 100 prevented the directors from binding the company by the contract, but there was nothing in it to prevent the company from entering into such a contract. Two passages in Irvine v. Union Bank of Australia (40) were referred to. Being in the same judgment, they must be taken together, and they appear to me to express what I have said—that power to do future acts cannot be given to directors without altering the articles, but that a ratification of an unauthorised act of the directors only requires the sanction of an ordinary resolution of a general meeting, if the act is within the powers of the company.”

(37) (1888), 40 Ch.D. 135.

(38) (1888), 40 Ch.D. at p. 137.

(39) (1888), 40 Ch.D. at pp. 138, 139.

LINDLEY, L.J., said (41):

“The appellant contends that the company could not ratify this contract except by special resolution. In my opinion that contention is unfounded. There is a broader distinction between altering the articles and merely saying ‘this act was not authorised by the articles, but we will ratify it’. The shareholders can ratify any contract which comes within the powers of the company, and this contract clearly does, for the articles expressly authorise selling any part of the undertaking of the company.”

BOWEN, L.J., said (42):

“The company did not purport to alter the limits of the authority given generally by the articles to the directors. The articles limit that authority, but there is nothing in them to prevent the company from giving special power to the directors in a particular case as to a particular contract. The company at a general meeting adopt this agreement, and make it their own. That is a ratification of an unauthorised act, not an alteration of the articles.”

Those cases show that where, under the articles, a limited power of borrowing or contracting is given to the board and the board borrows or enters into a contract in excess of its power, its action can be ratified or approved by the company in general meeting by virtue of the residual power remaining in the company.

I accept, however, that they are not of themselves decisive of the question whether, whenever a limited power is conferred on directors, a residual power is necessarily left in the company. Whether any such residual power does or does not exist in any particular case will depend not only on the general law but also on the memorandum and articles of association of the company in question.

In my judgment, notwithstanding art. 12, Bamfords did retain a residual inherent power to allot its half-million unissued shares which formed part of the capital mentioned in art. 6, and following Hogg v. Cramphorn (43), I am of the opinion that, if the allotment of Nov. 20 was in excess of the power conferred by art. 12 (as I am to assume that it was), it was capable of being validated by ordinary resolution of the company in general meeting.

I therefore answer the preliminary point of law in the affirmative.

Had I been driven to the contrary conclusion, it would have been with some misgiving, because as a matter of business commonsense it seems to me that

C PEARSON v. NORTH WESTERN GAS BOARD.

[MANCHESTER WINTER ASSIZES (Rees, J.), April 10, 1968.]

Negligence—Res ipsa loquitur—Explosion caused by escape of gas from underground metal gas main—Expert evidence that fracture of pipe due to frost, but pipe in good condition and no reasonable steps available to safeguard public from consequences of such fractures—Negligence not established.

D The plaintiff and her husband were injured, and their home was destroyed, by an explosion of gas on Jan. 1, 1963; the plaintiff's husband died as a result of his injuries. The explosion was of gas which had escaped from a three inch metal gas main and had accumulated under the floor boards of the house. On the evidence the cause of the escape of gas was fracture of the gas main owing to the movement of earth caused by severe frost. The pipes were at a depth of two feet nine inches beneath the flagstones of the public footway; the main had been laid in 1878, the metal was in good condition and the expectation of life of such a pipe was 120 years. The expert evidence for the defendants, the gas board, who supplied gas through the main, though not to the plaintiff's house, was that no reasonable steps were open to safeguard the public from the consequences of fractured gas mains. ### Action.

In the early morning of Jan. 1, 1963, an explosion occurred, caused by the ignition of a mixture of coal gas and air; the coal gas had escaped from the defendants' gas main, and the explosion occurred under the floor boards of Nos. 25 and 27, Cromwell Street, West Gorton, Manchester. In the explosion the plaintiff was seriously injured, her husband received injuries from which he later died and their home, No. 27, Cromwell Street, together with its contents was totally destroyed. The coal gas had escaped from a three inch gas main running at a distance of five feet six inches from the building line of the houses at a depth of two feet nine inches beneath the flagstones of the public footway. The gas main, which was made of metal, had been laid in 1878 and was the property and under the control of the defendants. The escape was due to a fracture in the pipe at a point opposite the corner of the frontage of No. 25 furthest from No. 27. The metal of which the pipe was composed was in good condition. The expectation of useful life of such a pipe was at least 120 years. On the expert evidence the fracture was sudden and complete, the time lapse between the fracture of the pipe and the explosion probably having been about three or four hours. There was evidence from the defendants' district distribution engineer, that shortly after the explosion there was no cavity or void close to the point of fracture of the pipe, with the consequence that the fracture could not have been caused by such a cavity. On the expert evidence in the case the only other possible cause of the fracture of the gas main was the effect of frost. On nine successive nights from Dec. 22 to Dec. 31, 1962, the minimum temperature had been below freezing point. The cold was exceptionally severe at this time. The ground above the fracture of the gas main was frozen to a depth of about eight inches at the time of the occurrence of the explosion. All witnesses called on behalf of the defendants were of the opinion that ground movements caused by frost fractured the gas main: there was no evidence to the contrary. D

The plaintiff sued the defendants for damages for personal injuries to herself, and as administratrix of her husband, under the Fatal Accidents Acts 1846 to 1959, and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. The defendants were the sellers and suppliers of gas in pursuance of the Gas Act, 1948, to the area in which the plaintiff and her late husband resided, but the plaintiff and her husband were not consumers of gas. Apr. 10. REES, J., stated the nature of the action and, having summarised the facts and reviewed the evidence regarding the cause of the explosion, continued: The explanation placed before the court as to the manner in which frost to a depth of eight inches may fracture a cast-iron gas main in good condition, lying two feet nine inches below the surface of the ground was as follows: the severe cold causes the water content of the ground to become ice and so to expand. One witness considered that the eight-inch layer of frozen ground might G

A expand by about  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{3}{8}$  of an inch. The thrust set up by this expansion must travel upwards or downwards or in both directions. If the upper surface of the ground is resistant to upward movement, e.g., because of flagstones or even of a top layer of frozen ground, then the thrust will travel downwards, setting up pressures and possibly soil movement which may finally cause a fracture of the pipe. No expert evidence was called on behalf of the plaintiff which could form
B the basis of any attack on this hypothesis.

The only evidence in this case, therefore, supported the view that an expansion of the order of  $\frac{1}{4}$  or  $\frac{3}{8}$  of an inch could travel through some two feet of subsoil to reach and to rupture a cast-iron gas main in good condition. Other evidence in another case might or might not support that view.

All the witnesses called on behalf of the defendants stated that the risk of the fracture of gas mains caused by frost and the dangers resulting therefrom were well-known. One witness stated that during the months of January and February, 1963, well over four hundred fractures of gas pipes caused by extreme cold occurred in the Southern Gas Board area alone, but, he added, fortunately nobody was killed as a result. No evidence was placed before the court as to the numbers of persons who were killed or injured throughout the whole country as a result of D fractures of gas mains during these two particular months or indeed at any other time. All the defendants' witnesses stated that there was no known method of ascertaining in advance whether a gas main would be likely to fracture as a result of the effect of extreme cold, nor of preventing a fracture from taking place.

The precautions taken by the defendants were directed to dealing with the effects of a fracture during cold weather by causing maintenance men to stand
E by ready to go to the scene in the hope of arriving before an explosion has taken place or a fire broken out. The witnesses were at pains to make the point that whenever work is undertaken which involves exposing a gas main, e.g., when a connexion to a house is being made, the length of pipe so exposed is inspected by the workmen concerned for any visible defects. Also there is a method for routine inspection of a gas main designed to detect whether gas is actually escaping
F from the pipe. This method was used to test the gas main in Cromwell Street in November, 1959, by inserting into the earth a probe sensitive to coal gas at six-foot intervals along the line of the gas main in the street.

It perhaps hardly needs to be stated that neither the fortuitous inspection of small portions of some pipes by workmen, nor the routine tests for leakage of gas from fractures which have already occurred or from existing defects in joints,
G is a practical means of safeguarding the public from death or injury arising as it did in this case. It may be that in some future case expert evidence coming from foreign gas engineers or drawn from experts in soil mechanics or other scientific fields may be available to contest the assertion of a gas board's experts that no reasonable steps are open to them to safeguard the public from the dire consequences which may follow from a fractured gas main. It might then appear
H that there are practical means of identifying the presence of cavities or voids close to gas mains or of protecting a gas main from the effects of frost, or of constructing a main of material which will accept without fracture the degree of earth movement capable of being set up by frost.

At least this case will have served the public interest to the extent of drawing attention to the dangers to which a fractured gas main may give rise, and also
I to possible lines of enquiry which may lead to the discovery of a means of safeguarding the public from them or, possibly as a last resort, of enabling those injured in future to establish liability and to recover compensation from gas undertakers. So much for the facts.

Counsel for the plaintiff felt obliged to concede—and he expressly did so—that he could not succeed under the rule in the well-known case of Rylands v. Fletcher (1), on the ground of the strict liability of the defendants for the escape of a dangerous substance such as coal gas, or on the ground of nuisance. He made this concession in face of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the recent case of Dunne v. North Western Gas Board (2). Whether at another time and in the highest tribunal the Dunne case will find favour as a matter of principle and when examined afresh in the light of the decision also of the Court of Appeal in Charing Cross, West End, and City Electricity Supply Co., Ltd. v. London Hydraulic Power Co. (3), is not for me to express any opinion.

The plaintiff's case before me was presented exclusively on the footing that in order to succeed, negligence for which the defendants are responsible, must be established. The plaintiff's case in negligence was firmly based on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur as stated in the case of Moore v. R. Fox & Sons (4). It was argued that the offending gas main was owned by, and was under the control of, the defendants at all relevant times and that its fracture so as to allow the escape of coal gas would not, in the ordinary course of things, happen if those responsible for it used proper care. Consequently, it was urged that proof of the fracture of the pipe and the consequent escape of gas raised a prima facie case of negligence against the defendants which they were required to rebut.

Counsel for the defendants did not accept that in the circumstances of this case the proof of the fracture of the pipe and the escape of gas did "speak" to a prima facie case of negligence calling for an answer. In any event, he argued that his evidence had rebutted any prima facie case against him and had positively established on a balance of probabilities that the accident had happened as a result of frost damage and without any negligence for which the defendants are responsible.

In my judgment, assuming, but not deciding, that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied so as to establish a prima facie case of negligence against the defendants, their evidence rebutted it. I further find on a balance of probabilities that the explanation for the explosion put forward by the defendants has been established and that this explanation does not connote negligence on their part but points to its absence as being more probable. In these circumstances, the plaintiff's claim for damages must fail. Accordingly, on the evidence as presented in this case and the law as argued, the plaintiff must suffer without any compensation the gravest consequences flowing from the killing of her husband, the destruction of her home and her own personal injuries and their sequels. Nor is she likely to draw any comfort from the reflection that without any fault on her part or that of her late husband, these consequences arise from a risk which is well known to exist but which, according to the evidence in this case, cannot be avoided by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the defendants. Nor can it be avoided by anyone who happens to live close to one of their main pipes. The plaintiffs' claims will be dismissed.

OWNERS OF THE STEAM TANKER ANDROS SPRINGS v.

OWNERS OF THE STEAM TANKER WORLD BEAUTY.

B [PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, L.J., sitting as an additional judge), March 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 18, 19, April 10, 1968.]

Shipping—Collision—Damages—Detention—Mitigation—Vessel on charter—Subsequent charter arranged before collision—Substitution of slower ship with smaller carrying capacity under current charter—Vessel becoming free before time when current charter would have ended—Subsequent charter brought forward to begin at earlier date—Assessment of value to owners of vessel of advancement of commencement of subsequent charter—Amount so computed allowed in mitigation of damages.

C The plaintiffs' vessel Andros Springs was damaged in collision at Suez Bay on Apr. 21, 1958. The defendants accepted responsibility for three-quarters of the damage. In consequence of the collision the vessel lost considerable time by way of detention for temporary repairs, reduced speed in completing her current voyage and detention for final repairs. The total period of such detention was about thirty-seven days. She became free on June 7, 1958. At the time of the collision she was chartered on a very profitable charter, by charterparty dated July 22, 1957, for a maximum number of successive voyages, which would end on or before Sept. 15, 1958. Her further employment was arranged for about seven years under a second charter (the M. charter); hire under this charter would not commence before Aug. 1, 1958, and the vessel had to be tendered before Oct. 31, 1958. This also was a very valuable charter. In order to mitigate the damage the plaintiffs substituted for the Andros Springs under the 1957 charterparty another smaller and slower vessel, which completed three successive voyages before the 1957 charterparty ended. They also arranged for the M. charter to be advanced to July 11, 1958. Accordingly the Andros Springs was idle from June 7, 1958 to July 11, 1958. On the assessment of damages for detention attributable to the collision, after allowing for the profits earned by the substituted vessel,

E Held: the value of what the plaintiffs gained by advancing the commencement of the M. charter must be taken into account by way of deduction from the loss of profits during the period of detention of the Andros Springs, since that gain resulted from the collision; on the evidence the commencement of the M. charter had been advanced by one hundred days, with the consequence that the profits on it were earned throughout one hundred days earlier, and, therefore, the amount to be taken into account by way of deduction in assessing the damages was seven years' compound interest at five per centum on the sum representing the plaintiffs' profits under the M. charter for one hundred days (see p. 681, letters B, C, G and I, post).

Motion.

This was a motion in objection to a decision of the Admiralty registrar, dated June 29, 1967, on a reference to assess the amount of the plaintiffs' damages arising out of a collision between their steam tanker Andros Springs and the defendants' steam tanker World Beauty, which took place in Suez Bay on Apr. 21, 1958. By terms of settlement filed on Feb. 9, 1962, the question of liability for the collision was resolved on the basis, inter alia, that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs seventy-five per cent. of the plaintiffs' proved or agreed claim. In due course a claim was filed on behalf of the plaintiffs containing some sixty-seven items of claim. With regard to most of the items claimed the parties were able to reach agreement. The main dispute was with regard to the plaintiffs' claim in respect of the detention of the Andros Springs during the repair of the collision damage. The plaintiffs alleged that the vessel was detained for thirty-seven days twenty-two hours, and claimed a total of $170,455.92, representing in part loss of profit and in part the expenses of maintaining the vessel during the period of detention. The registrar allowed this item as claimed.

The Andros Springs sailed under the Liberian flag. She was owned by a Panamanian company called Maroceanio Compania Naviera, S.A., and was at the material time, managed by an American company called the Orion Shipping & Trading Co., of New York. She was a tanker of 23,252 tons gross, with a cargo capacity of about 36,000 tons. At the time of the collision she was in the course of a voyage from Umm Said in the Persian Gulf to Le Havre, laden with a cargo of 34,652 tons of crude oil. In the collision the starboard bow of the Andros Springs sustained serious damage. The area of the damage was well forward of the forward cofferdam, which separates the main cargo-carrying part of the ship from the fore-castle where the forward fuel tanks are located. Temporary repairs were executed. She was then able to complete her voyage to Le Havre, but at reduced speed. From Le Havre the vessel proceeded, after survey to Rotterdam, where the collision repairs were finally completed on June 7. Opportunity was also taken to execute repairs in respect of bottom damage which had been sustained through grounding in the Suez Canal some two months before the collision. It is common ground, however, that the bottom damage did not impair the vessel's seaworthiness, and its repair could if necessary have been deferred.

The plaintiffs' claim for detention in its final form was made up as follows:—

Detention in Suez Bay	10 days 6 hours 35 minutes.
Time lost on passage	2 days 3 hours 56 minutes
Detention for permanent repairs in Rotterdam	24 days 13 hours 10 minutes
Estimated time to steam from Rotterdam to a position off Le Havre	22 hours 20 minutes
Total detention	37 days 22 hours

But for the collision the Andros Springs would have completed discharge of her cargo at Le Havre on May 1, 1958. Because of the repairs consequent on the

A collision, however, she was not in fact at the disposal of the plaintiffs until June 7.

At the time of the collision the Andros Springs was chartered to a French company, Compagnie Française de Raffinage (hereafter called "C.F.R.") under a charterparty dated July 22, 1957. This was a charter for successive voyages, cl. 24 providing that—

B "The vessel shall perform with all convenient despatch the maximum number of consecutive voyages . . . in respect of which she can tender for loading within the period between the date she first gives notice to load and Sept. 15, 1958."

This charterparty was fixed at a time when freights were still high following the Suez crisis of 1956, and was exceedingly valuable to the plaintiffs. While C running under this charter the Andros Springs was able to earn a net profit of $3,659.48 per day. The plaintiffs' claim (item 67) included loss of profit at this rate for thirty-seven days twenty-two hours, and expenses incurred during detention for the like period at the rate of $836.14 per day, which was also an agreed figure. The Andros Springs was employed in running between various ports in the Persian Gulf and France, alternate voyages being made up to the D date of the collision to Le Havre in the North and L'Avera in the South of France. The vessel was capable of a speed of sixteen knots, and the round voyage occupied thirty-nine days when Le Havre was the destination, or thirty-two days when she discharged at L'Avera. If the same pattern continued, the vessel would complete another four voyages after the collision voyage before the period of the charter came to an end.

E The Andros Springs was already fixed for further employment following the conclusion of the C.F.R. charter. By a time charter dated Aug. 8, 1957, she was chartered to Mobil Shipping Co., Ltd. (hereafter referred to as "Mobil") for a term of about seven years, three weeks more or less at charterers' option, to be employed in any part of the world, subject to certain exclusions not relevant to this case, at a monthly rate of hire of twenty-five shillings per ton on the vessel's F deadweight. Hire was not to commence before Aug. 1, 1958, and the charterers had liberty to cancel if the vessel was not tendered before Oct. 31. This charter also was an exceedingly valuable one, and under it the Andros Springs was able to earn a net profit at the rate of $3,597.05 per day. If there had been no collision it was intended that, after completion of four more voyages under the C.F.R. G charter, the vessel would be put into dry dock for cleaning, painting, annual survey and owners' repairs. It was hoped to include repair of the bottom damage though this repair could if necessary have been deferred. The period while the vessel would have been out of use would have been twenty-two days, if the bottom damage was repaired, but otherwise twelve days. In either event it was expected that the vessel would be ready in ample time to tender under the Mobil charter.

H With a view to mitigating the loss to the plaintiffs by the detention of the Andros Springs for repairs, it was agreed by an agreement of May 7, 1958 (i.e., some seventeen days after the collision), by way of addendum to the C.F.R. charter that on completion of her discharge at Le Havre the Andros Springs should be withdrawn from service under the charter and substituted by the Andros Thunder. The Andros Thunder was expressed to be expected ready to I load on or about June 7, 1958 (she being at Los Angeles in May, 1958). For the purpose of giving effect to this agreement the Andros Thunder was chartered by Marocano, under a charterparty dated May 28, 1958, to perform three consecutive voyages, loading on the first voyage at a port in the Persian Gulf. The Andros Thunder in fact performed the three voyages contracted for, and having been chartered at a low rate of hire, was able to earn good profits for the plaintiffs. She was, however, a vessel of rather smaller carrying capacity than the Andros Springs, and was able to make a speed of only fourteen knots, instead of sixteen knots. On each of the three voyages made by the Andros Thunder the port of discharge was in fact Le Havre, and the round voyage between Le Havre and the Persian Gulf took about four days longer than would have been required by the Andros Springs. Accordingly the plaintiffs, with the aid of the Andros Thunder, were able to earn only somewhat reduced profits on three voyages under the C.F.R. charter, instead of the full profits on four voyages which, but for the collision, the Andros Springs would have been able to earn. A

Freights on the spot market were very low in June, 1958; the profit to be expected from employing the Andros Springs through that market would only be about $392 per day, little more than a tenth of what she had been earning under the C.F.R. charter. It was, therefore, arranged with Mobil that the Andros Springs should be delivered to the charterers at Rotterdam on July 11. The result was that the vessel remained idle at Rotterdam from June 7, to July 11, 1958, but she then came once more under profitable employment in pursuance of the Mobil charter, in which employment she continued for another seven years. B C

In these circumstances the registrar determined the claim for damages in respect of the detention of the Andros Springs on the basis of detention for thirty-seven days twenty-two hours.

The authority and the cases noted below* were cited during the argument in addition to the cases referred to in the judgment. D

R. H. W. Dunn, Q.C., and J. D. H. Rochford for the plaintiffs.

J. Franklin Willmer, Q.C., and J. S. Hobhouse for the defendants.

Apr. 10. WILLMER, L.J., read the following judgment in which after stating the nature of the motion and reviewing the facts, he continued: The issues to be decided may be summarised under four heads, as follows:—1. The defendants contended that the period of detention claimed ought to be reduced by two days four hours forty minutes, by reason of time alleged to have been unnecessarily spent in gas-freeing the vessel's tanks. 2. The defendants contended that the period of detention claimed ought to be further reduced by twenty-two hours twenty minutes—being the time allowed for a notional voyage from Rotterdam back to Le Havre, which in fact never took place. 3. The defendants further contended that prompt steps could and should have been taken to charter a substitute vessel for service under the C.F.R. charter, and argued that if this had been done it would have been possible to complete all four of the voyages which, but for the collision, the Andros Springs would have made. 4. Lastly, the principal contention of the defendants was that the formulation of the claim for detention was wrong in principle, in that it was directed solely to the detention of the Andros Springs, as if the vessel herself were the claimant, instead of being based on what the plaintiffs had lost, less what they had gained by the steps which they took to mitigate their loss. It was contended that on a proper reckoning of the plaintiffs' losses and gains it could be shown that they had suffered no loss at all, or alternatively a loss considerably less than that claimed under item 67. E F G H

It will be convenient to discuss these issues in the order in which I have set them out; but first I should observe that the registrar decided all questions in dispute in favour of the plaintiffs. His "Reasons for Decision" are set out at considerable length, but if I may most respectfully say so I have not found them particularly helpful. For in truth, apart from recording that he preferred the evidence given by the witnesses for the plaintiffs to that of the defendants' I

A witnesses, the registrar gave virtually no reasons for his decision. Most of the questions to be decided depended, not on the credibility of the evidence given on the one side or the other, but on the proper inferences to be drawn from facts which were never really in issue. In the circumstances I have felt more than usually free to approach the questions in dispute de novo, though always bearing in mind the registrar's preference for the plaintiffs' witnesses.

B [His LORDSHIP then turned to the dispute about the time occupied in gas-freeing. Although the collision damage was forward of the forward cofferdam, so that the collision repairs would not involve hot work in the vessel's cargo tanks (which were not forward of the cofferdam), yet on the evidence the registrar had found in favour of the view that it was reasonable that the whole vessel should be gas-freed and a chemist's certificate obtained for the whole ship,

C and on the whole matter His LORDSHIP had concluded, in agreement with the registrar, that the method adopted for butterworthing the ship's tanks was not so wrong as to amount to a breach of duty on the part of the plaintiffs; accordingly no deduction should be made on account of time consumed in gas-freeing. His LORDSHIP then turned to the question of the inclusion of a period of twenty-two hours and twenty minutes claimed for detention in respect of a notional voyage from Rotterdam to Le Havre. The voyage was in fact never made; in so far, therefore, as the registrar dismissed the defendants' objection to the inclusion of this period, he had, His LORDSHIP intimated, been wrong, and consequently, if a period of detention of the Andros Springs for repairs was in fact to be the basis of computation, the period would have to be reduced to thirty-six days twenty-three hours forty minutes. On the suggestion that the plaintiffs ought to have taken prompter steps to mitigate their loss by substituting a vessel for service under the C.F.R. charter in place of the Andros Springs His LORDSHIP agreed with the registrar in rejecting the defendants' criticisms. His LORDSHIP continued:] I come now, at long last, to what is after all the main question in dispute, namely, whether the plaintiffs' claim in respect of detention was formulated on the right basis. As I have already explained, the only claim

F put forward before the registrar was a claim for loss of profit and expenses thrown away during the actual period of detention of the Andros Springs. There was no alternative formulation of the claim before the registrar, although, as appears from his reasons, he did permit the plaintiffs to argue in the alternative that what was lost was in substance one round voyage. The registrar recorded that he was invited to make certain findings of fact in relation to this alternative way of

G formulating the claim. He, however, decided that the basis on which the claim had been formulated in item 67 was the correct basis, and allowed the claim as pleaded. In those circumstances he declined to deal with the alternative way of formulating the claim or to make any findings of fact relevant thereto.

When the matter came before me, I took the view that having regard to the unusual nature of the facts disclosed, and the obvious difficulties of the case,

H both parties should be free to discuss various possible ways in which the plaintiffs' claim might be formulated. In consequence the argument before me has ranged over a wide field, and a number of possibilities have been canvassed. At the conclusion of the argument, and in case the dispute might be taken to a higher court on appeal, I thought it right to direct that the plaintiffs should formulate in writing the various alternative ways in which their claim might be put,

I including the method contended for by the defendants—namely, that of striking a balance between overall losses and gains—showing in each case what the result in figures would be. That has been done, and a document entitled "Amended Further and Better Particulars of item 67 of the plaintiffs' claim" has been placed before me. The difficulty of this case is that of applying well established principles of law to the peculiar facts disclosed. There is, I think, no room for doubt as to the law to be applied. Counsel for the defendants in opening the appeal put forward three basic propositions of law, to which counsel for the plaintiffs in his turn added a fourth. I restate them, because I agree with counsel that they are fundamental to the task of ascertaining the true measure of the plaintiffs' loss. A

(i) The plaintiffs are entitled to be placed, so far as is possible, in the same pecuniary position as they would have been if there had been no collision.

(ii) The plaintiffs were under a duty to take reasonable steps to mitigate their loss, and are accordingly not entitled to recover any part of their loss which results from failure to take such steps. These two propositions are so well established and elementary that at this date I do not think it necessary to cite authority in support of them. B

(iii) Where the plaintiffs have taken action arising out of the casualty, which has avoided or diminished their loss, they cannot recover in respect of such avoidance or diminution. Put more shortly, they cannot recover for avoided loss. Authority for this proposition may be found in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. Underground Electric Rys. Co. of London, Ltd. (1)—see especially per VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. C

(iv) The fourth proposition added by counsel for the plaintiffs is that profits which have in fact been made by the plaintiffs have to be set off against the loss claimed only if they are such as could not have been made but for the tort or breach of contract complained of. In support of this proposition I was referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Vic Mill, Ltd. (2)—see especially per HAMILTON, L.J. This last proposition is of especial importance in the present case, because one of the difficult questions which I am asked to determine is how far, if at all, it can be said that profits earned by the Andros Springs under the Mobil charter during such time as the C.F.R. charter was still current were profits which could not have been made but for the collision. D

In the first instance, however, the plaintiffs adhered to their claim as originally formulated, namely, a loss of profit together with expenses thrown away during the period ending on June 7 while the Andros Springs was laid up for repairs. To the question posed by BOWEN, L.J., in the course of his oft quoted judgment in The Argentino (3), viz.: E

“... what is the use which the shipowner would, but for the accident, have had of his ship, and what (excluding the element of uncertain and speculative and special profits) the shipowner, but for the accident, would have earned by the use of her.” F

Counsel for the plaintiff answers:

“But for the collision the Andros Springs would have continued running under the C.F.R. charter, and would have continued to earn profits at the rate of $3,659.48 cents per day for a period of some thirty-seven days.” G

Moreover, he points out that the whole of this loss had been sustained by June 7, which was the date when the Andros Thunder first started to run under C.F.R. charter, so as to salve some of the plaintiffs' profits under that charter. The profits which the Andros Springs would have made, but for her detention during those thirty-seven days, were thus lost to the plaintiffs for ever; they had gone for good before the plaintiffs' remedial measures in mitigation had even started to come into operation. The fact that subsequently the Andros Springs was able to resume earning high profits under the Mobil charter was said to be completely irrelevant; for her ability to do this arose, not out of the collision, but out of the previously negotiated charterparty. These profits were accordingly not such that it could be said of them that they could not have been earned but for the collision within the principle of Re Vic Mill, Ltd. (4). They were profits which could have been earned in any event, the only difference being that thanks to the collision it was possible to earn them some weeks earlier than would otherwise have been the case. A The argument for the plaintiffs was most attractively put, and I hope that in this brief summary I have done it justice. In the end, however, I do not feel able to accept it, or to take the view that the case is quite so easy as the plaintiffs sought to make it. I agree with the submission put forward on behalf of the defendants that to concentrate solely on the loss of profits sustained by the Andros Springs during her thirty-seven days detention is to fall into the fallacy exposed by VISCOUNT SUMNER in The Ikala (5), when he remarked, that :

“A ship’s day is not like a unit of currency, always good for so many shillings.”

C There are no doubt numerous simple cases where the loss can be assessed in this way. The present is not, however, a simple case. The ship which was damaged and laid up for repair was but a unit in a complicated organisation which somehow had to be maintained. It was in the plaintiffs’ own interest, as well as their duty in law, to take such reasonable steps as were open to them to mitigate their loss by preserving, so far as they could, the smooth running of their organisation. This they sought to do (a) by substituting the Andros Thunder for the Andros Springs under the C.F.R. charter, so as to ensure at least that that profitable charter was not lost, and (b) by arranging to accelerate the commencement date of the Mobil charter. It seems to me obvious that in so far as these measures resulted in avoidance or diminution of the plaintiffs’ overall loss they must be taken into account and set against the loss. But in order to enable this to be done it is vitally necessary to take an overall view of the plaintiffs’ business as a whole and, as was suggested by LORD HALDANE in the Westinghouse case (6), to look at what actually happened and balance the gains against the losses.

F So far I am disposed to accept the submissions put forward on behalf of the defendants. Unhappily for them, however, when they were before the registrar they over stated their case to such an extent as to produce a manifestly absurd result. They sought to show that the plaintiffs were so successful in the steps which they took in mitigation that, so far from being involved in a loss, they were actually able to earn higher profits in consequence of the collision, that is, that their gains exceeded their losses. Counsel for the defendants prepared and submitted to the learned registrar two documents which purported to show the balance of gains and losses on two alternative hypotheses. One hypothesis was that, but for the collision, the Andros Springs would have made two further voyages to L’Avera and two to Le Havre. The other hypothesis was that she would have made four voyages to Le Havre. I refrain from setting out any of the figures contained in these documents, for in the course of the development of the case in argument here and below they have been amended and re-amended to such an extent as to become almost unrecognisable. It is sufficient to say that each of these documents was devised in the form of a balance sheet. On the “Loss” side the defendants set out:—

H (a) the gross freights which but for the collision the Andros Springs would have earned, from which were deducted commissions and the daily running expenses of the ship at an agreed rate; and (b) a sum for expenses incurred by the ship during the period of detention for repairs, as well as for the period subsequent thereto up to July 11.

I On the “Gain” side the defendants set out:

(a) the freight in fact earned by the Andros Thunder in the three voyages which she made under the C.F.R. charter, less the cost of hire of the Andros Thunder, and less commission; and (b) the whole of the profits earned by the Andros Springs under the Mobil charter from July 11 down to the date when she would have been expected to commence trading under that charter if there had been no collision.

(5) [1929] A.C. 196 at p. 205.

(6) [1911-13] All E.R. Rep. at p. 70; [1912] A.C. at p. 691.

The result of these calculations was to show that on either of the assumed hypotheses the plaintiffs must have gained substantially more than they lost. This result is so obviously absurd that I am reminded of the words of HOLROYD PEARCE, L.J., with reference to the assessment of damages in Daniels v. Jones (7), when he said:

"Since the question is one of actual material loss, some arithmetical calculations are necessarily involved in an assessment of the injury. But they do not provide a substitute for commonsense. Much of the calculation must be in the realms of hypothesis, and in that region arithmetic is a good servant, but a bad master."

It is not difficult to see where the calculation put forward on behalf of the defendants has gone wrong. The fundamental fallacy lies in the assumption that the profits earned by the Andros Springs in running under the Mobil charter were earned in consequence of the plaintiffs' efforts to mitigate their loss arising from the collision. The earning of these profits flowed not from measures taken in consequence of the collision, but from the fact of the charter having been negotiated months previously. Collision or no collision, these profits would have been earned in any event. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are justified in invoking the principle of Re Vic Mill, Ltd. (8) to show that the profits earned under the Mobil charter cannot as such be included in the calculation as a gain arising from the collision.

That is not, however, the end of the matter. It seems to me that the plaintiffs in their turn put their case much too high, when they submitted that the earnings of profits under the Mobil charter could be ignored altogether. The plain fact is that what the plaintiffs gained, and gained in consequence of the measures which they took arising out of the collision, was the ability to earn these high profits under the Mobil charter some three months earlier than they would have done if there had been no collision, and to earn them at the same time as the Andros Thunder was earning for them profits under the C.F.R. charter. This was an advantage which could not have been gained but for the collision. The real problem—and it is a difficult and in my experience an unusual problem—is how to assess in terms of money the value of this gain, so that it may be given its proper place in the overall balance of losses and gains.

I reject as merely derisory the suggestion put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs that the highest figure at which this gain should be assessed is on the basis of three months' interest on the first month's profit, plus two months' interest on the second month's profit, plus one month's interest on the third month's profit, which I am told amount to a mere $2,628. The matter can, I think, be tested in this way. If the plaintiffs had taken no steps to advance the commencement date of the Mobil charter, they would have to credit for the fact that the Andros Springs would have become a free ship on June 7. Her value as a free ship from the date when, if there had been no collision, she would have commenced running under the Mobil charter would have represented a gain to be brought into the account of losses and gains. According to the figures with which I have been furnished the lowest rate of freight which could have been obtained by trading the Andros Springs on the spot market would have yielded a profit of $392 per day. If one takes a period from June 7 to a date in mid-October that would have represented a gain of about $45,000 or more. It must be assumed from the course which they took that the plaintiffs in their wisdom thought it more profitable to advance the commencement date of the Mobil charter, even at the cost of keeping the vessel idle from June 7 to July 11, rather than trade her on the spot market. This seems to indicate that in the plaintiffs' own view the advancement of the Mobil charter represented a gain of very considerable value.

After giving the matter the best consideration that I can, I have come to the

(8) [1913] 1 Ch. 465.

A conclusion that the right way to look at the matter is to regard the whole of the Mobil charter as having been advanced by something like three months. Every penny profit earned under that charter over the whole of the seven years for which it lasted was earned some three months earlier than would have been the case had there been no collision. Put another way, the profit which in the event was earned by the Andros Springs between July 11 and some date in October, 1958, took the place of profit which would otherwise have been earned in the period between July 11 and the corresponding date in October, 1965. That being so, I think that the defendants are justified in their alternative contention that the value of what the plaintiffs gained by advancing the commencement of the Mobil charter can fairly be taken as the equivalent of seven years compound interest on the profits earned during the period whereby the charter was advanced.

C I think that I am now in a position to state my conclusions of fact and to set out my calculations of the financial results that flow therefrom. I am satisfied that the plaintiffs took reasonable steps to mitigate the losses flowing from the collision (a) by substituting the Andros Thunder for the Andros Springs for service under the C.F.R. charter, (b) by advancing the commencement date of the Mobil charter, and (c) with a view thereto keeping the Andros Springs idle at Rotterdam from June 7 to July 11. The overall loss of trading time for the Andros Springs was thus seventy-two days; but of this period twenty-two days would in any event have been lost in carrying out survey, cleaning, painting and owners' repairs (including repair of the bottom damage) in preparation for service under the Mobil charter. I find that if there had been no collision the Andros Springs would have completed four more voyages after the collision voyage under the C.F.R. charter. On a balance of probabilities I find that the first of these four voyages would have been to L'Avera (for which conclusion I rely on a letter from the charterers' agents of Apr. 30, 1958), and that the other three voyages would have been to Le Havre (which is what the Andros Thunder in fact did). Including the collision voyage, this would have occupied 168 days down to the completion of discharge of the final cargo at Le Havre. The Andros Springs would then have been delayed for a further twenty-two days for reasons already stated, making a total of 190 days before she would have been ready for tendering under the Mobil charter. This means that if there had been no collision she would have started to run under the Mobil charter on or about Oct. 19. The effect of what was done, therefore, was to advance the date of commencement of the Mobil charter by one hundred days.

G The financial results which flow from these findings seem to be as follows. The figures which I set out are those with which I have been supplied by the parties, but they will no doubt be carefully checked before the order is drawn up. The plaintiffs' losses were:

H	(1) profit on one L'Avera and three Le Havre voyages by the Andros Springs	$542,068.55 cents
	(2) expenses thrown away during fifty days detention of the Andros Springs	$41,807.00

Total lost	$583,875.55 cents
------------	---------------------------

I	The plaintiffs' gains to be set against these losses were:
	(1) profit earned by the Andros Thunder on three Le Havre voyages	$369,169.08 cents
	(2) seven years compound interest at five per cent. on $350,705 representing profits for 100 days under the Mobil charter	$142,772.00

Total gained	$511,941.08 cents
--------------	---------------------------

The resulting net loss is $71,934.47 cents, which sum should be substituted for the sum allowed by the learned registrar in respect of item 67 of the claim. The result is that in my judgment the objection succeeds in relation to item 67 of the claim to the extent which I have indicated, but fails in relation to the other items in dispute.

CRESSWELL AND ANOTHER (TRUSTEES OF THE COBBETT SETTLEMENT) v. PROCTOR AND OTHERS (TRUSTEES OF THE CONVENT OF THE HOLY FAMILY).

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (HARMAN, DANCKWERTS and WINN, L.JJ.), April 4, 1968.]

Restrictive Covenant—Restrictive covenant affecting land—Discharge or modification—Covenant imposed in February, 1963, application to modify in February, 1965—No change of circumstances affecting land—Applicants covenantors, respondents covenantees—Modification refused—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5 c. 20), s. 84 (1).

Purchasers, owners of a neighbouring bungalow, bought in February, 1963, a piece of garden land adjoining their premises. They entered into a restrictive covenant with their vendors not to erect any building on the land but to use it as a private garden. In 1964, their circumstances having changed, they sold the bungalow and land, but not this piece of garden land as the purchaser did not want it. In February, 1965, they applied to the Lands Tribunal to modify the restrictive covenant so as to permit development of the garden land. There was evidence before the tribunal that the proposed modification would not harm the vendors who sold the garden land in 1963.

Held (per HARMAN, L.J., and DANCKWERTS, L.J.): even if the application were within s. 84 (1) (c) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, it would be a wrong exercise of discretion to sanction the modification of this restrictive covenant, for in substance the application was to legalise a breach of covenant freely entered into only two years previously; and (per WINN, L.J.) the Lands Tribunal had not wrongly exercised its discretion in refusing modification of the restrictive covenant (see p. 684, letters G and I, and p. 685, letter G, post).

Appeal dismissed.

Case Stated.

The applicants appealed by way of Case Stated against a decision of the Lands Tribunal (JOHN WATSON, Esq.) given on Dec. 12, 1966, dismissing their application to the tribunal to modify a covenant which they had entered into in respect of a piece of land adjoining Broom Gardens, Coombe, in the county of Surrey, which they had acquired by a conveyance dated Feb. 4, 1963. The grounds of

A appeal were as follows—(i) That the tribunal misdirected itself in law in holding that

“ to grant such an application within four years of the date it was imposed, when in effect the applicants are the original covenantors and the objectors the original covenantees in the circumstances I have narrated, would in my opinion be contrary to public policy and an abuse of the tribunal’s powers.”

B Further there was no evidence on which the tribunal could so find. (ii) That the tribunal misdirected itself in law as to the true construction and effect of s. 84 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. (iii) That the tribunal having found the following: (a) that the respondents (the trustees of the Convent of the Holy Family, who had sold the land to the applicants in February, 1963) appeared as objectors because of what they deemed a moral obligation to the residents’ association and that even that obligation was doubtful; and (b) that the applicants had satisfied the conditions laid down in s. 84 (1) (c); should have exercised its discretion in favour of the applicant. (iv) That the tribunal having found that there was no injury to the respondents was wrong in law to award compensation. (v) That there was no evidence on which the tribunal could assess the compensation at £2,000. (vi) That the tribunal erred in law as to the principles on which such compensation should be awarded.

The respondents did not appear and were not represented.

E HARMAN, L.J.: In the year 1962 a Mr. Cobbett and his wife purchased a part of the garden ground of a property known as “The Haven” at New Malden. It is coloured orange on a map which has been conveniently put before us. They got planning permission to erect on that ground and did erect a bungalow. In order to extend their garden they bought in the same year a small piece of land to the south coloured green on the plan. In order to extend themselves still further they brought in the same year a little later a plot of land coloured yellow on the plan, and they paid £500 for it. They bought it from F the trustees of a convent which was being run as a girls’ school in a large house to the north of them, which abutted on a different road, George Road, and which had a long garden behind it. The bit of yellow land was the southernmost bit of that garden. It had no outlet to a road. The orange land had such an outlet, because Mr. Cobbett, when he purchased “The Haven”, before he sold G off the bit with the existing house on it to the west, kept for himself a strip so as to enable him to get to a public road called Brook Gardens. The conveyance of the yellow land was dated Feb. 4, 1963. It was a registered transfer, and there was a covenant entered into by the purchasers

H “ not to erect any building whatsoever whether of a permanent nature or not on the said land [and] to use the said land for the purpose of a private garden and for no other purpose whatsoever.”

I Now there was an alteration in the circumstances of Mr. Cobbett which made it desirable for him to move to a larger house where he could have his parents to stay. Therefore early in 1964 he sold the orange and the green land. What profit he made does not appear; but the purchaser did not want the yellow land, he had enough garden already, and so Mr. Cobbett and his wife were left with the yellow land on their hands. They thought that they would, as it is called, “develop” that piece of land, and they applied for planning permission in May, 1964, and obtained it. There was still, however, the covenant which they had entered into with the trustees for the convent and they applied to them to release the covenant. There was another covenant with their purchaser, a Mr. Wilson; they applied to him and he eventually apparently did release his rights, but the trustees of the convent (or the Mother Superior) were not willing to do so. Their reasons were perfectly good moral reasons; they felt under a moral obligation not to do so by reason of the fact that, when they themselves had purchased their property in the 1950s, they had entered into a number of restrictive covenants which they felt that they ought to observe and which the local residents' association were very anxious that they should observe. Therefore they refused their permission, as they felt bound to do. A

On that, in February, 1965, Mr. and Mrs. Cobbett applied to the Lands Tribunal to have their covenant modified. That was a surprising state of affairs. One has never heard of any parallel case at all. The idea that a covenant, voluntarily entered into, can be modified within a year or so, without any change in circumstances of the property at all, is to me shocking. It is not beyond the jurisdiction of the court to modify a covenant the day after it is made if it saw fit to do so; but the powers of the court, or the tribunal indeed before whom the matter first comes, are discretionary powers, and I cannot imagine circumstances in which, within a few months, a covenant solemnly entered into would be released. I do not think that it is a matter which depends on whether Mr. and Mrs. Cobbett got the land cheaper because they said that they would not build on it, though one may suspect that they did. I do not think that it is even a matter that they now propose to make a large profit (the extent of which has been in dispute) by developing the land and giving it an outlet down their own drive. It seems to me to be a matter within the discretion of the court and one in which the member of the tribunal who decided the case decided it in the exercise of his discretion, saying that he felt that what he called "public policy" demanded that such an application should not be acceded to, even if the applicant could bring himself within the grounds of s. 84 (1) (a), (b) or (c) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. He thought that these applicants were within para. (c) because, as he said, the only evidence given—there being no counter-evidence called, that being against the conscience of the nuns—was that a surveyor came along and said that he did not think that the modification of the covenant would hurt them, and that would therefore bring the applicants within para. (c). The member of the tribunal said: "But I do not think this is a case where I ought to exercise my discretion in favour of the applicants." The position there is, as I see it, that the applicants have entered into a covenant under seal; it is one that could be enforced by injunction and would be so enforced unless modification can be obtained from the tribunal. In my judgment it is quite out of the question to modify it in circumstances such as those. The only reason that Mr. Cobbett says that it should be modified is that his circumstances have changed and he does not want to live there any more. As a reason for being allowed to act in 1965 contrary to a covenant solemnly made in 1963, it is a suggestion I have never heard made before, and I hope that I shall never hear it made again. B C D E F G

I think that the decision of the tribunal was perfectly right and that this appeal ought to be dismissed. H

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: I agree. The covenant which is under consideration in this case was entered into between Mr. and Mrs. Cobbett and the convent on Feb. 4, 1963. Application under s. 84 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 was made by the Cobbetts on Feb. 5, 1965, just two years after the completion of the purchase of the land by them. On Mar. 30, 1965, the land was transferred to the trustees of a voluntary settlement made by the Cobbetts, and the application was amended accordingly. In substance, however, the application is one seeking to legalise a breach of the covenant thus freely entered into within such a short period. In my opinion such a case was not within the true intention of s. 84 and sanction should not be given in the exercise of the discretion which the tribunal undoubtedly possesses under the section. The sanctity of contract must have some relevance. The section no doubt allows a modification of contractual obligations in certain circumstances; but in my opinion this is not a case which was contemplated by the section. I agree that the tribunal was I

A perfectly right in refusing to exercise its discretion in favour of it in this case, and I also would dismiss the appeal.

WINN, L.J.: I would not feel justified myself in saying that there is any real reason to doubt that the Lands Tribunal member acted within his discretion in refusing this application. I would be very diffident indeed, in any case, in expressing, ignorant as I am of this type of problem, any view which differed at all from that expressed by my lords. On the other hand, I would think it wrong to refrain from saying this much for myself: that I do not think that there is any ground for suspicion in this case that Mr. Cobbett has tried to take any unfair advantage of his covenantees, or has set out to produce a situation which will enable him to obtain a profit for this yellow land, otherwise than by necessary response to a family situation which has compelled him to take the course which he has adopted. I would like to say also that I think that his offer of £1,000 (1) was perfectly realistic and fair as a basis for sharing the appreciation of the value of this land, which is attributable not only to the increase in the value of land during the years which have elapsed between 1963 and 1965-66-67, but also—much more directly, of course—to the access that has been provided to that land in the meantime. I think that the member missed this point and, indeed, misapplied the factor of potential profit: his observations about increased value should be rejected.

There was, of course, a startlingly prompt attempt to escape from a voluntarily undertaken contractual obligation—to which my lords have referred. No attempt to conceal the truth of that situation can be imputed to Mr. Cobbett, since he began the application in his own name and that of his wife, who were replaced by trustees during the pendency of the application. I think myself that there is considerable merit in the view that this land would be better used to carry a bungalow and provide living accommodation than it will if it remains sterile in the sense of having no building on it. This is a neighbourhood in which a number of planning permissions exist, which, as the evidence shows, will presumably result in the building of more houses in the immediate vicinity. However, whilst those are affirmative considerations which might have led another mind to override the sanctity-of-contract argument in favour, on balance, of modifying the covenant, I do not think that I could possibly say, any more than my lords have thought it possible to say, that this tribunal member abused his discretion or acted on wrong grounds—poorly as he expressed himself—in exercising that discretion. I also agree that this appeal must fail.

THE PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND ANOTHER v. DICKSON.

[House of Lords (Lord Reid, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, Lord Hodson, Lord Upjohn and Lord Wilberforce), March 18, 19, 20, 21, 25, 26, May 29, 1968.]

Trade—Restraint of trade—Corporation—Professional society—Resolution of members restricting trading activities of members—Part of code of professional conduct, binding in honour but enforceable only through disciplinary statutory committee—Justiciable issue—Member entitled to court's determination of validity of resolution—No evidence of reasonableness of restriction in public interest—Whether restriction in unreasonable restraint of trade—Whether ultra vires the society as not sufficiently related to relevant main object of society.

Among the objects of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, which was incorporated by royal charter in 1843, since replaced by a royal charter of 1953, was one, which was the object relevant to the present case, "to maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in the exercise of the profession of pharmacy". All registered pharmacists were required by law to be members. In general, pharmacists had both professional activities and also trading activities, the society being primarily concerned with the former activities, and the trading interests of owners of pharmacies being mainly dealt with by the National Pharmaceutical Union. Limited companies could not be members of the society nor be registered pharmacists, but they could employ registered pharmacists and must do so if they were to be authorised sellers of poisons. There were 29,004 members of the society. The council of the society issued a code of conduct for the guidance of pharmacists and corporate bodies carrying on business under the Pharmacy Acts, which most pharmacists regarded as binding on them. It was a code of ethics, of which the council of the society sought to secure observance, primarily without reference to the statutory committee, which was a disciplinary body with powers of striking a pharmacist off the register or removing a company chemist from the register, subject to appeal to the High Court. The statutory committee provided the only means of compelling observance; in the last resort proceedings before the committee might be initiated in regard to conduct infringing the code of ethics.

In July, 1965, a motion was passed by a large majority of members of the society, consequent on a report of a committee set up in 1955. The motion was designed to raise the status of the profession and check extension of trading activities. It was as follows—"New pharmacies should be situated only in premises which are physically distinct, and should be devoted solely to: (i) professional services, as defined [the dispensing of medicines and the sale of pharmaceutical goods]; (ii) . . . non-professional services as defined [the sale of traditional goods, e.g., cosmetics and photographic requisites]; (iii) such other services as may be approved by the council [the sale of non-traditional goods]; and the range of services in existing pharmacies, or in pharmacy departments of larger establishments, should not be extended beyond the present limits, except as approved by the council". This resolution was intended to be included in the code of ethics. On appeal from an order upholding a declaration that the proposed restrictions embodied in the motion were invalid and an injunction restraining the society from acting on them, the order having been obtained at the instance of a registered pharmacist and member of the society, who was also a director of a public company owning many chemists' shops,

Held: the declaration and the injunction had been rightly granted for the following reasons—

(i) since the restrictions expressed in the motion, even though binding only in honour, would become rules of professional conduct of which the

A council of the society would do their best to secure observance, the respondent was entitled to have the question of their validity determined by the court, and the issues so raised were justiciable (see p. 689, letter H, p. 695, letter B, p. 697, letter H, p. 700, letter H, p. 701, letter E, and p. 704, letters E and H, post).

(ii) (LORD HODSON not deciding this point) the motion was ultra vires as it was not sufficiently related to the only relevant main object of the society, viz., maintaining the honour and safeguarding and promoting the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy (see p. 691, letter A, p. 694, letters B and E, p. 702, letter H, and p. 706, letter F, post, cf., p' 698, letter D, post).

(iii) the restrictions to be imposed by the motion were in restraint of trade and had not been justified as reasonably necessary for achieving the objects of the society's charter (see p. 690, letters B and I, p. 695, letter C, p. 696, letter B, p. 698, letter F, p. 699, letter C, p. 704, letter B, p. 706, letter G, and p. 707, letter F, post).

Dicta of WILLES, C.J., in Gunmakers etc. (Master, etc.) v. Fell ((1742), Willes at p. 388) and of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., Ltd. ([1891-94] All E.R. Rep. at p. 18) applied.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL (sub nom. Dickson v. The Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain [1967] 2 All E.R. 558) affirmed.

[Editorial Note. While recognising that in the present case the members of the profession concerned were normally engaged not only in their professional activities but also in trading activities, the decision is nevertheless authority that professional bodies are not outside the general doctrine of restraint of trade; see, e.g., at p. 703, letters A and D, post.

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the appellants, the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain and their president, against an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD DENNING, M.R., DANCKWERTS and SACHS, L.J.J.), dated Jan. 26, 1967, and reported [1967] 2 All E.R. 558, upholding the judgment of PENNYCUIK, J., reported [1966] 3 All E.R. 404, declaring that it was not within the competence of the appellant society to enforce or carry out or attempt to enforce or carry out the provisions of the resolution passed by a large majority at a general meeting on July 25, 1965. The respondent, Robert Campbell Miller Dickson, was a member of the appellant society and the retail director of Boots Pure Drug Co., Ltd. The facts are set out in the opinion of LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST at p. 691, et seq., post. D

R. I. S. Bax, Q.C., and R. N. Thomas for the appellants.

R. J. Parker, Q.C., F. P. Neill, Q.C., and G. M. Waller for the respondent. F

Their lordships took time for consideration.

May 29. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID: My Lords, the first appellant is a society incorporated by royal charter in 1843. Its objects are now set out in a supplemental charter of 1953. The second appellant is its president. By statute all registered pharmacists are members of the society. It is claimed, I think rightly, that pharmacy is a profession. It is necessary to pursue a course of study and training and to pass a wide ranging examination before one can become a registered pharmacist, and the work of a pharmacist in dispensing medicine is highly skilled and responsible. G

A main object of the society is "to maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy". In addition to statutory provisions there are a number of rules for the guidance of members, which have been adopted by the society from time to time. When necessary the council of the society seek to enforce these rules by bringing pressure to bear on those who do not comply with them, and ultimately by bringing the matter before a statutory committee, which has power to order removal from the register of the name of a pharmacist who has been guilty of misconduct which in its opinion renders him unfit to have his name on the register. H

There are about twenty-nine thousand registered pharmacists. Some, such as those employed in hospitals, have no other duties than the professional task of dispensing; but the typical pharmacist owns or is employed in a chemist's shop where goods other than dispensed medicines are sold to the public. Such I

A goods have been divided into three classes: first "professional", which includes, besides medicines and sick room requirements, agricultural, horticultural and industrial chemicals and various scientific and other appliances; secondly, "traditional" which, largely for historical reasons, includes cosmetics and photographic requisites; and thirdly "non-traditional", which includes a wide variety of articles which many pharmacists have found it profitable and convenient to sell in chemists shops. So most pharmacists act in a dual capacity, combining retail trading with their professional work.

B That pharmacists should be engaged in trade is regarded by many pharmacists as undesirable; but it is generally recognised that comparatively few chemist's shops could survive without engaging in some degree of trading. The present policy of the council of the society is to restrict trading activities so far as is economically practicable as well as to ensure that such activities are carried on in a manner compatible with the professional character of pharmacists. It has been one of their objects to raise the status of the profession. In 1955 a committee was set up, and, after extensive consultation, it submitted a report. A number of its recommendations, with some alteration, were incorporated in a motion which was passed by a large majority at a largely attended general meeting on July 25, 1965. The motion was as follows:

E "New pharmacies should be situated only in premises which are physically distinct, and should be devoted solely to: (i) professional services, as defined in para. 19 of the report of the committee on the general practice of pharmacy, (ii) within the limits recommended in the report non-professional services as defined in para. 19 of the report, and (iii) such other services as may be approved by the council; and the range of services in existing pharmacies, or in pharmacy departments of large establishments should not be extended beyond the present limits except as approved by the council."

F The respondent is a director of Boots Pure Drug Co., Ltd., and is a member of the society. In this action he seeks a declaration and injunction and on June 23, 1966, PENNYCUICK, J. (1) made an order declaring

G "That it is not within the powers purposes or objects of The Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain hereinafter called the society to enforce or carry out or attempt to enforce or carry out the provisions of the motion specified in the pleadings and set forth in the schedule hereto or any of the said provisions on the ground that the said provisions are in restraint of trade."

That order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (2).

H The appellants maintain for a number of reasons that this declaration should not be made. In the first place they say that there is no justiciable issue; but I agree with your lordships that this contention must be rejected. If this motion stands it becomes a rule of professional conduct and the appellants do not deny that they will do their best to enforce it. So a pharmacist who does not restrict his trade in this way may be reported to the statutory committee and he will be at risk of that committee finding that he has been guilty of misconduct and of being deprived of his professional qualification. In my judgment the court has I the power and duty to determine this question at this stage.

In every profession, of which I have any knowledge, there is a code of conduct, written or unwritten, which makes it improper for members of the profession to engage in certain activities in which ordinary members of the public are quite entitled to engage. Normally this is regarded as a domestic matter within the profession; but it appears to me that if a member of a profession can show that a particular restriction on his activities goes beyond anything which can reasonably be related to the maintenance of professional honour or standards, the court must be able to intervene. In the present case there is also a question whether these restrictions are within the objects of the society. In Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (3) it was held that certain attempts to regulate trading by the members were ultra vires. But the respondent does not dispute that the society is entitled to regulate such trading activities in so far as that is reasonably necessary to achieve the society's objects set out in the charter. So it becomes a question whether these restrictions can properly be related to the maintenance or improvement of the status of the profession of pharmacy. That these restrictions are in restraint of trade cannot be doubted. Any pharmacist who opens a new chemist's shop can only sell professional or traditional goods in it, and in any existing chemist's shop no new classes of non-traditional goods can be sold unless the council consents. This restraint may severely hamper the shopkeeper, and indeed it may make the business so unprofitable that the shop has to be closed. I need not consider the wider aspect of public interest, whether that might seriously inconvenience members of the public who wish to have prescriptions dispensed or to buy medicines.

The respondent argues that, as this motion would operate in restraint of trade, the ordinary principles of restraint of trade apply so that the appellants must plead and prove justification. I am very doubtful whether that is so where restraints exist as part of a code of professional conduct. If the ordinary rule were to apply, any member of a profession who wanted to make more money by disregarding some long standing rule of professional conduct could require the restraint to be justified without himself having to allege and prove that the rule was unreasonable. The onus would be on the body defending the standards of the profession and, unless the tests laid down in the authorities are to be altered, I do not see how the court could limit the extent to which it would interfere in the domestic affairs of the profession. On the general question of the ordinary rules of restraint of trade I may be permitted to refer to what I said in Esso Petroleum Co., Ltd. v. Harper's Garage (Stourport), Ltd. (4). I do not, however, think it necessary to pursue this matter because, wherever the onus may lie in this case, I am of opinion that these restraints cannot reasonably be related to the objects of the society.

The appellants' pleadings are silent on this matter and the evidence is very vague. Three suggestions were made. First, that the adoption of the motion would make the profession more attractive to new entrants; secondly, that it would avoid pharmacists being distracted from their professional work; and thirdly, that it would raise, or at least prevent lowering, the status of the profession. The first is not now maintained; such evidence as there is indicates that entrants tend to go where there is trading as well as professional work because prospects are better. The second could be a formidable point but it is not supported by the evidence. No doubt the distraction is greater where the proportion of trading to professional work is greater, but there is no evidence that selling non-traditional goods is more distracting than selling professional or traditional goods. It is the third point, status, which is now chiefly relied on. There is, however, no evidence that members of the public, or indeed members of the society, have a higher opinion of the pharmacist who does not sell non-traditional goods than they have of the pharmacist who does. I could well understand the status would be improved by only selling high class goods, or by limiting the proportion of trading to professional work, or by having premises of dignified appearance. The motion has not, however, been related to such considerations; it permits the sale of lower class traditional goods to any extent but forbids even high class non-traditional goods of a new character.

A I do not doubt that this motion was proposed and supported with the belief that it would assist in maintaining and raising the standards of the profession; but I cannot find from the evidence or from common knowledge any reasonable support for this belief. So I must hold that the motion has not been sufficiently related to the objects of the society to be intra vires.

I would dismiss the appeal.

B LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST: My Lords, for many years past most of those who have been in general practice as pharmacists have also been engaged in certain retail trade activities. In addition to supplying medicines, whether on prescriptions or otherwise, retail chemists sell what are called pharmaceutical (or professional) goods. Medical and surgical appliances are within that description. Generally retail chemists also sell goods which, though non-professional, have traditionally been closely associated with pharmacy. These include not only such goods as perfumes, cosmetics and toilet requisites but also cameras and photographic materials. Furthermore a very considerable number of retail chemists sell goods which are in no way associated with pharmacy. These are referred to as non-traditional goods. Within their range might be found some of such articles as greeting cards, thermos flasks, handbags, beachwear, jewellery, books or even wines and spirits.

D It is widely accepted that it would not be economically practical to provide dispensing services without at the same time selling pharmaceutical or professional goods. The judge (5) has found that it would be highly disadvantageous economically to exclude the sale of traditional goods. As to the non-traditional goods the view of the judge was that, though most existing retail shops would probably be viable if non-traditional goods were not sold, it would be disadvantageous economically if their sale was on a much smaller scale than as it is at present.

E The state of affairs that has evolved over the years is therefore that most pharmacists have dual rôles. The one is that of the practitioner in pharmacy as such. The other is that of a retail trader. The former involves professional activities. The latter involves trading activities. It has, however, been the view of many that the sale of non-traditional goods if carried on to any significant extent is undesirable and is out of keeping with the practice of pharmacy. In pursuance of this view, a plan was formed which, if fully observed, would clamp down on trading activities and impose restrictions in regard to new pharmacies. The motion that was carried was designed to give effect to the plan. Under it a halt is to be called. There is to be a standstill. Activities in trade as they have developed are not to be forbidden, but certain extensions of them are only to be permitted if approved by the council of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. The litigation concerns the question whether it is within the competence of the society to resolve that members should conform to the scheme of the plan. In effect the respondent in commencing these proceedings has asked—by what right do you require that the trading activities of members are to be restricted or curtailed either in new pharmacies or in existing ones? The respondent claims that the society has no such right.

H It becomes necessary first to consider what are the objects and purposes of the society. The society came into being as the result of a voluntary association of chemists and druggists. A royal charter of incorporation was granted in 1843. I The society was formed for the purpose of advancing chemistry and pharmacy and promoting a uniform system of education “of those who should practice the same and also for the protection of those who carry on the business of chemists and druggists” and for certain benevolent purposes. There have been various Acts of Parliament dealing with the duties and powers of the society. In 1920 there was litigation (Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (6)), the object of which was to test the extent of the society's powers under the royal charter and the Pharmacy Acts (7). It was held, inter alia, that it was not within the objects, powers or purposes of the society to regulate the hours of business of members or to regulate the wages and conditions of employment as between master and employee members of the society or to regulate the prices at which members might sell their goods. Soon after that case a trade union was formed (The National Pharmaceutical Union). That union has dealt with matters relating to the trading interests of owners of pharmacies. After the passing of the Pharmacy Act, 1953, the society was granted a supplemental charter. It is under this charter that the society now functions.

Without referring in detail to legislative provisions it is sufficient to say that membership of the society consists of all persons whose names are registered as pharmaceutical chemists in accordance with the provisions of the Pharmacy Act, 1954. Corporate bodies are not members of the society, but they may employ members. They must do so if they wish to be authorised sellers of poisons under the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933. Under its current charter the objects of the society are different from those under the charter of 1843. One object stated in the new charter is: "To maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy".

The council of the society issue a statement on matters of professional conduct. The statement records that standards of professional conduct for pharmacy are necessary in the public interest to ensure an efficient service. The society has an ethical committee whose duties are to keep the statement under review and to advise generally on questions of professional conduct. In the statement it is recited:

"The council in considering whether action should be taken on any matter are not limited to matters mentioned in this statement, nor on the other hand does it follow that all instances of conduct at variance with the statement would, when receiving such consideration, be treated as of equal importance. It is desired to emphasise that this statement is not primarily a basis for applying compulsion but a means of assisting pharmacists to discharge the moral obligation resting upon them to observe standards of conduct appropriate to their calling."

All the canons of proper conduct which are formulated and enshrined in the statement have in fact been approved from time to time by the society in general meeting and have so been approved before publication.

Disciplinary matters are dealt with in the following way. There is a statutory committee (created as a committee of the society) which has jurisdiction over registered pharmacists and over corporate bodies which are authorised to sell poisons. The committee has five members, who are appointed by the council of the society, and a chairman who must have had practical legal experience and who is appointed by the Privy Council. Subject to certain conditions the committee may direct the removal from the register of the name of a registered pharmacist who has been guilty of such misconduct as in the opinion of the statutory committee renders him unfit to have his name on the register (see s. 8 of the Act of 1954). Under s. 9 the assent of the chairman of the committee is a necessary requisite to the giving of any such direction. There are provisions (see s. 10) for appeal to the High Court.

The limitation plan which is embodied in the motion, which was approved (by a large majority) at the special general meeting held on July 25, 1965, owes its origin to the report of a committee (set up by the society in 1955) on the general practice of pharmacy. In connexion with the services undertaken by pharmacists when they sell what have been called non-traditional goods it

(7) I.e., the Pharmacy Acts of 1852 and 1868.

A was the view of that committee that it was doubtful whether such services or activities could be regarded “as consistent with the practice of pharmacy if carried on to a significant extent in an establishment which is not clearly departmentalised, that is to say, conducted with separate accommodation, stock and staff involving a pharmacist in personal supervision.”

B An exception was thought to be perhaps desirable in country districts.

“It may well be that in country districts it is in the public interest that goods which normally would not be regarded as suitable should be sold in pharmacies, but this need not affect the general rule.”

I need not set out the terms of the motion. It relates in the first place to new pharmacies. The requirement that they “should be situated only in premises which are physically distinct” is imprecise and vague; but whatever be the condition so to be imposed the essence of the requirement is that there must be confinement of sales within set limits unless there is the approval of the council. As to existing pharmacies there must be no extensions of the ranges of sales except as approved by the council. The acknowledged intention is to incorporate the terms of the motion in the statement on matters of professional conduct. The enquiry is at once raised as to what ethical concept there is which requires that a retail trader is to be forbidden for the future from varying the range of the articles that he sells. The further enquiry is prompted as to the source of any power in the society to lay down the rules which the motion embodies.

E The only object of the society set out in the charter of 1953 which seems relevant is contained in the words “To maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy”. All the time it is to be remembered that we are concerned with those who combine the professional activities of pharmacists with the commercial activities of retail traders and salesmen. It is a great many decades too late to suggest that the “honour” of pharmacists is tarnished if they concern themselves with activities other than pharmacy or other than those which are akin to or fairly closely akin to those of pharmacy. Where, then, is the power in a society which is concerned to safeguard and promote the interests of members “in the exercise of the profession of pharmacy” to prescribe and limit and control those affairs of members which do not relate to the profession of pharmacy but to those separate and additional activities which, as it has for a long time been accepted, can properly and respectably be undertaken?

I have no doubt that there could be some trading activities which it would be undesirable for pharmacists to undertake in conjunction with their professional activities as pharmacists. The motion now being considered has however no specific activities in contemplation. Being general in its application it needs a link, if it is to be justified, with the interests of pharmacists in their professional work. In connexion with and for the benefit of their professional work how can enforced restraint in their retail trading be incumbent? There were three suggestions. It was said that if there are trade activities they distract a pharmacist from his professional activities with the result that the latter are adversely affected. The appellants agree that this suggestion can no longer be sustained. I It was said that entry into the profession will be discouraged if trading activities are not curtailed. That suggestion is no longer pursued. The remaining suggestion was that the status of the profession will be diminished unless the proposed limitations are applied. Evidence was given by witnesses who felt that the status of pharmacy should be higher than it is, and who considered that the fact that there was extensive retail trading in extraneous goods diminished respect for the profession. While I can fully appreciate and respect the point of view of those who feel that retail trading has already reached, or perhaps passed, what they regard as the desirable limits and who fear that any extension of it might be at the expense of the image of the profession, I do not consider that the evidence established that professional standards have been eroded by reason of the fact that members of the society have both carried on trade and carried on their profession. Nothing adversely affecting "the exercise of the profession of pharmacy" was shown by the evidence to be taking place, which could entitle the society to interfere with the freedom of members in the exercise of trading activities which they have for so long been entitled to undertake. Selling by members of non-traditional goods has been permissible. I do not think that it is within the powers or purposes of the society to control such selling activities as do not interfere with the proper performance of professional pharmaceutical duties.

I have no doubt that it would be within the competence of the society, as a body concerned for the honour and well being of those engaged in the profession of pharmacy, to lay down rules concerning non-professional (as well as professional) activities if such activities were harming or thwarting a proper adherence to professional standards and behaviour; but that would have to be proved. In agreement with the Court of Appeal (8) I do not think that it was proved in this case. It will normally be for a profession itself to decide in regard to its standards and its codes of behaviour, and the mere fact that certain rules are laid down which are severely restrictive will not warrant attack on them if in the interests of members and in the public interest such rules are reasonable. It may be that some professions in laying down their codes of proper and desirable conduct find it necessary to enjoin all non-professional activities. This has never been the position in regard to pharmacy. Professional activities and non-professional ones have existed and have grown side by side. Curbing of the latter could only be insisted on if the former were being jeopardised. In the absence of persuasive evidence that such was the case I do not consider that it is within the objects and the purposes of the society to impose the bans and the restrictions which the motion contains.

Prominent among the submissions of the appellants was the submission that in bringing his action the respondent was not raising an issue which was justiciable. It was said that statements on matters of professional conduct were merely "guide lines". It was said that they were binding only in honour, but were not sustained by any sanction and could not be enforced by the council of the society. Furthermore, it was said that if, as the result of non-compliance with any precept contained in the statement, a member found himself before the standing committee that body was not obliged to enforce the statement and could conclude that conduct which was at variance with it was not misconduct. In addition it was said that a member could appeal to the High Court from a decision of the Statutory Committee and that as this procedure was available any present intervention of the court was not permissible. For all these reasons it was contended that neither the statement nor the motion was justiciable.

These contentions appear to me to ignore the realities of the situation. It is the definite purpose of the society to incorporate the motion in the statement on matters of professional conduct. It follows that, if the motion becomes operative, it will be the view of the council that a failure to comply with the terms of it will be misconduct. The society will take such steps as they can to make members conform. The inspectors will report cases of non-compliance. If persuasion fails the society will take steps to bring a member before the statutory committee and will endeavour to persuade that body that the member had been guilty of such misconduct as rendered him unfit to have his name on the register. It is true that the committee could take the view that a member was in no way obliged to conform to the limitations prescribed by the motion, but I see no reason why a member should wait for such a decision. If the society have no right to impose restrictions or to lay it down that in their view non-compliance with such

(8) [1967] 2 All E.R. 558; [1967] Ch. at p. 722.

- A restrictions will be misconduct, I think that the respondent is entitled to come to court now and to seek the declaration and the injunction which he obtained. Why should he wait? Why should he have a period of uncertainty? Why should he not know how he is to order his affairs? Why should he be obliged to suffer the embarrassment of being charged with professional misconduct? In my view, he need not tarry. He is entitled to come to the courts and to ask for a
- B decision that the rule (for such it amounts to) of which he complains was not one which it was within the powers of the society to impose.

- There is, in my view, a further reason (or perhaps one which is inherent in the first) why the society is not entitled to impose the restrictions which the motion contains, and that is that the motion would impose an unjustified restraint on the trade of all members. That compliance with the terms of the motion would
- C involve a restraint of trade is clear beyond argument. The question that arises is, therefore, whether the restraint which the society would wish and would intend to enforce is unreasonable and unjustified. The fact that the society is incorporated by charter does not entitle it to impose on its members a restraint of trade that is unreasonable and unjustified. So I think that the enquiry becomes one whether the restraint is of that nature. The appellants contended, however, before the
- D judge that this issue was not before the court at all, and that they were under no obligation to justify the restraint as being reasonable in the interests of their members. This contention was, I think, advanced because the appellants were saying that the motion was binding only in honour and was not enforceable by the society and would be subject to the independent scrutiny of the statutory committee under its independent chairman. In line with this was the further
- E contention that there was no justiciable issue before the court. The result was that the appellants resolutely declined to plead any justifications of the restraint. If, however, the whole of the evidence is considered, it does not seem to me that it established that the restraint was reasonable. I think that the society would and should have regard to the interests of the public as well as to the interests of members. One feature of the public interest is that trade should not be restricted
- F without good reason. The society ought not therefore to impose restrictions on its members unless such restrictions are either necessary or desirable for the purpose of maintaining the honour of members or for the purpose of promoting the interests of members when in serving the public they are carrying on the profession of pharmacy. The respondent had to prove his case, but once he had shown that the requirement being imposed on him (and all other members) was
- G one that would operate as a restraint of trade and once he had shown that there was an issue which was justiciable then, irrespective of questions as to where the onus of proof lay, the question which the court had to decide was whether the undoubted restraint of trade could reasonably be imposed by the society. The law has always favoured freedom of trade and has discountenanced restraints on trade. Thus in the notable case of Mitchel v. Reynolds (9) it was said (10) that
- H "In all restraints of trade, where nothing more appears the law presumes them bad". The same approach was adopted in Gunmakers, etc. (Master, etc.) v. Fell (11). In that case it was said that to the general rule there are some exceptions: as if a restraint is only particular in respect to the time or place and if there is good consideration given to the person restrained and (12) "So likewise if the restraint appear to be of a manifest benefit to the public". In more recent state-
- I ment of what is after all a rule of public policy it has been emphasised that to support restraints of trade and interference with individual liberty, there must be "sufficient justification". The restriction must be reasonable:

"... reasonable, that is, in reference to the interests of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public " A

(Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co., Ltd. (13)). On what basis, then, could it be said that the restraint was reasonable or desirable or necessary? The only basis (either in reference to the society and its members or in reference to the public benefit) that was advanced was founded on the three suggestions already noted. As they lacked adequate substance the result was that no sufficient justification existed for requiring or imposing the restraints. B

I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD HODSON: My Lords, the main questions for determination on this appeal are (i) whether a proposed rule is outside the scope of the society's objects as expressed in its charter of 1953, and (ii) does the proposed rule, coupled with the steps by which the society intend to carry it out, represent an unreasonable restraint of trade. C

The respondent is a registered pharmacist and one of the directors of Boots Pure Drug Co., Ltd. He has for many years been a member of the appellant society, the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, of which the second appellant is the president. Both appellants were unsuccessful in the Court of Appeal (14) and now appeal to your lordships against a declaration made by PENNYCUICK, J. (15) which came about in this way. The society which controls the professional activities of pharmacists is based on royal charter, the present charter bearing date Dec. 31, 1953. Its members are such persons as are for the time being registered pharmacists. The objects of the society, as set out in the charter, are as follows: D

"To advance chemistry and pharmacy. To promote pharmaceutical education and the application of pharmaceutical knowledge. To maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy. To provide relief for distressed persons, being (1) members "

etc. E

The council of the society consists of twenty-one elected members and three persons appointed by the Privy Council. The council directs and manages the affairs of the society generally with certain exceptions, and reports annually to the general meeting of the society. Special general meetings are held at such times as are necessary and desirable. The council's function is, in pursuance of the objects of the society, to prescribe and issue for the guidance of their members rules which form a code of ethics under the heading, "Statement upon matters of professional conduct". These are not bye-laws and have no compulsive force. F

On July 25, 1965, the society called a special general meeting at which, on the motion of the president, a motion was carried in the following terms: G

"New pharmacies should be situated only in premises which are physically distinct, and should be devoted solely to: (i) professional services, as defined in para. 19 of the report of the committee on the general practice of pharmacy, (ii) within the limits recommended in the report non-professional services as defined in para. 19 of the report, and (iii) such other services as may be approved by the council; and the range of services in existing pharmacies, or in pharmacy departments of larger establishments, should not be extended beyond the present limits except as approved by the council." H

In explanation of the motion it should be stated that professional services are defined as the dispensing of medicines and the sale of pharmaceutical goods, that non-professional services relate to the sale of what are called traditional goods, such as toilet articles and photographic equipment, and that the other I

A services relate to non-traditional goods such as may be approved by the council.

The code of ethics, on its face, does not purport to be enforceable. In the first paragraph it is emphasised that the statement is not primarily a basis for applying compulsion, but a means of assisting pharmacists to discharge the moral obligation resting on them to observe standards of conduct appropriate to their calling.

B complied with by ninety per cent. of the members and the society intends to take steps to carry out the motion as the learned judge found by correspondence, inspection, and, in the last resort, by the initiation and prosecution of proceedings before the statutory committee. This committee provides the only effective means of compulsion. It is appointed pursuant to s. 7 of the Pharmacy Act, 1954. It consists of six members of whom the chairman is appointed by the Privy Council and the remainder by the council, and has power (subject to appeal to the High Court) to remove the name of a registered pharmaceutical chemist from the register if he is found guilty of such misconduct as in the opinion of the statutory committee renders him unfit to have his name on the register.

C There is no question but that a breach of the code of ethics may be treated by the statutory committee as such misconduct, for the committee naturally pays regard to what the profession itself regards as misconduct in forming its own judgment. The effect of the rule as contained in the motion would be that, save with the approval of the council, new pharmacies would have to be situated in physically distinct premises and their trading activities confined to pharmaceutical and traditional goods and existing pharmacies would not, without the same approval, be able to extend the present range of non-traditional goods.

D The declaration of the learned judge was as follows:

"This Court Doth Declare that it is not within the powers purposes or objects of The Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain hereinafter called the society to enforce or carry out or attempt to enforce or carry out the provisions of the motion specified in the pleadings and set forth in the schedule hereto or any of the said provisions on the ground that the said provisions are in restraint of trade."

E The first point taken before your lordships was that there is here no justiciable matter at all. No sanction is contained in the statement on matters of professional conduct: this contains pious expressions of opinion only, and the fact that the council may refer to the statutory committee cases which they regard as objectionable founds no legal claim such as would be contained in any enforceable byelaw. It is pointed out that the word "should" not "must" is used in the motion. This is perhaps a distinction without a difference and in any event there is a real threat hanging over the heads of those affected by the proposed rule and such persons are entitled to know where they stand. Accordingly, the courts can grant a declaration as to the validity of the rule and an injunction if required.

F Since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Dyson v. A.-G. (16), it has always been accepted that there is jurisdiction to make a declaratory order whether any consequential relief is or could be claimed or not.

G I agree with all the judgments in this case that there is a justiciable issue to determine whether or not the rule contained in the proposed motion is within the scope of the charter, and that the respondent was faced with a real threat that, if the rule were allowed to stand, he might have to face charges of misconduct. That he is justified in coming to the courts now for a declaration I have no doubt. He has not to wait until proceedings are taken against him. A parallel situation arose in the Scottish appeal before your lordships' House in Rossi v. Edinburgh Corpn. (17), where the Scottish action of declarator was held to be appropriate.

Is the rule then within the powers of the society? The relevant object in the charter is: "To maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy". Although the doctrine of ultra vires does not apply strictly to societies incorporated by royal charter, as PETERSON, J., pointed out in the case of Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (18), so as to make it open to attack by third parties in general, a member of the society is entitled to take legal proceedings for the purpose of preventing the society or its governing body from doing acts outside of the purposes authorised by the charter which may lead to its destruction by the forfeiture of its charter. The judge in this case was of opinion, apart from restraint of trade, that the rule would not be outside the authorised purposes in view of the special nature of the occupation of a pharmacist, whose professional and trading activities are normally carried out in the same building so that the two are very much bound up together. Hence he felt that the rule might be regarded as calculated to maintain the members' honour and safeguard their interests in the exercise of their profession. SACHS, L.J., expressed (19) considerable doubts on this matter, which I share, particularly since, as a matter of history, after the decision in Jenkin's case (20) matters relating to the trading interests of owners of pharmacies have been dealt with by the National Pharmaceutical Union while the society has concentrated on the professional aspect. Like him, however, I find it unnecessary to decide this as a separate issue. If the rule is bad as being in unreasonable restraint of trade it will in any event be outside the limits imposed on the society by its charter.

(16) [1911] 1 K.B. 410.

There is no doubt that the motion itself, coupled with the steps which the society propose to take in order to carry out the motion, does amount to a proposed restraint on the trade of members by bringing pressure on them in the ways indicated, and in my opinion this is no less true because the rule is in itself incapable of direct enforcement. The action of the society still remains an interference with individual liberty of action in trading and restraint of trade. Unless it is reasonable in relation to the objects of the society the restraint cannot be justified. This is true of a modern profession as it was in the case of the old guilds, cf., Gunmakers, etc. (Master, etc.) v. Fell (21). As DEVLIN, J., pointed out in Hughes v. Architects' Registration Council of the United Kingdom (22):

"There is the right of every man to earn his living in whatever way he chooses unless by the law or his own voluntary submission his way is taken from him . . ."

The appellants, however, never raised the issue of reasonableness and contented themselves with saying that there was nothing for the courts to enquire into, or at any rate nothing on which to found a declaration or an injunction, because the motion was unenforceable and all disciplinary jurisdiction was vested in the statutory committee. Once this objection was out of the way that is, as the judge found (23), and I agree with him, an end of the case.

Reasonableness was, however, raised in the Court of Appeal (24) and extensive argument has been directed to that matter before your lordships. Like my noble and learned friend, LORD REID, I do not wish to pursue what I said on the general question of restraint of trade in Esso Petroleum Co., Ltd. v. Harper's Garage (Stourport), Ltd. (25). I see the force of the point that, when there is restraint of trade the burden of proof of reasonableness being, as between the parties, on the restraining party, this may cast an unfair burden of establishing reasonableness in many instances where the doctrine will not be applied. Nevertheless, the

- A authorities appear to be consistent in treating the words "restraint of trade" as general and wide in their import. I have in mind, as an example, the statement of LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON in A.-G. of Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co., Ltd. (26), to which I referred in the Esso case (27). The issue which in practice, once restraint is found to exist, is litigated between the parties is not "Is this the kind of case to which the doctrine applies?" but "Is the restraint reasonable?" I do not find it possible to segregate any particular class of case so as to exclude it from the ambit of the doctrine although there are, no doubt, many cases where it is futile to raise it. I have in mind the field of contractual and other manifold activities which, in the absence of special features, have been treated as immune.

In view of the state of the pleadings the evidence was never directed to reasonableness as a separate matter, but your lordships have been referred to various passages which have some bearing on this aspect. I agree that in the light of that evidence the restraint here cannot be justified as reasonable either in the public interest or in the private interest of the parties.

I would dismiss the appeal.

- D LORD UPJOHN: My Lords, the issues in this case arise by reason of the fact that, though pharmacy is a profession, those pharmacists who carry on the general practice of pharmacy by way of engaging in retail sale (and they form about seventy-five per cent. of the twenty-nine thousand members of the appellant society, the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain) must also engage in trade to earn a living. So a pharmacist's life consists of two parts: first, carrying on the profession of a pharmacist by dispensing and supplying medicines, surgical appliances and so on, and, secondly carrying on a retail trade in what are called traditional goods, perfumes, cosmetics and the like, cameras and photographic materials. In recent years, to meet increasing competition, the range of goods sold by pharmacists have extended to non-traditional goods such as "handbags, beachwear, souvenirs, pottery, jewellery, books and wines and spirits". The council of the society felt that these extended trading activities were intrinsically undesirable, so after prolonged examination of the situation by a committee set up in 1955 who made a report, the following resolution was passed at a special general meeting of the society on July 25, 1965, in these terms:

- G "New pharmacies should be situated only in premises which are physically distinct and should be devoted solely to: (i) professional services as defined in para. 19 of the report of the committee on the general practice of pharmacy; (ii) within the limits recommended in the report non-professional services as defined in para. 19 of the report and (iii) such other services as may be approved by the council and the range of services in existing pharmacies or in pharmacy departments of larger establishments should not be extended beyond the present limits except as approved by the council."

- H Paragraph 19 is set out fully in the judgment of PENNYCUICK, J. (28) and I need not repeat it, for it is clear that the object of this motion was to restrict the purely trading activities of pharmacists so far as was practical in order to enhance the standing of the pharmaceutical profession and to elevate the status of its members. It was intended that the motion should be incorporated into a code of ethics published from time to time by the society under the title "Statement upon matters of professional conduct" with a sub-title "Issued by the council of [the society] for the guidance of pharmacists and corporate bodies carrying on business under the Pharmacy Acts".

The respondent, who is a registered member of the society and the retail director of Boots Pure Drug Co., Ltd. ("Boots"), objects to this resolution and has taken action asking for a declaration that the motion is invalid and for an injunction to restrain the society from acting on it. Of course, and quite properly, A he has taken this action on behalf of Boots. He has succeeded before PENNYCUICK, J. (29), and the Court of Appeal (30). The issues before your lordships are threefold: 1. Are the issues between the parties justiciable at all? 2. If so, is the July motion open to attack by a member of the society as being beyond the expressly authorised powers of the society? 3. Does the doctrine of restraint of trade apply B to a professional body and, if so, is the motion in unreasonable restraint of trade and void?

On the first issue the society contend that (i) the code of ethics contains merely recommendations binding in honour only on members (ii) the society cannot enforce the code; that is a matter vested in an independent statutory committee set up by the Pharmacy Act, 1954, re-enacting an earlier Act of 1933 (31). C
 The main duties of this committee are to consider whether a pharmacist's name should be removed from the register because he has been found guilty of some relevant criminal offence or has been guilty of such misconduct as in the opinion of the committee renders him unfit to have his name on the register. The chairman is appointed by the Privy Council and must be one who has practical legal experience, and he has under the regulations (32) made by statutory instrument very considerable powers of his own motion to stop proceedings before the D committee at an early stage in certain cases and he must himself assent to every removal of a name from the register. The evidence showed that this statutory committee is in truth highly independent and that over the years a succession of eminent chairmen had not hesitated, much to the disappointment of the council, to exercise their powers to stop proceedings at an early stage. But all this means no more than that, like any police force, the council are not judges in their own E cause. The evidence also established that by every peaceful method available to the council they endeavour in practice to enforce their code of ethics on their members, and they have been very successful. Let me quote a question to and answer of Mr. Adams, the secretary of the society for the last nineteen years.

"Q.—May I turn with you to the statement on matters of professional F conduct generally. Once a matter has got into that statement, the council in fact do all they can to secure that it is complied with by members. Is that right? Never mind what it is; they must do everything that they can?.
 A.—Yes; that would be a correct statement. Q.—And they have a very large measure of success? A.—Indeed. Q.—Without resorting to the statutory committee? A.—Yes. Q.—Would it be right to say that, when a matter goes into the statement, ninety per cent. or more of pharmacists G comply? A.—I should think so; yes . . . Q.—So that it was one hundred per cent. success, except for Boots? A.—Yes."

To contend that a trader subject to such pressures to restrict his trading cannot resort to law in an endeavour to prove, if he can, that such pressures ought not lawfully to be brought to bear on him merely because they are said to be binding H in honour only is quite untenable. The truth is that the council is trying by every peaceful means in its power to enforce its views on its members and, if in fact some of its views are unlawful, they cannot escape from the consequences that flow from that by using such phrases as "binding in honour" or "guidance". They must be judged by their acts, not by their words.

Then, it was said that in any event the action was premature. The objecting I member must wait, apparently, until the council think fit to bring him before the statutory committee, it may be years later, for it was said there was no immediate threat to do so. As a matter of commonsense this is most unreasonable. Why should a trader be put into the position where he may expend large sums on

- A expanding his trading activities in defiance of the code of ethics and then be compelled to wait until at some indefinite time in the future the council choose to bring him before the statutory committee for his alleged misconduct, and only then, possibly, he finds all his hard work and expenditure rendered useless. The law is full of examples to show that a person whose freedom of activity is challenged can in a proper case have the issue determined, so that he knows where he stands.

Thus, a trader who is said to require some licence to trade may come to the court and ask for a declaration to the contrary and not wait until he is prosecuted. Rossi v. Edinburgh Corpn. (33). This principle is not confined to trade. A person whose freedom of action is challenged can always come to the court to have his rights and position clarified subject always, of course, to the right of the court in exercise of its judicial discretion to refuse relief in the circumstances of the case. In the judicial exercise of this discretion the court may declare the rights of the parties and by way of ancillary relief grant injunctions, and so on. See three recent cases which illustrate this elementary proposition. Boulting v. Association of Cinematograph, Television and Allied Technicians (34); Eastham v. Newcastle United Football Club, Ltd. (35) and Nagle v. Feilden (36).

- D In addition to this, it is quite clear that, as a member of the society, the respondent is entitled to come to the court now and complain that the society are proposing to go outside the expressed terms of the charter and ask for an injunction to restrain them from doing so. See Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (37). I shall return to this aspect of the matter when considering the second issue. The quia timet cases relied on by the society do not, with all respect to the argument, really touch on this point. In any event on the pleadings, it seems to me quite clear on the admissions contained in para. 8 of the defence that the society are now threatening and intending to carry out the July motion unless restrained by the court, and this alone justifies immediate action against them. So that the first issue, which was in fact one of the two principal planks in the arguments of the society, in my opinion fails.

- F The second issue depends not on any doctrine about restraint of trade nor is it a question of ultra vires, for the society, being the creation of a royal charter, are not bound by the doctrines of ultra vires in the same way as a corporation created by or pursuant to a statute. A chartered corporation is not, as a matter of vires, bound by its charter. At common law it has all the powers of an individual and can legally and lawfully extend its activities beyond the objects of its charter and indeed carry out activities prohibited by the charter. Nevertheless its members, and only its members, can complain for if the corporation goes outside its expressed objects or, worse still, performs acts prohibited by the terms of the charter, the Crown may by scire facias proceed to forfeit the charter. Any member can, therefore, apply to the court to prohibit the corporation from risking such forfeiture by continuing such activities.

- H My lords, all this is explained in the lucid judgment of PETERSON, J., in the Jenkin case (38) in which the society was a party. That correctly states the law. I cannot improve on the way in which PETERSON, J., expressed it. So the respondent is entitled to an injunction if he can show that the July motion goes outside the expressed objects of the charter. On the facts this point did not appeal to the learned trial judge (39) nor to LORD DENNING, M.R. (40), but SACHS, L.J., (40) felt serious doubts about it. I think that his doubts are fully justified.

Historically the matter stands thus. The original charter of 1843 was granted to the society A

“for the purpose of advancing chemistry and pharmacy and promoting a uniform system of education of those who should practise the same and also for the protection of those who carry on the business of chemists and druggists.”

Here was the minute embryo of the formation of a profession. As knowledge of drugs developed the calling of a pharmacist increased in stature especially having regard to the many statutory provisions which entrusted the sale or mixing of drugs to pharmacists, but the charter plainly also affected the calling of a pharmacist/druggist/chemist. When, however, the society tried to go so far as to regulate members' hours of business and the prices to be charged (among other matters) PETERSON, J. (in Jenkin's case) (41) held that, for the reasons which I have already mentioned, a member was entitled to object and claim that such activities went outside the expressed objects of the society. He held that they did, and granted declarations accordingly. Thereupon the society hived off their trading activities to the National Pharmaceutical Union. B

The professional side of the society, however, continued to grow and by 1933 received statutory recognition as a profession, for in the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, there was set up for the first time the statutory committee to regulate the conduct of members. In 1953 the society received a supplemental charter which, save for incorporation, entirely superseded the earlier charter and provided for far more limited objects contained in para. 4 of the charter. The only relevant object admittedly is: “To maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy.” So, prima facie, the society will exceed the purely professional objects of the charter if they try to regulate the trading side of the occupation of a pharmacist, but this consideration alone cannot determine the matter. In the interest of and for the advancement of the profession of pharmacy it may be legitimate to control, regulate and restrict the members' trading activities; but clearly the society must establish this. They tried to establish it on three grounds— C

1. It would be more difficult to attract new entrants to the profession if the trading activities are to be extended beyond traditional goods. D

2. Increased trading activities would distract the pharmacist from his professional work. E

Both points were abandoned during the hearing in this House. F

3. Increased trading would lower the status of the professional pharmacist. G

So little was the evidence on this point that PENNYCUTICK, J., in his extremely careful judgment (42), did not mention it. LORD DENNING, M.R., in his judgment (43) explained why, and I entirely agree. So the society entirely fail to justify the interference by the July motion with the purely trading activities of the members, to maintain the honour and safeguard and promote their interests in the exercise of the profession of pharmacy. On this ground alone the respondent, as a member of the society, is entitled to hold the declaration and injunction he has obtained. H

I can deal with the third issue, that of restraint of trade, fairly briefly. The basis of the argument of the society was that the well-known principles based on the dislike of the common law of restraints of trade and their consequent invalidity, unless in particular circumstances such restraint could be justified, had no application to professional activities. I think it right to state that counsel for the society before your lordships stated that PENNYCUTICK, J., was in error when he stated (44) in the course of his judgment that he did not understand counsel for I

A the society so to contend. I am entirely unable to accept the argument that professional bodies are outside the general doctrine of restraint of trade.

True, no case has so far applied the doctrine to professional bodies in the case of involuntary restraints. I will explain why in a moment; but an examination of the great case of Mitchel v. Reynolds (45) in 1711, where LORD MACCLESFIELD delivered the judgment of the court, shows that the dislike of the common law for all restraints was general and applied equally to restraints voluntary and involuntary, to grants and charters by the Crown, to bye-laws and of course to contractual restraints, unless in particular circumstances they could be justified. Those particular circumstances have been examined even in your lordships' House many times, but I need not detain your lordships today, for all of them, unlike this case, have been examples of restraints not affecting a profession save in cases of voluntary restraint.

The great principle laid down by LORD MACCLESFIELD (45) in a judgment too long and comprehensive to set out here, was conveniently analysed and summarised by WILLES, C.J., in the Gunmakers, etc. (Master, etc.) v. Fell (46). The relevant passages are set out in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, L.J. (47) in the court below and I shall not repeat them, for on the facts of this case the observations of WILLES, C.J. (46) require no analysis. These judgments establish that there is no exception in favour of a profession from the general rule that the doctrine of restraint of trade applies quite generally.

The reason why this doctrine as affecting involuntary restraints has not been applied to a profession in any reported case is, to my mind, clear. It is not because it is exempt from this doctrine at all. It is because in applying the doctrine to a profession there is this additional relevant circumstance to be considered. A profession is a vocation of the highest standing; it calls on its members to serve (no doubt for reward) the public by offering to them highly technical and always confidential advice and services, which require a different standard of conduct from the tradesman. Its members stand in a different relationship altogether from the man doing ordinary business. So much so that in many cases they are presumed to exert an undue influence on the client. No close definition can be given for bodies are always, rightly, breaking into the professional area and the pharmaceutical profession forms a very welcome example of it.

The professional code, however, must be different by the nature of its calling and the reliance placed on it by the public from those carrying on trade and commerce. Those seeking the advice of a professional man are entitled to expect of him the highest standards of ethical conduct. This means that the professional man must submit to some restraints of trade such, to take elementary examples, as a prohibition against advertising and a refusal, by undercutting or otherwise, to snatch work from another practitioner (but of course there is no harm in letting the work come to you). Such restraints (of which I have only given two elementary examples) are necessary to establish, sustain and promote the profession and particularly its ethical standards. The restraints on professional men are justifiable in law for they are necessary not only in the interests of the profession but also in the interests of the public, who trust to the peculiarly high standing and integrity of a profession to serve it well. What happened at the trial, however, was that counsel for the society stood on the submission that the doctrine of restraint of trade did not arise, and he refused categorically, as I PENNYCUICK, J., pointed out in his judgment (48), to plead that the restraint imposed by the July motion was reasonable, in the interests of the profession and of the public.

In the Court of Appeal (49) this was treated as a pleading point. I do not agree with this. If counsel for the society refuse to apply for leave to amend (which obviously would have been granted to them) for their own good reasons (to quote the learned judge again (50)) and elect to treat the issue as not before the court their clients must stand by that decision which was plainly a decision of substance and on principle after careful consideration, quite unconnected with questions of costs. It was not in my opinion a pleading point at all. I think that PENNYCUICK, J., having held (50), as I think, quite correctly, that the July motion was in restraint of trade and as the society refused to set up any test of reasonableness, that concluded the action. The Court of Appeal (51), however, having treated the matter as a pleading point, went into the question of reasonableness in the interests of the profession. They came to the conclusion that the July motion was not reasonable, and I agree with them, for the only facts they had to consider were identical with those which I have already considered on the second issue in this opinion, so I need say no more about that.

For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD WILBERFORCE: My Lords, the rules of conduct which are embodied in the motion passed at the Royal Albert Hall on July 25, 1965, affect and limit both the type of goods which may be sold in new pharmacies and also that which may continue to be sold in existing pharmacies. No existing or intending pharmacists, or "company chemist" can organise his business unless he knows whether and how far he or it is bound by these limitations. To suggest, as the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain do, that his proper course is to defy the motion, defend himself before the disciplinary committee, of the society and possibly then appeal to the High Court, is, in my opinion, an untenable argument. He has the right, immediately, to challenge the validity of the rule in the courts and to seek such a declaration as will make his position clear. That is what the respondent has done and I agree with both courts below (52) that his action was correct. Equally unmaintainable, in my judgment, is the argument that no invalidating declaration can be made because the rule is merely hortatory and has no binding effect. It is true that the obligation is shrouded in the word "should" rather than "may" but, as so often happens in the field of restrictive action, this masks the reality. That is that the new rule, if allowed to be valid, will be included in the code of ethics of the society, and that breaches of it may be (and by admission in the pleadings are intended to be) the subject of enforcement proceedings taken by the council. The disciplinary body of the society is a committee constituted by statute (Pharmacy Act, 1954) with a legal chairman: there is an appeal to the High Court. The committee forms its own opinion as to what amounts to professional misconduct, but it would be influenced by the opinion of the council, and even more, by the terms of a resolution passed by the members in general meeting. If it finds a charge proved it has power to strike the offending pharmacist off the register. The existence of this enforcement machinery, and the threat to use it in order to implement the motion, provide ample justification for anticipatory proceedings such as are now brought, and I cannot find any relevance in the independence of the statutory committee, or in the right of appeal from its findings. A pharmacist has a clear legal right not to be put in jeopardy of his livelihood under an invalid rule. Laying aside these procedural objections, the real question is whether the motion is invalid. It may be so on either or both of two grounds, because it is not authorised by the society's constitution, or because it is an unreasonable restraint of trade. The latter ground may itself be a sub-head of "ultra vires", but I propose to consider the two grounds separately.

The society's original charter was granted on Feb. 18, 1843. It was expressed to be for the protection of those who carry on the business of chemists and

A druggists, but references to education and qualifications show that even at this date the occupation, as well as being in the nature of a trade, had professional characteristics. This original charter was confirmed by Act of Parliament (Pharmacy Act, 1852, s. 1). In 1920 an action was brought in the High Court in order to test the extent of the society's powers, particularly in relation to the trading activities of its members, and resulted in the decision, and declaration, that the society had no power to regulate hours of business, or wages and conditions of employment, or prices, or even to insure members of the society (Jenkin v. Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (53)). This led to the formation of the National Pharmaceutical Union to deal with members' trading interests: among its objects are "the imposition of restrictive conditions on the conduct of the business of a chemist and druggist".

C The supplemental charter under which the society now operates was granted on Dec. 31, 1953, the original charter being revoked except in so far as it incorporates the society. The objects are defined in cl. 4 as follows:

D "To advance chemistry and pharmacy: To promote pharmaceutical education and the application of pharmaceutical knowledge: To maintain the honour and safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the profession of pharmacy; To provide relief for distressed members, etc."

It will be seen that under this charter the society are recognised as a body of professional men, no reference appearing to the trading activities. Further the Act of 1852 which supported the original charter has been repealed and not replaced by any similar legislation supporting the present charter.

E The question, then, is whether it is within the powers of the society, as stated in cl. 4, to impose such restrictions on the trading activities of members as are contained in the motion. The words which must justify this, if any can do so, are to "safeguard and promote the interests of the members in their exercise of the professions of pharmacy".

F I have no doubt that this charter, as other similar grants or corporate status and privileges to members of a profession, ought to be construed so as to give to the members a wide degree of autonomy. Particularly is this so in relation to standards of professional conduct. When, as to this matter, rules are laid down, and submitted by proper procedure, to democratic approval, and approved by a majority, the court will normally allow them to take effect. It will not permit the minority to renew a contest which it has lost in the domestic forum; but, as in the case of other law-making bodies, there are legal boundaries which must not be passed and the court has power to see that any exercise of the law-making, or rule-making, power falls fairly within the area of permitted activity. If its relevance to the permitted objects is minimal and if it seems to be directed, in the main, at other objects, or other targets, it should be disallowed as outside the power: and, in considering whether it is directed at the permitted object, rather than outside it, it is permissible to examine its working and impact. A conclusion that, without reason, it strikes one part of the target, and that a small one, but arbitrarily misses another, may support an argument that it is not really or essentially aimed where, according to the constitution, it should be aimed, but elsewhere.

I In relation to the subject-matter of the motion, it is necessary to give full recognition to two considerations. First, as LORD DENNING, M.R., pointed out (54), some regulation of trading activities may be relevant to the members' professional interests: an obvious example would be regulations as to hygiene. So the mere fact that trading interests are affected is not enough to establish invalidity. Secondly, since at the relevant date in 1965, the pattern of pharmacists' trading was itself irregular, some degree of irregularity must be permissible in any attempt to control them. With all allowance for these matters, however, I have come to the conclusion that the regulations contained in the motion have too slender a connexion or link with the relevant object (i.e. the members' professional interests) to be a justified exercise of the society's rule-making powers. A

The regulations, in the first place, fall clearly within the field hived off after 1921 to the National Pharmaceutical Union: they are directly within the words I have quoted "the imposition of restrictive conditions on the conduct of the business of a chemist or druggist". As SACHS, L.J., put it (55), they seek "to put the defendant society in the position to exercise those powers... over trading interests which it deliberately abjured after the Jenkin Case decision..." (56). The licensing power given to the council is in its nature so fully within the field of trade regulation as to make any relevance to professional activity, at best, remote. In more detail, the society's evidence at the trial signally failed to establish any significant connexion with members' professional interests. It was suggested at one time that the regulations were necessary to prevent pharmacists from being distracted from their proper duties, or were necessary if the right sort of entrants to the profession were to be encouraged; but the evidence did not make good either of these and they were not pursued in this House. The only link that was left was that they were necessary to maintain or enhance the status of pharmacists as professional men. I agree with the Court of Appeal (57) that this was altogether too tenuous. It is true that a number of witnesses referred to the question of status, and one may be prepared to respect their opinion that status—professional status—is important enough, that it is important to them. None of the witnesses, however, was able successfully to relate the particular regulation to this objective. It is here that the haphazard and arbitrary character of the rule becomes important: it has these qualities, in my opinion, to a degree which far exceeds what is imposed by the irregularity of the subject-matter, thus demonstrating its relevance to the regulation of the members' trade, its irrelevance to the promotion of professional interests. I would therefore reject the motion on the simple ground that it is ultra vires. B C D E F

The second ground of invalidity is, in my opinion, as it was in that of all the learned judges below, even clearer. In the first place, the motion is plainly, on its face, in restraint of trade—no other description is possible. It must be remembered, in case conclusions are sought to be drawn from this case which may affect other professions, that this is a trading profession. Both historically and economically this has been and is of its nature. The restrictions are aimed at and affect its trading side; the restraint is of a trade actually and legitimately carried on. It is of no materiality that members are not contractually bound to observe the rules. To make a distinction between a case such as the present and a case such as McEllistrim v. Ballymacelligott Co-operative Agricultural and Dairy Society, Ltd. (58) (where the rule had this effect) would be something of a mockery. The "doctrine" of restraint of trade has never been limited to contractual arrangements: LORD MACNAGHTEN expressed it in the words (59) "all interference with individual liberty of action in trading, and all restraints of trade... are contrary to public policy", putting in modern terms what had been said by LORD MACCLESFIELD in Mitchel v. Reynolds (60) where he applied the "doctrine" to grants or charters from the Crown, customs and bye-laws. I

- A practical working of the restraint, irrespective of its legal form (see Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Harper's Garage (Stourport), Ltd. (61) and cf. WHITE, C.J., in U.S. v. Standard Oil Co. (62). There is, moreover, ample authority that the "doctrine" applies outside the contractual field, viz. to charters (City of London Case (63), ordinances of the nature of bye-laws (Ipswich Tailors' Case (64), made under a charter (Gummakers etc. (Master, etc.) v. Fell (65), rules of friendly societies (Swaine v. Wilson (66)). It is not at this point of the argument that any difficulty arises. Where there is difficulty is at the next stage, when it has to be decided whether the restraint can be upheld, and this is because of the manner in which this issue has been presented to the court. The appellants did not, as they might have done, and as those who impose restraints normally do, seek to justify the restraints as reasonable: their defence contained no plea to this effect, and at the trial, when the judge indicated that he would allow any necessary amendment and indeed invited the appellants to make it, they resolutely declined to do so. In these circumstances it would be no mere technicality to say that no case having been made for upholding the restraints, their invalidity inevitably follows. PENNYCUICK, J., dealt with the action on this basis (67) and, in my opinion, he was perfectly correct in so doing.
- D If one is to go further and as the Court of Appeal (68) did, to give the appellants the benefit of a position which they did not take up, one is faced at once with the difficulty that no issue has been stated in relation to which to judge the evidence. It would be for the appellants to define the manner in which the restraints are reasonable; to show, for example, that they are reasonable in the interests of the society, or of their members, or of both, and to particularise the interests. This they have not done, and I do not think that it is for the court to set up the necessary legal structure which the appellants have declined to set up. The most that can be done, and I do not find it entirely satisfactory, is to take, as the Court of Appeal did (68), the factual contentions apparently put forward and to examine their validity. This can be shortly done, for there emerge, in the field of what may broadly be called the interests of the society or their members, the three points which have already been discussed in relation to the question of ultra vires—the arguments as to distraction, entry into the profession and status and, for substantially the same reasons which it would be superfluous to restate, these arguments fail in the present context. If, moreover, one proceeds as did SACHS, L.J., (69) to weigh the considerations of public interest—the second limb of LORD MACNAGHTEN'S formula (70)—I think that equally the restraints
- G do not survive the test. I would so hold on the simple ground, which I think is the relevant ground in this connexion, that there is nothing here to displace the normal proposition that the public has in the absence of countervailing considerations an interest in men being able to trade freely in the goods which they judge the public wants and that these restraints clearly, severely and arbitrarily restrict this freedom. More special arguments to the effect that the
- H restraints might cause a reduction in the number of pharmacies I would regard as less secure. Before I could accept them I should require persuasion first that this type of consideration may properly be taken into account in relation to the common law doctrine of restraint of trade (as contrasted with proceedings in the Restrictive Practices Court) and, secondly, that a reduction in the number of pharmacies, if it were to result, is contrary to the public interest. To demonstrate this would require a far more extensive enquiry than has been attempted here and it is certainly not something which can be assumed.

I do not elaborate further on the arguments raised in this appeal because I so entirely agree with the manner in which the Court of Appeal (71) dealt with this case.

I would dismiss the appeal.

BROWN AND ANOTHER v. THOMPSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Willmer, Winn and Edmund Davies, L.JJ.), December 7, 8, 1967.]

Damages—Assessment—Appeal—Principle on which appellate court will intervene—No intervention unless assessment based on error in principle or assessment so clearly erroneous that it should be altered.

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Appeal—Apportionment of liability—Principle on which appellate court will intervene—Apportionment by trial judge not interfered with save for error in principle or where clearly erroneous—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (8 & 9 Geo. 6 c. 28), s. 1 (1).

In apportioning liability under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1) the emphasis is on fault and not solely on the causative potency of the acts of either party; where a trial judge has apportioned liability accordingly, his apportionment should not be interfered with on appeal, save in exceptional cases (as where there is some error in principle) or the apportionment is clearly erroneous), and an appellate court will not consider itself free to substitute its own apportionment for that made by the trial judge (see p. 709, letter G, p. 710, letter C, p. 712, letter D, and p. 713, letters D and H, post).

A like principle governs the intervention of an appellate court on appeal on quantum of damages (see p. 712, letter E, and p. 713, letter F, post).

Appeal.

- C Mr. and Mrs. William Brown, the plaintiffs, were injured when the car in which they were travelling struck a stationary lorry which was wholly unlighted at the rear and which had no reflectors. The accident occurred at 2.45 or 3.00 a.m. on Feb. 18, 1963, on a stretch of road which ran along the fringes of Epping Forest. At the time there was a thin coating of snow on the road, but snow was not falling heavily. Mr. Brown was driving the car with dipped headlights.
- D The last street lamp was some 280 feet before the place of the accident. Mr. Brown had seen something looming up in front of him just before the accident occurred, and his car had begun to turn out from the nearside kerb before it struck the back of the lorry. The plaintiffs brought an action for damages against the owner of the lorry, and the trial judge (WALLER, J.) on Apr. 20, 1967, awarded to Mrs. Brown, who was injured, £2,500 general damages. The trial judge apportioned twenty per cent. of the responsibility for the accident to Mr. Brown. The defendant appealed against the apportionment of damages awarded to Mrs. Brown, contending that fifty per cent. of the responsibility for the accident should have been apportioned to Mr. Brown. The trial judge's findings of fact were not disputed by the defendant.
- F J. M. Wright for the defendant.
John Davies, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

- WINN, L.J., who delivered the first judgment at the invitation of WILLMER, L.J., stated the facts and reviewed the evidence and the findings of the trial judge, and continued: When it is necessary for a court to ascribe liability in proportions to more than one person, it is well established that regard must be
- G had not only to the causative potency of the acts or omissions of each of the parties, but to their relative blameworthiness. In The Miraflores and The Abadesa (1), LORD PEARCE said:

- H "... the investigation is concerned with 'fault' which includes blameworthiness as well as causation; and no true apportionment can be reached unless both those factors are borne in mind."

- I He then gave a very interesting and helpful illustration from the Factories Act type of claim. I do not propose to read it again; I read it during the course of the argument in this appeal. I say no more than that it is worthy of close study by all practitioners concerned in matters of this kind. It is worthy of note, I think, that that being a case where three ships had been involved in a collision, LORD PEARCE said that what was essential was to compare the fault of each with the fault of the other two; the emphasis is on fault, not solely on causation of damage.

There is no doubt whatever that the act of driving into the back of a stationary vehicle, the act of driving in such a manner that for one reason or another the driver in this case failed to turn out (since there was no real need for him to stop in order to avoid this lorry) was in a high degree potentially causative of the collision and of the injuries suffered by Mr. Brown and his wife. Equally, of course, it was potently causative of the collision that the lorry should have been left there in the position I have described with no lights on it. This goes very much further than saying that if either of the vehicles had not been there, there would have been no collision. Each of them potently contributed to the causation of this accident; but when one looks at the question of blameworthiness, then for the reasons which I have only sketched, it seems to me quite plain that the fault of the appellant, Mr. Thompson, was very much greater than the fault of Mr. Brown, and that Mr. Brown's fault, having regard to the element of blameworthiness, was relatively really quite small.

It is said by counsel for the appellant that, whereas it may be difficult and not in accordance with the practice of this court to change a complete acquittal by a judge of one party of any negligence at all into a finding against that party of some degree, however minor, of negligence, on the other hand, where there has been as here, a condemnation, albeit a mild condemnation, of the appellant, Mr. Thompson, as being partly responsible for this collision, counsel submits that the court is entirely unfettered and should feel itself free to substitute its own opinion for that of the trial judge on the question of the attribution of blame. If there is any widespread belief to that effect at the Bar, it should be entirely discarded. It can lead only to much wasteful use of an appellate court's time. It is quite contrary to the well established practice of this court. Perhaps at the risk of being tedious in giving this reminder, the locus classicus of course, is British Fame (Owners) v. MacGregor (Owners) (2). It was an Admiralty decision, which went to the House of Lords, and the speech to which I desire to direct attention, so that it may be borne in mind, is that of LORD WRIGHT. He refers to S.S. Ceramic (Owners) v. S.S. Testbank (Owners) (3) on which it is not necessary for me to dwell, and proceeds to say this (4):

"With the greatest respect to the Court of Appeal, and without in any way expressing any conclusion on the actual decision at which they there arrived, I venture to think that their statement of principle is not quite in accord with the authorities, so far as laid down up to the present. The Umtali (5), which was a decision of this House, was not cited to the Court of Appeal, but there was cited The Karamea (6), in which LORD STERNDALE, M.R., a great authority on these matters, dealing with this question of apportionment, says (7): "...I think it would need a very strong case indeed to induce the court to interfere with [the judge's] discretion as to the proportions of blame. We have power to do it, but I do not suppose that we should ever think of doing it". WARRINGTON, L.J., is reported as saying (8): 'It may well be and probably is the case that if the court arrives at the same conclusion both on the facts and in law it would not interfere merely because the learned judge in his discretion has given proportions which this court thinks it would not have given'. SCRUTTON, L.J., says (9): '...if the Court of Appeal agrees with the findings of fact and law of the learned judge below, and the only difference is that it attaches more importance to a particular fact than he did, it would require an extremely strong case to alter the proportions of blame which the learned judge below has attributed to the ships...'. "

"It seems to me that these observations of three very eminent judges are quite in accord with what was said in The Umtali (5) and with what VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., has just said. I do not say, any more than they did,

A that under proper conditions, such as those indicated by the three members of the Court of Appeal in The Karama (10), the judge's apportionment might not be interfered with by an appellate court; but I do repeat that it would require a very strong case to justify any such review of or interference with this matter of apportionment where the same view is taken of the law and facts. It is a question of the degree of fault, depending on a
 B trained and expert judgment considering all the circumstances, and is different in essence from a mere finding of fact in the ordinary sense. It is a question not of principle or of positive findings of fact or law, but of proportion, of balance and relative emphasis, and of weighing different considerations; it involves an individual choice or discretion, as to which there may well be differences of opinion by different minds."

C I do not think that I need read further from that speech of LORD WRIGHT'S.

The question was considered by the Court of Appeal in the same year in Ingram v. United Automobile Service, Ltd. (11). This was a case, not of distribution of liability between the plaintiff and defendants, since, of course, the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, was not yet in force, but of distribution between two tortfeasors. MACKINNON, L.J., there expressly D said (12):

"For my part, I cannot see why there should be any difference between the case of the apportionment of liability as between the owners of two ships in a collision at sea and that between two tortfeasors in a road collision. In the present case I am of opinion that the conclusion that both defendants were liable should stand, and, therefore, applying the rule laid down by E [VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C.], I hold that we ought not to interfere with the apportionment of blame made by the judge."

DU PARCQ, L.J., referred to The MacGregor (13) and said (14):

"It would seem to follow . . . that this court should not interfere with the apportionment of liability made by the judge at the trial unless there is some error of law or of fact in his judgment. I come to that conclusion particularly in view of the observations of LORD WRIGHT in that case. In the present case the matter is perhaps one of academic interest because I should not have been prepared to differ from the judge in the apportionment that he has made, although, if I had tried the case, I should not necessarily have apportioned the damages in exactly the same way. This court has never taken the G view that it should alter an apportionment unless there was something seriously wrong with it."

The matter has received further consideration. One would have thought that such authoritative consideration as it has received would have given the quietus once and for all to the type of argument that this court had heard on behalf of the appellant in the present case. In Quintas v. National Smelting Co., Ltd. (15), H SELLERS, L.J., said that he agreed with the judgment then about to be delivered by WILLMER, L.J., "... that an appellate court will not lightly interfere with an apportionment made by the trial judge..." In that case WILLMER, L.J., gave a judgment in which he fully and very carefully considered the whole problem, and in the course of it he said (16):

"The problem of apportioning blame where there has been fault on both sides is one that has been familiar in the Admiralty jurisdiction for fifty years. It has long been held to be a matter primarily for the discretion of the trial judge, who finds the facts and who has the advantage of seeing the participants at first hand and assessing the degrees of their responsibility. It is well settled that, in the absence of any error of principle, an appellate tribunal will interfere with the trial judge's apportionment only in exceptional cases, and then as a rule only where it can be seen that the trial judge has failed to give effect to some material fact or has failed to take into account some material consideration."

WILLMER, L.J., referred to The MacGregor (17); he referred to another Admiralty decision, Rees v. The Admiralty (18) and then expressed the conclusion relevant for the purpose of that particular appeal.

Directing myself by those very authoritative pronouncements, and having taken note of other cases which are usefully noted in BINGHAM'S DIGEST OF MOTOR CLAIMS CASES (5th Edn.), which entirely bears out the principle in various different sets of circumstances, I feel quite satisfied that I do not find any cause in the instant case for altering the apportionments made by the trial judge. I deliberately do not say that, had I been trying this case myself, my apportionment would have been twenty per cent. I am not concerned with that. I find no reason which moves my mind at all to consider that the trial judge's apportionment was wholly erroneous. Even if I had thought there was reasons to disagree with his apportionment, I would have thought it impossible, for the reasons indicated in the judgments to which I have referred, to interfere with the judge's apportionment. That deals with the issue of liability.

So far as damages are concerned, it is a somewhat comparable matter whether this court thinks that the judge's award of damages was wholly erroneous. He awarded the sum of £2,500 general damages. I do not accept counsel for the appellant's submission that that award was wholly excessive. Clearly in different cases of this general type different judges would arrive at various figures. I have always myself found that the text which I prefer to follow in order to direct my own mind is to set down item by item what seem to me to be the heads of damage to which a judge, fixing the amount to be awarded, should properly have regard, and having set out those under headings then to jot down a figure against each of them, without noticing how the total builds up as the column gets longer. Only then, when satisfied that one has given what one thought was the right figure for each item, would one look at the total at all. It is interesting to observe that, so approaching this matter, the figure that I reached is £50 more than the amount that the judge awarded. Quite obviously to my mind, therefore, it cannot be said that his award was wholly excessive.

On both points, therefore, distribution of blameworthiness and damages, in my judgment this appeal should be dismissed.

EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: I agree, and I had it in mind to add nothing to what WINN, L.J., has said; but his reference to Quintas v. National Smelting Co., Ltd. (19) prompts me to add on the matter of apportionment some very short observations. For my part I am content simply to say that I am not satisfied that the trial judge arrived at a wrong apportionment, having regard to the two elements of causative potency and blameworthiness which I believe were first adverted to as the relevant factors by DENNING, L.J., in Davies v. Swan Motor Co. (Swansca), Ltd. (20). I base my refusal to disturb the apportionment solely on the fact that I do not think it right to interfere with what the judge held in relation to either or both of those factors. As to Quintas v. National Smelting Co., Ltd. (19), SELLERS, L.J., however, in accepting the enunciation of (20) [1949] 1 All E.R. 620 at p. 632; [1949] 2 K.B. 291 at p. 326.

A principle which WILLMER, L.J., pronounced (in, be it noted, his dissenting judgment), had this to say (21):

B "...the question arises whether it is just and equitable to deprive the plaintiff of so much. The difference between one-quarter and one-half to blame is over £2,000, and I do not think we are obliged to hold that a plaintiff to whom such a sum would be very substantial should be deprived of an effective appeal on apportionment if this court thought the apportionment to be wrong. In Stapley v. Gypsum Mines, Ltd. (22) the House of Lords altered the apportionment and since then this court has from time to time also done so on similar grounds to those on which it would alter an assessment of damages."

C Whether it is material to consider the amount of damages involved in arriving at a conclusion whether this court should interfere with the apportionment decided on by the lower court is a question which I would desire to reserve for further consideration if or when such a submission is made. It has rightly not been made in this case. I entirely agree with WINN, L.J., that it is quite impossible to say that it has been demonstrated by the appellant (as it must be before he can succeed) that the existing apportionment is so clearly wrong that this court should alter it.

E As to the assessment of Mrs. Brown's damages, just as in the case of apportionment, counsel for the appellant did not submit that the judge had misdirected himself in any way. Just as in the former case he said that the judge's findings of fact should have led him to hold that Mr. Brown was at least fifty per cent. to blame, so in relation to the assessment of damages counsel for the appellant has submitted that, despite the absence of any misdirection by the judge, his assessment of Mrs. Brown's general damages was so clearly erroneous that it cannot be allowed to stand. Not £2,500, he said, should be awarded to Mrs. Brown, but a sum on the region of £1,500. I do not desire to add a single word to those expressions of view which have already come from WINN, L.J., in relation to such damages. It might be that I would have awarded a little less, but even if that had been my tendency, the margin between the sum in fact awarded and that which I might have awarded had I been the trial judge is so narrow that it would be quite wrong to say that any interference by this court is called for.

G Accordingly, in respect of both the grounds advanced by the appellant here, it seems to me that he must fail, and I therefore concur in holding that this appeal must be dismissed.

H WILLMER, L.J.: I also agree that this appeal must be dismissed, and the only thing that I desire to add for myself is an expression of my concurrence with the observations which have fallen from WINN, L.J., with regard to the reluctance of this court to interfere on a mere matter of apportionment where no error of principle is alleged and no misapprehension of the facts on the part of the trial judge is suggested.

WISDOM v. CHAMBERLAIN (Inspector of Taxes).

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Goff, J.), March 8, 11, 1968.]

Income Tax—Casual profit on hedge against devaluation—Purchase of silver bullion—Profit on re-sale—Finding that other considerations influenced purchase unsupported by evidence—Whether adventure in the nature of trade—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2 c. 10), Sch. D, Case I.

Being concerned in 1961 with the possibility of a devaluation of the pound and the effect which that might have on the taxpayer's assets of between £150,000 and £200,000, the taxpayer's adviser decided to take steps to find a hedge against devaluation, i.e., an investment which on devaluation would retain its value in the United States and could easily be sold. He decided on an investment in silver bullion, the price of which had not varied by more than three per cent. in the previous five years and was unlikely to suffer a sudden fall or rise. Owing to temporary market disruptions, he was unable to purchase more than £100,000 worth of silver at that time, but in March, 1962, he made a fresh arrangement with the bullion brokers under which the £100,000 worth of silver bullion was sold at a loss of over £3,000 (taking into account the high interest charge on the loan by which the purchase was financed), and £200,000 of fresh bullion was bought on special terms. In the autumn of 1962 the pound recovered, the price of silver jumped, and the taxpayer was able to sell the £200,000 of silver bullion at a profit of over £48,000 excluding liability for interest charges on the loan financing the project. The taxpayer was assessed to tax on the profit realised, and on appeal the commissioners found as follows: (i) the taxpayer's original intention was to purchase the silver as a hedge against devaluation, but (ii) at the time of the second transaction other considerations influenced the purchase, the fear of devaluation having subsided; (iii) the commodity was useless, left unallotted in the hands of the brokers, was not an income producing investment or a long-term investment, was financed by loans at a high rate of interest, and no organisation was needed to deal in it as that was provided by the brokers; and (iv) whether there was a single transaction or two, by the nature of the subject matter there was an adventure in the nature of trade, and, therefore, the profit was assessable under Case I of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1952. On appeal,

Held: the taxpayer's profit on the transaction was not assessable to income tax because—

(i) on the facts there was no evidence to support the commissioners' findings that the fear of devaluation had subsided at the time of the second transaction (which must mean fear in the mind of the taxpayer's adviser, not of others) and that other considerations influenced that purchase (see p. 718, letters C and E, post); and

(ii) in view of that, and having regard to the findings that the taxpayer's adviser satisfied himself that the price of silver had not moved materially for over five years, with no substantial likelihood of a sudden fall or rise, and as to the taxpayer's original intention, it followed as a matter of law that the transaction was not an adventure in the nature of trade, but was a security to protect the taxpayer against devaluation on which the actual profit was fortuitous (see p. 720, letters G to I, post).

Appeal allowed.

C Case Stated.

The taxpayer appealed to the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax for St. Martins-in-the-Fields, Westminster, against an assessment made on him under Case 1 of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1952 for 1962-63 in the sum of £49,000 in respect of "profits of trade, etc., of sales and dealer in silver". The question for determination was whether the taxpayer had carried on a trade or an adventure in the nature of trade. The material parts of the

D Case Stated are set out in the judgment (cf., p. 716, letter C, to p. 717, letter D, post). The taxpayer contended* before the commissioners as follows: (a) that the profit which was assessed to income tax was the result of an isolated casual transaction; (b) that the profit was not a trading profit but an accretion to capital; (c) that all the circumstances, including the nature and substance of the transaction, had to be considered: (d) that the statement by Mr. R. L. Major dated Sept. 30,

E 1964, showed the financial position of the United Kingdom from March, 1961, onwards, and the possibility of devaluation; (e) that the nature of the commodity which was the subject of the taxpayer's transaction, i.e., silver, did not lend itself to commercial speculation by a private individual; (f) that the price of bar silver had not varied except by very small amounts over the last six years, and although the inspector of taxes had produced extracts from The Times dated Oct. 31, 1961,

F forecasting a rise in the price of silver over the next twelve months (which extracts Mr. Halpern had not read) the price of silver in fact hardly moved between Oct. 31, 1961, and Nov. 29, 1961; (g) that silver was not a commodity which the taxpayer would have bought had he intended to make a quick profit; (h) that the object of the transaction was to obtain protection against devaluation, and was not to make a profit but to minimise possible loss; (i) that the possible fall in the price of silver was provided for, and the profit was not certain; (j) that

G Mocatta and Goldsmid, Ltd., the brokers with whom the taxpayer dealt, protected themselves against a fall of more than 4d. so that even they did not think that it was obviously bound to be profitable, and (k) that the two transactions involved were really only one transaction implementing the original intention to acquire £200,000 worth of silver as a hedge against devaluation.

H The Crown contended before the commissioners as follows:—(i) that the taxpayer had carried on a trade or an adventure in the nature of a trade and made profits therefrom which were assessable under Case I of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1952; and (ii) that the amount of the assessment should be determined accordingly. The inspector of taxes made the following submissions before the commissioners in support of these last contentions:—(a) that the

I interval between the purchase and the sale was short; (b) that the asset was not acquired for cash, but was financed by loans; (c) that the nature of the asset was something which could not be used, it gave no pride of possession such as a work of art, and did not create an income but was purchased with the intention of re-selling at a profit; (d) that it was clear that it was not intended that the silver should be held for a long period as the interest would have been far too heavy a burden and there was no income to offset that; (e) that where profits

or gains were made from an investment which was made for the purpose of gain, even if it was speculation, it was an adventure in the nature of trade; (f) that from the extracts from The Times newspaper which were produced it was clear that it had been publicly stated on Oct. 31, 1961, that there must be a rise in the price of silver within the next twelve months and that there was at that time speculation in silver; and (g) that before the date of the second purchase of silver, at the beginning of April, 1962, the fear of devaluation had passed.

The commissioners found* that there was an adventure in the nature of trade the profits of which were assessable under Case I of Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1952, and dismissed the appeal. The taxpayer appealed by way of Case Stated to the High Court.

H. Major Allen, Q.C., and B. Pinson for the taxpayer.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Arthur Irvine, Q.C.) and J. R. Phillips for the Crown.

GOFF, J.: This is a case in which Mr. Halpern, acting for the appellant taxpayer, Mr. Norman Wisdom, was concerned, in the middle of 1961, with the possibility of a devaluation of the pound and the effect which that might have on his client's assets, which were found by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for St. Martin-in-the-Fields, Westminster, to be of a value between £150,000 and £200,000. The taxpayer had a very substantial professional income in addition to anything which might be yielded by way of income on his investments. Mr. Halpern therefore decided, as is found by the commissioners, that, in looking after the taxpayer's affairs, he ought to take steps to find a hedge against devaluation; i.e., to find an investment which, on devaluation, would retain its value in the United States and could easily be sold.

Having considered the matter and taken advice, he lit on the idea of a purchase of or investment in silver bullion. The commissioners found as a fact that he had checked that, over the five years prior to the autumn of 1961, the price of silver had not varied by more than three per cent., and that there was then no substantial likelihood of a sudden fall or rise. In those circumstances, in November 1961, having been introduced to Mocatta & Goldsmid, Ltd., who were bullion brokers, Mr. Halpern made an appointment to see them on the afternoon of Nov. 29, 1961.

Despite the fact that silver bullion had remained virtually unchanged in price over some five or six years, there was just at that moment, and before he could keep the appointment, a sharp rise in the price; but the commissioners have found that that was an unexpected rise resulting from certain action taken by the United States Treasury. Mr. Halpern wished to purchase £200,000 worth of silver, but due to the disruption of the market occasioned by that sudden rise in price Mr. Mocatta was unwilling to sell more than £100,000 worth, and consequently that was all that Mr. Halpern purchased for his client on that occasion. The terms of the purchase are set out, and I need not go into them in detail, but it was financed largely by borrowed money at a high rate of interest. That feature is not as significant as it might otherwise be by reason of the income tax and surtax position of the taxpayer, which made the payment of a high rate of interest less costly to him than it would be to many other persons.

The Case Stated further finds that Mr. Halpern persisted in his attempts to purchase £200,000 worth of silver, and as early as January, 1962, he saw Mr. Mocatta again for that purpose. Negotiations continued into March, and indeed early April, and eventually Mr. Halpern got his £200,000 worth of bullion, but Mr. Mocatta required that the old bargain should be closed by repurchase and a new transaction undertaken. Accordingly, the first lot of bullion was sold on Mar. 30, 1962, with a resulting loss of over £3,000, and a new bargain was made on Apr. 4, 1962, for £200,000 worth of silver. Mr. Mocatta undertook to repurchase the silver at that price increased by £10,000 if called on to do so at any time prior to Oct. 12, 1962, but there was a proviso, protecting Mr. Mocatta against any disastrous fall, that if the price fell by more than 4d. an ounce before Oct. 12,

* The findings of the commissioners are set out at p. 717, letters F and G, post.

A 1962, the taxpayer might be called on to exercise his option, and if he did not then it would lapse. Again, the transaction was financed by loans at a high rate of interest.

B There was in fact a great improvement in the monetary position, and in the autumn of 1962 the pound recovered and the price of silver jumped, with the result that the taxpayer or Mr. Halpern on his behalf, was able to sell the £200,000 worth of silver at a very substantial profit; viz., £48,000 not taking into account the taxpayer's liability to pay interest, it having been a term of the transaction that he should pay a year's interest in any event. It was also found by the commissioners that extracts from The Times, exhibited to the Case Stated, were produced during the cross-examination of Mr. Halpern.

C "Two extracts dated Oct. 31, 1961, forecast a rise in silver prices and a domestic speculative demand following activity of the United States Treasury."

D That is how it is put in the findings, although the extracts do not read precisely like that. So far as domestic speculative demand is concerned, all it says is: "A . . . speculative demand for silver was met at unchanged prices . . . for forward delivery." The paragraph of the Case Stated, which I was reading, continues:

"A third extract dated Mar. 23, 1962, was about the short-term improvement in the Sterling crisis since the credit squeeze of July, 1961. The fourth extract, dated Oct. 20, 1962, announced the new all time peak in silver prices. Mr. Halpern said he had not read any of these extracts."

E It does not in terms say that the commissioners accepted that, but I think that is the obvious meaning of that finding; and, indeed, the Solicitor General did not dispute that view of the matter.

That is all that is stated in the facts proved or admitted, but in para. 9 one finds the commissioners' findings, which of course do or may include their inferences from the primary facts. I will read para. 9, which is as follows:

F "We the commissioners found that: (a) The [taxpayer's] original intention was to purchase the silver as a hedge against the devaluation of sterling. (b) At the time of the second transaction other considerations influenced the purchase, the fear of devaluation having subsided. (c) The commodity was useless, left unallotted in the hands of Mocatta, was not an income producing investment, was not a long-term investment, and was financed by loans at a high rate of interest, and no organisation was needed to deal in the commodity as this was provided by Mocatta. (d) Whether there was a single transaction or two, by the nature of the subject-matter there was an adventure in the nature of trade. (e) The transaction (or transactions) was (or were) in the nature of trade and therefore assessable under Case I of Sch. D."

H The taxpayer appeals against that conclusion, and I am bound by the findings of fact but not by inferences from those findings. I am entitled to go behind the decision if it was wrong in law, which it may be if the conclusion was one to which the commissioners could not, on the facts found, have reasonably come. The relevant principle is stated by LORD RADCLIFFE in Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v. Bairstow (1). LORD RADCLIFFE said:

I "As I see it, the reason why the courts do not interfere with commissioners' findings or determinations when they really do involve nothing but questions of fact is not any supposed advantage in the commissioners of greater experience in matters of business, or any other matters. The reason is simply that, by the system that has been set up, the commissioners are the first tribunal to try an appeal and, in the interests of the efficient administration of justice, their decisions can only be upset on appeal if they have been positively wrong in law. The court is not a second opinion, where there is reasonable ground for the first. But there is no reason to make a mystery about the subjects that commissioners deal with or to invite the courts to impose any exceptional restraints upon themselves because they are dealing with cases that arise out of facts found by commissioners. Their duty is no more than to examine those facts with a decent respect for the tribunal appealed from, and, if they think that the only reasonable conclusion on the facts found is inconsistent with the determination come to, to say so without more ado."

Counsel for the taxpayer has criticised the commissioners' finding which I have read because, he says, there was no evidence to support sub-para. (b), and that what follows stemmed from the finding in that sub-para. (b). That finding was: "At the time of the second transaction other considerations influenced the purchase, the fear of devaluation having subsided." It seems to me, with all respect, that, on the findings of fact, there was no warrant for that inference. It may be that the fear of devaluation had subsided in many minds, but the relevant consideration is whether it had subsided in the mind of Mr. Halpern, and there is no evidence that it had. The finding of fact was that Mr. Halpern had not read the relevant extracts in The Times, which were put to him in cross-examination. The Solicitor-General invited me to say that the commissioners did infer or could have inferred that Mr. Halpern, who was applying his mind to the question of the value of the pound and was in close touch with Mr. Mocatta, would have appreciated the changed climate indicated by the relevant extracts from The Times. If that had been the basis, however, on which the commissioners were proceeding, one would certainly have expected to find some finding to that effect, and there is none.

I also find no warrant for the first part of the sub-paragraph, that "At the time of the second transaction other considerations influenced the purchase". It seems to me that the only possible inference from the facts found—that Mr. Halpern always intended to buy £200,000 worth of bullion, that he was unable to do so owing to an unexpected rise in the market price, that he persisted in his attempts to purchase the £200,000 worth and that in January, 1962, he again saw Mr. Mocatta for that purpose—is that the second transaction was not influenced by other considerations. The fact that there were two transactions was purely fortuitous owing to the unexpected rise in the price of silver.

That, in my judgment, however, is not the end of the matter, because in their findings the commissioners have pointed out in sub-para. (c) that:

"The commodity was useless, left unallotted in the hands of Mocatta, was not an income producing investment, was not a long-term investment, and was financed by loans at a high rate of interest."

Then they say:

"Whether there was a single transaction or two, by the nature of the subject-matter there was an adventure in the nature of trade."

So they are there saying that they draw the inference from the nature of the subject-matter that there was an adventure in the nature of trade, and that, if there were nothing more in the case, would be an inference which they were entitled to draw. The question is not whether I would draw it, but whether there were reasonable grounds on which the commissioners could draw it.

In Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Fraser (2), there are some pertinent observations by the Lord President (LORD NORMAND). As counsel for the taxpayer has pointed out, it is right to observe that, on the findings of fact, that case is plainly distinguishable, because it was found as a fact that the whisky which was the subject-matter of that case (3)

"was purchased with the sole object of resale if possible at a profit, and a profit as undermentioned was in fact made."

(2) (1942), 24 Tax Cas. 498.

(3) (1942), 24 Tax Cas. at p. 498.

A It was found, further (4):

“The purchase and sale of whisky in circumstances similar to that under consideration was a common type of transaction in the neighbourhood.”

LORD NORMAND made some observations as follows (5):

B “But what is a good deal more important is the nature of the transaction with reference to the commodity dealt in. The individual who enters into a purchase of an article or commodity may have in view the resale of it at a profit, and yet it may be that that is not the only purpose for which he purchased the article or the commodity, nor the only purpose to which he might turn it if favourable opportunity of sale does not occur. In some of the cases the purchase of a picture has been given as an illustration. An amateur may
C purchase a picture with a view to its resale at a profit, and yet he may recognise at the time or afterwards that the possession of the picture will give him aesthetic enjoyment if he is unable ultimately, or at his chosen time, to realise it at a profit. A man may purchase stocks and shares with a view to selling them at an early date at a profit, but, if he does so, he is purchasing something which is itself an investment, a potential source of
D revenue to him while he holds it. A man may purchase land with a view to realising it at a profit, but it also may yield him an income while he continues to hold it. If he continues to hold it, there may be also a certain pride of possession. But the purchaser of a large quantity of a commodity like whisky, greatly in excess of what could be used by himself, his family and friends, a commodity which yields no pride of possession, which cannot be turned E to account except by a process of realisation, I can scarcely consider to be other than an adventurer in a transaction in the nature of a trade; and I can find no single fact among those stated by the commissioners which in any way traverses that view. In my opinion the fact that the transaction was not in the way of the business (whatever it was) of the respondent in no way alters the character which almost necessarily belongs to a transaction
F like this. Most important of all, the actual dealings of the respondent with the whisky were exactly of the kind that take place in ordinary trade.”

Counsel for the taxpayer also relied on the case of an option in Jones v. Leeming (6), which he points out was a case in which the nature of the property was again one which was non-income producing and one from which no aesthetic enjoyment could be derived; nor, I would have thought, a pride of possession. The G commissioners there found that the transaction in question was not a concern in the nature of trade, but LORD HANWORTH, M.R., pointed out (7) that they themselves would have been disposed to take a different view. He said (7):

H “Now ROWLATT, J., and I think this court, might perhaps have taken the course of saying that having regard to what he had called attention to in this case, the particular facts, ‘of organising the speculation, of maturing the property’, and the diligence in discovering a second property to add to the first, ‘and the disposing of the property’, there ought to be and there must be a finding that it was an adventure in the nature of trade; but ROWLATT, J., refrained from so doing and I think he was right, for however strongly
I one may feel as to the facts, the facts are for the commissioners. It would make an inroad upon their sphere if one were to say in a case such as the present that there could only be one conclusion.”

Prima facie, therefore, it would seem that the findings in sub-paras. (c) and (d) were warranted by the evidence, but all these cases depend on their facts and it is necessary to consider in this particular case whether that is a possible conclusion having regard to the express finding that the taxpayer's original intention was to purchase the silver as a hedge against the devaluation of sterling and the fact, as I have held, that there was no evidence to support the second finding, that other considerations influenced the purchase. The Solicitor-General has submitted that, in any event, the intention being, as would appear from the high rate interest, that the silver should be re-sold at no long distant period, coupled with the fact that the intention was in substance and effect to make a profit on the re-sale, by having an asset which would retain its value in the United States of America and therefore would show a gain in value to offset the loss by the fall in the value of sterling, it was in itself an adventure in the nature of trade; and in my view the crux of this case, in the end, turns on that. It is submitted by counsel for the taxpayer that, on the facts as found and on the conclusion in sub-para. (a), this was nothing more than insurance. It is submitted by the Solicitor-General that it is at least a reasonable inference—and that is enough—that it was a transaction in the nature of trade.

In Californian Copper Syndicate (Limited and Reduced) v. Harris (Surveyor of Taxes) (8), the Lord Justice Clerk said (8):

“It is quite a well settled principle in dealing with questions of assessment of income tax, that where the owner of an ordinary investment chooses to realise it, and obtains a greater price for it than he originally acquired it at, the enhanced price is not profit in the sense of Sch. D of the Income Tax Act, 1842, assessable to income tax. But it is equally well established that enhanced values obtained from realisation or conversion of securities may be so assessable, where what is done is not merely a realisation or change of investment, but an act done in what is truly the carrying on, or carrying out, of a business. The simplest case is that of a person or association of persons buying and selling lands or securities speculatively, in order to make gain, dealing in such investments as a business, and thereby seeking to make profits. There are many companies which in their very inception are formed for such a purpose, and in these cases it is not doubtful that, where they make a gain by a realisation, the gain they make is liable to be assessed for income tax. What is the line which separates the two classes of cases may be difficult to define, and each case must be considered according to its facts; the question to be determined being—Is the sum of gain that has been made a mere enhancement of value by realising a security, or is it a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme for profit-making?”

I think, on the peculiar facts of this case, that one ought to postulate the question: is the sum of gain that has been made a mere enhancement of value by realising a security, or by realising something acquired as an insurance against devaluation, or is it a gain made in an operation of business in carrying out a scheme for profit-making? I have to remember in this case the very important finding that Mr. Halpern had satisfied himself that what he was purchasing was something the price of which had not materially moved for over five years, and the express finding that there was then no substantial likelihood of a sudden fall or rise.

Having regard to that finding of fact and to the conclusion which the commissioners came to as to the taxpayer's original intention, and to the fact that in my judgment there was no evidence to support any finding that his intention changed, it seems to me as a matter of law to follow that this was not an adventure in the nature of trade but was what Mr. Halpern meant it to be, a security to protect his client against devaluation, and that the actual profit which he realised was fortuitous. In my judgment, therefore, the appeal succeeds.

Weights and measures—Pre-packed goods—Short weight—Testing—Time and place of testing—Single articles brought in by purchaser for testing—No other articles tested—Similar goods available elsewhere in locality—Whether other articles of same kind available for testing within the meaning of Weights and Measures Act 1963 (c. 31) s. 26 (7).

A purchaser bought two packets of potato crisps at 10 a.m. from a mobile shop at Trowbridge. He took them unopened at about 3.15 p.m. to the local inspector of weights and measures who weighed them. Each packet was marked "net weight 1 oz. and 4 drams". One packet weighed only fourteen drams. The other weighed 1 oz. 7½ drams and seven grains. No other packets or articles were tested. An information was preferred in the circumstances against the respondents, who supplied the packets to the sellers. No circumstances founding a defence under para. (iii) of s. 26 (7)* of the Weights and Measures Act 1963 were put forward. On appeal against the dismissal of the information on the ground that a defence under s. 26 (7) was established, viz., that other articles of the same kind had been available for testing at the same time and place, viz., at Trowbridge, and a reasonable number of them had not also been tested,

Held: (i) in the circumstances of the present case testing the packets, for the purposes of s. 26 (7) of the Act of 1963, began when they were brought to the inspector, at which time and place no other articles were "available" (viz., physically present or adjacent) for testing; and the respondents were not entitled to maintain a defence under s. 26 (7) on the ground that though other articles were not available to the inspector at the time and place when his test began, such other articles were available from retailers or elsewhere in the locality (see p. 724, letter H, and p. 725, letters D, E, F and G, post).

F

(ii) the defences under para. (ii) and para. (iii) of s. 26 (7) were open to the respondents, but on the facts, the proceedings being in respect of a single article, the deficiency was not inconsiderable and para. (ii) was thus inapplicable; no circumstances having been advanced to establish a defence under para. (iii), the case would be remitted to the justices with a direction to convict (see p. 725, letters B and H, post).

G

Per CURIAM: when an inspector himself decides to make a test and selects articles for testing, e.g., at a shop, his test starts at that time, and it is to that time that, for the purposes of s. 26 (7), the question whether articles of the same kind are available refers; if such other articles are available then a defence under s. 26 (7) arises if a reasonable number are not tested (see p. 724, letters B and D, and p. 725, letter F, post).

Case Stated.

This was a case stated by the justices for the county of Wilts., acting in and for the petty sessional division of Trowbridge, in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Trowbridge on Sept. 28, 1967. On Aug. 18, 1967, an information was preferred by the appellant, Cyril Joseph Edward Sears, against the respondents, Smiths Food Group, Ltd., charging that the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Ltd., of Manchester on May 22, 1967, at Trowbridge was the person by whom certain goods, namely potato crisps, were sold by retail to Mr. Ronald George Peters, the buyer, at a time while they were prepacked in a container marked with a statement in writing with respect to their quantity, namely net weight one ounce four drams, the quantity of the said goods being found on the day of purchase to be less than that stated, namely fourteen drams gross weight, contrary to s. 24 (3) of the Weights and Measures Act 1963. The information was preferred against the respondents since Wiltshire county council, being the authority concerned, were reasonably satisfied under s. 27 (4)* of the Act of 1963 that the offence was due to the act or default of the respondents and that the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Ltd., could establish a defence under s. 27 (1) of that Act. The facts are summarised below at letter I, to p. 723, letter B, post.

It was contended by the respondents before the justices that they were entitled to the benefit of the defence afforded by s. 26 (7) of the Act of 1963, and that in that subsection the expression "the time" meant the day on which the packets of crisps were tested and the words "the place" meant Trowbridge; accordingly it was contended that the inspector should have tested any packets of crisps which were available for testing on that day in the travelling shop from which the packet in question was purchased, and also any packets which were available for testing at the Co-operative Wholesale Society's depot at Trowbridge. It was contended before the justices by the appellant that in s. 26 (7) the phrase "the time" meant the time when the packet of crisps was submitted to the inspector for testing, and that "the place" meant the department at County Hall, Trowbridge, where the articles were tested; the appellant further submitted that on the occasion when the packets were tested there were only two packets available for testing and the weights of both packets had been given in evidence.

The justices were of opinion that, in s. 26 (7) of the Act of 1963, the words "the time" meant the day on which the packets of crisps were tested, that the words "the place" meant Trowbridge and that, as a narrower interpretation was put on the words by the appellant, he had failed to comply with the provisions of the section. They accordingly dismissed the information. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the justices came to a correct decision in point of law in dismissing the information. The cases noted below† were cited during the argument in addition to the one referred to in the judgment of ASHWORTH, J.

Frank Whitworth, Q.C., and R. J. Ellis for the respondents.

ASHWORTH, J., delivered the first judgment at the invitation of LORD PARKER, C.J.: In August, 1967, an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondents alleging, in effect, that some pre-packed potato crisps were under-weight. The respondents were brought into the proceedings under and in accordance with s. 27 of the Weights and Measures Act 1963. To simplify the position, it is fair to say that as a result of sub-s. (5) of that section, the position of the respondents is equated with that of the actual retailers, who were the local co-operative society.

The facts were that at about 10 a.m. on May 22, 1967, a witness named Peters bought two 6d. packets of Smiths potato crisps from a travelling shop belonging to the Co-operative Wholesale Society. Later in the day Mr. Peters noticed that one packet contained considerably less crisps than the other, and appeared

A to be light in weight. At about 3.15 p.m. on May 22 he took it to the weights and measures department at County Hall in Trowbridge, where the two unopened packets of crisps were weighed by an inspector. Each packet was marked with the words "Net weight one ounce and four drams", but it turned out that one of the two packets when weighed was fourteen drams only; the gross weight of the other was one ounce seven and a half drams and seven grains.

B Evidence was called before the justices explaining how the local co-operative society had taken delivery of some cartons supplied by the respondents, and the issue in the court below all turned on the question whether the respondents could successfully rely on the first of the safeguards and defences provided by s. 26 of the Act of 1963. It is to be noted that s. 26 (7) is the revised and extended form of s. 12 (1) of the Sale of Foods (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926. It is a revised form because there is no doubt that the current sub-s. (7) confers on persons charged with these offences a much larger possibility of obtaining acquittal than was the case with s. 12 (1).

C I do not think it necessary to read s. 12 (1), or indeed to cite from the case which was brought to the notice of the justices and to the notice of this court, Cave v. Dudley Co-operative Society, Ltd. (1). The question canvassed in that case, so far as it is material to this case, was the meaning of the word "occasion". D It is necessary to consider in some detail the terms of s. 26 (7) of the Act of 1963. Before doing so, I would say this by way of preface, that this subsection embraces in its first part a defence, so to speak, on its own. It is an absolute defence, and if the facts bring it into operation, then, as the subsection says, the person charged shall not be convicted. The second part of the subsection really only E comes into operation in respect of cases where the first part has not provided a defence and, also in cases where the first part never would provide a defence. To make the facts clearer, let me read, so far as is material, the terms of s. 26 (7):

"If proceedings for an offence under this Part of this Act . . . in respect of any deficiency . . . in the quantity—(a) of any goods made up for sale . . . in or on a container marked with an indication of quantity . . . are brought F with respect to any article, and it is proved that, at the time and place at which that article was tested, other articles of the same kind . . . were available for testing, the person charged shall not be convicted of such an offence with respect to that article unless a reasonable number of those other articles was also tested . . ."

G I have left out the immaterial words.

H Before attempting an analysis of the words, may I venture to put forward what I would suggest is the plain intention of Parliament by this enactment, and indicate the type of situation with which it was dealing. It is in my view a case where an inspector may come on a retailer or dealer in articles such as bread or packets of potato crisps and he has, either by way of information or suspicion or instinct, the notion that it may be wise to make a test in case one or other of the articles is underweight. It contemplates a situation where he decides to test, and Parliament has said, as I see it, that it would not be right for him in such circumstances to pick on one article and, if he were fortunate enough for his purpose to find a defective article, to launch proceedings on that article alone. Parliament has said that in such circumstances it is his duty, if there are other articles of the same kind available for testing, to test a reasonable number of I those other articles. Parliament has gone further by providing expressly that unless he takes that course, then the person charged shall not be convicted. That, in my view, is the purpose of the section and the situation which Parliament had in mind when it was enacted. My impression is borne out, as I think, by some information which was supplied to the court by counsel for the appellant, to the effect that broadly speaking proceedings under the Act of 1963 in these circumstances are generally brought as the result of action by an inspector.

Secondly, that such action or intervention generally occurs when he is in a position to carry out the requisite test, either at the premises or at the side of the van, or whatever the method of retailing may be. The result being that the inspector is in a position, so long as he is mindful of this section, to carry out what is essential if he is to bring a prosecution successfully, namely to test a reasonable number of other articles of the same kind. A

In my judgment, when the inspector decides to test and supports his testing by taking hold of a loaf of bread or a packet of crisps, or whatever the article may be, then that, for the purposes of this subsection, is the time and place at which that article is tested, albeit in some instances the testing may not be completed, for example, until some analysis has taken place some days later; but in the normal case the test will start then, that will be its time and place, and it will be completed then. It would follow from that, that the inspector, by intervening in that way and having started his test, is under the obligation to do, if the facts permit it, what the section refers to; namely, take the same action in regard to other articles of the same kind which—and these are important words—are available for testing. That phrase “available for testing” in my judgment is a composite phrase which fits into the picture that I have endeavoured to describe. It may be that the number will vary, but if there are other articles of the same kind to which he can apply the same method as he is adopting with regard to the selected article, then it seems to me that the section comes into force, and he must comply with what is there specified if a conviction is to result. B C D

Counsel for the respondents, has submitted to this court that the approach to this case by the prosecution before the justices involved altogether too narrow an understanding of the meaning and effect of the section. Maybe on one view it did, because, as already has been stated, the purchase was made at 10 a.m., and the test was not made until 3.15 p.m. What is said by counsel is that at that time testing was carried out, and at that time and place there were other articles of the same kind available for testing, inasmuch as the inspector might, by enquiry or visit, have obtained from some mobile van or indeed from the co-operative society's depot, articles of the same kind. On this approach he says that the word “available” does not mean physically adjacent to the inspector when he is carrying out his test; but it means, as he put it, that one can get it —“available means something which he could reasonably have got hold of”. E F Following that through in the argument, counsel said it would be deplorable if the person charged with an offence of this sort, who had in his depot or his mobile van other articles of the same kind, was deprived of his defence because the testing happened to be carried out by the inspector in the town hall or county hall at Trowbridge. G

I see all the force of that, but I trust it will be apparent from what I have said already, that I do not take the view that testing qua time and place is limited to the actual physical testing that was carried out in the room in the case where the inspector himself has selected articles. When he selects articles he starts his test at once, but when articles are brought in by a lay purchaser, clearly there has been no testing until he starts his operation. It may be that, in the case of an individual purchaser who wants to secure the intervention of an inspector and takes one article to him, the respondents or retailers do not have the advantage of the first part of s. 26 (7). It was pressed on the court by counsel for the respondents, in argument, that this was a construction of the Act of 1963 which would work harshly on retailers, but I do not take that view at all. It seems to me that one contemplates two quite separate situations in this additional defence. One situation is the one I have described first, of the inspector going to a shop or to a mobile van and seeing a number of articles, when he is required to make a test. The other situation is one where individual articles may be brought in by a purchaser or may be when there are in fact no other available articles to test. This approach to the matter is reinforced by looking at the second part of s. 26 (7) which provides what shall happen in the same two different sets of H I

A circumstances. Under para. (i), where there has been a testing of several articles, the justices are to have regard to the average. That is not conclusive, as this court held a month ago (2). There may be, even in an average, something so out of line with the statutory or appropriate requirement that the general average, so to speak, will not save them, but that is the course which the justices have to take when there has been a test of several articles. On the contrary in para. (ii), B what the justices have to do is to look at that single article, consider the facts, and ask themselves whether the deficiency or excess is inconsiderable, and if it is inconsiderable, they are to disregard it. Those two approaches are quite different; applicable to both comes para. (iii), that they are generally to have regard to all the circumstances of the case.

C In my judgment it would be quite wrong to say that persons in the position of the respondents are being unfairly treated because proceedings are brought in respect of a single article which has been brought in by a purchaser, and the inspector has not taken the course of enquiring from the retailers whether they have any other articles of the same kind which he might test.

D To come back to the first part of s. 26 (7) the important words to my mind for this case are the words "at the time and place at which that article was tested" coupled with the words "available for testing". Those two phrases give the key to the situation which Parliament was dealing with, and in my judgment the justices fell into error by saying in this case that the time meant the day on which the packets of crisps were tested; and that the place meant Trowbridge, and that as a narrower interpretation was put on the words by the E appellant, he failed to comply with the provisions of that section. It is only fair to counsel for the respondents, if I may say so, to say that he did not seek to support the justices' decision on the grounds on which they decided the case. He relied, and relied with persuasiveness if I may say so, on what he called the proper construction of the word "available". For the reasons that I have endeavoured to state, I am unable myself to accept his argument, and subject to anything further that may be considered, I would allow this appeal.

F BLAIN, J.: I agree.

LORD PARKER, C.J.: I agree. I confess that I have not found this an easy case, but on the whole I have come to the same conclusion as my lords. If one poses to oneself the question whether the respondents had proved that articles in the depot were available for testing at the time and place at which G the particular article was tested, it seems to me that the answer is "No". As an ordinary matter of language "available" there means physically present or physically adjacent, and for that reason I think that the justices came to a wrong conclusion.

H I would only add this, that I for my part have had doubt whether this case ought not to be remitted to the justices to consider the matter further, because even though the defence raised did not succeed, the respondents would be entitled to rely on para. (ii) and (iii) of s. 26 (7) of the Weights and Measures Act 1963. However, it seems that para. (ii) could not avail them in that no-one could say that the deficiency here was inconsiderable. Further, counsel for the respondents on their behalf, has not put forward any circumstances of the case under para. (iii) which would entitle the justices to acquit. Accordingly I I agree that this case should go back to the justices with a direction to convict.

Appeal.

This was a summons by the plaintiff, Furness-Houlder Argentine Lines, Ltd., the owners of the motor tanker, The Abadesa, by way of appeal against the decision of the Admiralty registrar dated Feb. 21, 1967, whereby he held that the liability of the plaintiffs to damages should not exceed the limit of £333,855 14s. 5d. with interest at four per cent. from Feb. 25, 1963, to the date of payment into court. The limitation claim arose from a collision in the River Scheldt on Feb. 25, 1963, between The Abadesa and the first defendants' steam tanker, The Miraflores, with the subsequent grounding of the second defendants' steam tanker, The George Livanos; the final appeal on the question of responsibility for damage was reported sub nom. The Miraflores and The Abadesa ([1967] 1 All E.R. 672).

G The defendants, including the third defendants, the owners of cargo lately laden aboard The Miraflores, cross-appealed against the rate of interest of four per cent. allowed by the Admiralty registrar; the first defendants contended for six per cent. and the other two defendants for seven per cent.

The authorities and cases noted below* were cited during the argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment.

Apr. 4. KARMINSKI, J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from a decree of limitation made by Mr. Registrar McGUFFIE, the Admiralty registrar, on Feb. 21, 1968. By that decree the registrar limited the liability of The Abadesa, the plaintiffs in the limitation proceedings, to £333,855 14s. 5d. with interest at four per cent. from Feb. 25, 1963, to the date of the payment into court. The latter date was Mar. 25, 1968. The plaintiffs now appeal against both parts of the order. It is complained that the correct order for limitation should have been £286,161 8s. 2d. and that the registrar was in fault in applying the wrong conversion figure of sterling into gold francs. All three defendants have entered cross-appeals on the ground that the rate of interest, namely four per cent, was too low. One defendant says that the rate of interest should have been not less than six per cent.; the other two defendants claim that seven per cent. was the right interest. B C

The history of this litigation is a long one. On Feb. 25, 1963, The Abadesa and The Miraflores collided in the River Scheldt. As a result of that collision, a third ship, The George Livanos, ran aground and was damaged. Protracted litigation followed. Finally the apportionment of fault was decided by the House of Lords; see the Miraflores and the Abadesa (1). It is not necessary for me to refer further to that litigation for the purpose of deciding the questions raised in the present appeal. The limitation proceedings were commenced by writ dated Feb. 8, 1966, in which the owners of The Abadesa are plaintiffs. On Nov. 18, 1967, the pound sterling was devalued. This was followed on Nov. 22, 1967, by the Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Liability) (Sterling Equivalents) Order 1967 (2). The effect of this order, which came into operation on Nov. 24, substituted a figure of £27 12s. 9½d. for an earlier figure made under the Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Liability) (Sterling Equivalents) Order, 1958 (3), namely £23 13s. 9¾d. The 1967 conversion figure has produced the sum decreed by the registrar, namely £333,855 14s. 5d. The 1958 figure would have produced the sum of £286,161 8s. 2d. The plaintiffs submit that the Admiralty registrar was wrong in applying the 1967 conversion rate and should have taken the 1958 rate. D E F

On behalf of the plaintiffs, counsel's argument was based on the submission that the registrar should have taken the 1958 rate of conversion, as this was the rate in force at the time of the collision in February, 1963, and was still in force when the limitation writ was issued in February, 1966. Therefore it was wrong to take into account the rate of conversion which came into existence substantially after the latter of these two dates. Limitation of liability is a creature of statute, and counsel relied on the provisions of s. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, as amended by the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1958. Section 1 of the latter Act substituted a new measure of liability based on tonnage, in this case one thousand gold francs. It was provided by the section that the Minister of Transport (now the Board of Trade) might from time to time by statutory instrument specify the amount which should be taken as the equivalent of one thousand gold francs. By the order of 1958 the rate was fixed at £23 13s. 9¾d. G H

Counsel for the plaintiffs made the point that the rights of parties cannot fluctuate during the litigation, and emphasised that the rate of exchange must be taken as the one in force at the date of the breach, whether the breach was one of contract or was a breach of duty. In support of his argument he relied on Celia (Owners) v. Volturmo (Owners) (4). That case arose from a collision between an English and an Italian ship, and the question was as to the rate of exchange I

A applicable to a claim calculated in Italian lire for detention while a ship was under repair. During the period of detention the lire had been substantially devalued in terms of sterling. It was held by the majority of their lordships that the proper date for ascertaining the rate of exchange was the date on which the detention occurred. LORD SUMNER pointed out at the end of his opinion (5) that fluctuations in foreign exchanges must introduce a speculative element, and to avoid this the law must apply the same principles as if the exchanges had remained stable. He added that waiting to convert the currency until the date of judgment only adds the uncertainty of the exchange to the uncertainty of the law's delays. LORD WRENBURY (6) summed the position up by saying that the answer to the measure of damage is to award such sum as represents the market value at the date of the tort of the goods of which the plaintiff was tortiously deprived. That is the test which counsel for the plaintiff says is the correct one to apply in the present case.

Counsel for the plaintiffs further argued that the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1958 was not retrospective in its effect, and could not so be unless clear words to that effect were used, or unless at least the words used in the Act of 1958 made it clear that it was intended to cover events which had taken place before the Act of 1958 became law. In support of that argument, he relied on a long line of authority, summarised in MAXWELL ON INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (11th Edn.) (1962) at pp. 204-5. He also relied on (7) the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 38 (2) (b) and (c).

In answer to that argument, counsel for the first defendants submitted that the common law position in either contract or tort was irrelevant in considering the effect of a limitation decree, such decree being the creation of statute law. The effect of limitation is of course to limit, or reduce, the rights of the victim of the wrongdoer. The history of limitation in Admiralty actions is a long one, extending over two and a half centuries. In Cail v. Papayanni, The Amalia (8), DR. LUSHINGTON discussed the history of limitation and described its origin as political. By this word I think that DR. LUSHINGTON meant that limitation was a doctrine designed to assist international commerce, and not political in the common modern use of that word. DR. LUSHINGTON emphasised that limiting liability was unknown to the common law of England.

Counsel for the first defendants, whose argument was adopted by counsel for the second defendants and her cargo owners, and by counsel for the third defendants, the cargo owners of the Miraflores, stressed that the Act of 1958 was indeed international in the sense that it was designed to give legislative effect to the International Convention relating to the Liability of Owners of Sea-going Ships, signed at Brussels on Oct. 10, 1957 (Cmnd. 353). Counsel for the plaintiffs complained that s. 1 (4) of the Act of 1958 was difficult to construe, though he conceded that it must mean something. Counsel for the first defendants argued that once it was accepted that the Act of 1958 was designed to give effect to the Brussels convention, its meaning was clear and that s. 1 as a whole gave the court power to assess the limit of liability in sterling at the rate in gold francs in force at the time when the party seeking limitation comes before the court, in this case on Feb. 21, 1968, when the decree of limitation was made.

In support of this argument, counsel for the first defendants relied on The Annie Hay (9) to show that as Parliament was seeking in the Act of 1958 to implement the convention of 1957, this court could look at the convention itself. Counsel for the plaintiffs did not object to this course, and I, therefore, looked at the convention. In the result I accept counsel for the first defendants' argument that art. 3 (b) of the convention is embodied in s. 1 of the Act of 1958.

Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the orders of both 1958 and 1967 were both prospective and not retrospective; but in my view the correct method of dealing with both instruments is to regard them as procedural and not as legislative, viz., that is each order is directed at stating only the rate of conversion into gold francs at the time that the order was made. In my view the order of 1967 meant that as from Nov. 22, 1967, the court had to convert into sterling at the rate there stated. The Admiralty registrar applied accordingly this rate at the time he made the decree of limitation, namely on Feb. 21, 1968. In my view he was right in so doing, and on this point the plaintiffs' appeal must fail.

I must now deal with the point raised in the cross-appeals, namely the appropriate rate of interest. Counsel for the first and second defendants argued that a rate of four per cent. cannot be right in a period of over ten years of dear money, since the object of interest was to compensate the victim of tort or of breach of contract for the loss of interest between the wrongful act and the payment of the damages for it: see The Northumbria (10), where SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE agreed with the observations of SIR HENRY PAGE WOOD, V.-C., in Straker v. Hartland (11) that justice required that a debt which was due, but the payment of which was delayed, should carry interest.

On the other side counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the practice of allowing interest at four per cent. which had endured for many years in limitation suits, and especially on the judgment of BUCKNILL, J., in The Theems (12). In Australia, where interest rates have tended to be higher, the same four per cent. rate has likewise been a standard rate in limitation suits, see Commonwealth of Australia v. Asiatic Steam Navigation Co., Ltd., The River Loddon (13). On the other hand interest given in judgments of the commercial court seems to have been more generous, in recent years and lately has reached seven per cent.: see De Maurier (Jewels), Ltd. v. Bastion Insurance Co., Ltd. and Coronet Insurance Co., Ltd. (14). In The Theems (15), BUCKNILL, J., pointed out that the rate of interest in limitation actions had remained at four per cent. for over a hundred years and held it still to be the proper rate in 1938. In The River Loddon (16), TAYLOR, J., in the High Court of Australia in 1955 felt himself unable to depart from the four per cent. English rate on the ground that it would be unwise to follow the fluctuations of monetary conditions from time to time, and that uniformity of practice should be followed in order to provide a fair return over a long period.

Neither of these decisions is binding on me, though both of them are of high persuasive authority. I am very mindful that some degree of stability of interest rates is most desirable, if only to avoid both the uncertainties and the expense of frequent calculations. On the other hand it seems to me that it is equally desirable to find a figure which is more consistent with interest rates over the last ten years, which has been for the most part a period of high interest rates. While I am reluctant to change a rate which has been steady for nearly 150 years, it seems to me that a change is now necessary, and I am going to be bold enough to make it. In the hope that the rate which I have chosen will last for some time, though not necessarily for a century and a half, I have chosen the rate of  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and allow the cross-appeals on interest accordingly.

The plaintiffs incurred liability for loss of or damage to property by reason of the collision of their ship, the Mecca, in May, 1965, with B., Ltd.'s ship, The Fremantle Star. The plaintiffs sought limitation of their liability. On Feb. 20, 1968, the Admiralty registrar decreed that the amount of the limit of the plaintiffs' liability should be ascertained at the equivalent of the one thousand gold francs per ton for which s. 1 (1) (b) of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1958, provided, and that this equivalent should be ascertained by applying the conversion rate specified in art. 2* of the Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Liability) (Sterling Equivalents) Order 1967. The registrar fixed the rate of interest payable by the plaintiffs on the amount of their limited liability at four per centum. No payment into court had been made. On appeal by the plaintiffs on the ground that the registrar should have applied the conversion rate applicable under the corresponding Order of 1958†, art. 2, being the rate applicable when the collision took place in 1965, and on cross appeals by B., Ltd., and by owners of cargo of The Fremantle Star seeking a higher rate of interest than four per cent.

Appeal and cross-appeals.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the United Arab Maritime Company, owners of the steamship The Mecca, against a decree made by the Admiralty registrar (K. C. McGUFFIE, Esq.) on Feb. 20, 1968, fixing their liability for damages at £215,620 5s. 2d. The Mecca had been involved in a collision in May, 1965, with The Fremantle Star owned by Blue Star Line, Ltd. As a result of the collision in the Gulf of Suez, both vessels were damaged, together with cargo owned by other defendants, laden on The Fremantle Star. It was agreed that The Mecca was eighty per cent., and The Fremantle Star twenty per cent., to blame for the collision. Accordingly, Blue Star Line, Ltd., were entitled to recover eighty per cent. of their damage, to be proved or agreed, less twenty per cent. of the plaintiffs' damage, which was agreed at £100,000 and that the two groups of cargo owners laden on The Fremantle Star were to recover eighty per cent. of their damage to be proved or agreed. It was also agreed that all such rights of recovery were subject to the plaintiffs' right to limit their liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts. The plaintiffs' claimed that in limiting their liability the conversion rate provided by the Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Liability) (Sterling Equivalents) Order, 1958, should have been applied; if it had been applied they would have been liable only for a lesser sum, viz., £184,816 18s. 7d. The higher amount, decreed by the Admiralty registrar, was the limit ascertained by applying the Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Liability) (Sterling Equivalents) Order 1967. The defendant owners of The Fremantle Star, Blue Star Line, Ltd. and defendant cargo owners cross-appealed against so much of the Admiralty G H I

- Apr. 24. BRANDON, J., read the following judgment: The court has before it three matters arising out of a claim by the plaintiffs, the United Arab Maritime Company, to limit their liability for damages in respect of a collision between their ship The Mecca and Blue Star Line, Ltd.'s ship The Fremantle Star which took place in the Gulf of Suez in May, 1965. The first matter is an appeal by the plaintiffs from so much of a decree made by the registrar on Feb. 20, 1968, as fixed the limit of their liability at £215,620 5s. 2d. The plaintiffs say that the limit should be less, namely, £184,816 18s. 7d. [His LORDSHIP stated the nature of the second matter, which was an alternative claim, and continued:] The third matter consists of cross-appeals by two defendants, namely, cargo owners and Blue Star Line, Ltd., against so much of the registrar's decree as fixed the rate of interest payable by the plaintiffs on the amount of their limited liability at four per cent. The defendants say that the rate should be higher, namely, 5½ per cent., or six per cent.

- E I shall deal first with the plaintiffs' appeal on the amount of their limit, which raises an interesting and important point on the interpretation of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1958. Section 1 (1) of the Act of 1958 prescribes two limits of liability, both related to gold. For loss of life or personal injury, the limit is the equivalent (by which is meant the sterling equivalent) of 3,100 gold francs per ton; for loss of or damage to property, or infringement of rights, the limit is the equivalent of one thousand gold francs per ton. Section 1 (3) provides that the Board of Trade (formerly Minister of Transport) may from time to time specify by order the amounts to be taken as the equivalents of those two sums in gold francs. Under that provision two orders have been made, one in 1958 (1) and the other in 1967 (2). The second order was made very soon after the recent devaluation of the pound and in consequence of it. It came into force on Nov. 24, 1967, and superseded the first order which had remained in force from Aug. 1, 1958, until then.

- G The question raised by the appeal is this. The plaintiffs having incurred liability for loss of or damage to property by reason of the collision to which I have referred, should the limit of their liability be ascertained by applying the equivalent of one thousand gold francs specified in the order of 1958, or that specified in the order of 1967? The registrar, dealing with the matter on the hearing of a summons for a decree of limitation which came before him on Feb. 20, 1968, held that the equivalent in the order of 1967 should be applied. The plaintiffs appeal. As appears from the figures mentioned, the amount involved in the appeal, apart from interest, is about £30,800. The registrar had already decided the same point in the same way in a previous case (The Abadesa (3)) on Feb. 21, 1968. His decision in that case has, since his decision in the present case, been upheld on appeal by KARMINSKI, J., in a reserved judgment delivered on Apr. 5, 1968. I have the advantage, therefore, which the registrar did not, of the guidance afforded by that judgment. While the decision of KARMINSKI, J., is not binding on me, it is of strong persuasive authority, and I should certainly follow it unless I were convinced that it was wrong. In fact, having heard full and careful argument on both sides of the question, I find myself, if I may respectfully say so, in entire agreement with that decision.

My reasons are as follows. Section 1 of the Act of 1958 has to be read as a whole. It is clear from sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (3) that the limit of liability in any particular case is to be ascertained by applying the equivalents specified in an order made by the Board of Trade (formerly Minister of Transport). There may be cases, however, of which the present is an example, where there is one order in force at the date when the liability to damages arises, and another order, specifying different equivalents and superseding the earlier order, in force at the date when the limit of liability falls to be ascertained. There may even be cases where there is more than one change of specified equivalents between those two dates. Subsection (1) and sub-s. (3) do not by themselves indicate, in cases where there are two or more orders to which reference might be made, which order in force at which date is to be applied. It appears to me, however, that sub-s. (4) does, by necessary inference, give just that indication. Subsection (4) provides that, where there has been a payment into court in respect of a limited liability, subsequent variation of the equivalents specified by order under sub-s. (3) shall not affect the ascertainment of the limit, unless the amount paid in was less than the limit as ascertained in accordance with the order in force at the date of payment in. While this provision is framed negatively, it has, by necessary inference, an affirmative corollary. That is that, where there has been no payment in, or where there has been a payment in but its amount was less than the limit ascertained in accordance with the order in force at the date when the payment in was made, the ascertainment of the limit will be affected by subsequent variation of the equivalents specified by order under sub-s. (3). The effect of that provision can, in my view, be put in this way. When the court comes to ascertain the limit in any particular case, it should apply the equivalents specified either (i) by such order as is in force at the date when the ascertainment is made, or (ii) if at an earlier date an adequate payment into court in respect of the limited liability was made, by such order as was in force at that earlier date. By adequate payment, I mean a payment of an amount not less than the limit as ascertained in accordance with the order in force at the date when the payment was made. In the present case there was no payment into court in respect of the limited liability. It follows that the limit must be ascertained in accordance with the order of 1967, which was in force on Feb. 20, 1968, when the limit fell to be ascertained.

Counsel for the plaintiffs attacked this interpretation of the Act of 1958 on two main grounds. First, because it conflicted with the general principle that, where damages are measured in a currency other than sterling, the appropriate date for conversion into sterling is the date when the damage occurred: see Celia (Owners) v. Volturmo (Owners) (4). Second, because it gave a retrospective effect to orders made under sub-s. (3), and in particular to the Order of 1967 in this case.

With regard to the first objection, while I recognise the general common law principle relied on, it seems to me impossible, in view of sub-s. (4), to construe the Act of 1958 as doing other than departing from that principle. With regard to the second objection, it seems to me that the argument begs the question. What I mean is this. If on the true construction of the Act of 1958, the limit of liability for damage occurring on a certain date is to be ascertained by reference to a state of affairs, namely the relationship of sterling to gold francs as specified

A from time to time by order under sub-s. (3), in existence at one or other of two later dates, then it is not really correct to describe the order which does such specifying as having retrospective effect.

Counsel for the plaintiffs argued that it was difficult to give any effect to sub-s. (4) because, under existing practice, there never would be a payment into court which could have the result contemplated. The subsection was, therefore, B unworkable and it would be wrong to construe the rest of the section in a manner contrary to established principles simply because of this one unworkable subsection. I accept that there are difficulties in seeing what kind of payment into court is contemplated by sub-s. (4). There appear to be three main possibilities: first, a payment into court by way of security; second, a payment into court by a defendant in a damage action under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 1; third, a payment C into court by a plaintiff in a limitation action. With regard to the first possibility, while it is possible to give security in an action in rem by paying into court, it is not, and has not for many years been the practice to do so. With regard to the second possibility, while there is nothing to prevent a defendant paying into court in respect of a limited liability under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 1, it is seldom done because of the difficulty that other claims, besides that of the D plaintiff in the action, are usually payable out of the same limit. Moreover, if in such a case R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 7 were strictly observed, the court, although it might need to know of the payment in and its amount in order to apply sub-s. (4), would be denied that knowledge. With regard to the third possibility, the practice in limitation actions is and has been for many years for no payment into court to be made until after the decree ascertaining the limit has been E made.

Despite these difficulties, I do not think that it can be said that it is impossible to find any practical application for sub-s. (4). In particular it may well be that, as the effect of the Act of 1958 comes to be fully appreciated, the practice in limitation actions will change and plaintiffs will seek to pay into court as early as possible and certainly before decree. I am told by the registry that a payment F in before decree in a limitation action was in fact made, for the first time in the last thirty years at any rate, in 1967. In these circumstances I cannot treat sub-s. (4) as being so obscure or unworkable as to justify disregarding the clear inferences to be drawn from it.

The view which I have formed of the meaning of s. 1 seems to me to be supported by certain other provisions of the Act of 1958, namely, s. 5 (4) (b) and s. 6 G (2) (a). Section 5 deals with release of ships or other property arrested in respect of a limited liability. Section 6 deals with restriction on enforcement of judgments or decrees after security in respect of a limited liability has been given. In either case, under the procedure prescribed, a question may arise whether the amount of the security given was not less than the amount of the limit concerned. In either case it is expressly provided that that question, if it arises, is to be H decided as at the time when the security was given. It seems to be a necessary inference from this that, for other purposes, the amount of the limit will, or may at least, have to be ascertained as at a later date, when the equivalents may have been varied by a subsequent order made under s. 1 (3). The view which I have formed of the meaning of s. 1 seems to me to be supported also by the terms of the I international convention to which it is agreed that the Act of 1958 was intended to give domestic effect. That is the International Convention relating to the Limitation of the Liability of Owners of Sea-going Ships (5), dated Brussels Oct. 10, 1957. I am not satisfied that s. 1 of the Act of 1958 is obscure or ambiguous so as to make it necessary to seek assistance in its interpretation from the Convention. On the footing, however, that there is such obscurity or ambiguity, the court is clearly entitled to seek such assistance: see Salomon v. Comrs. of Customs and Excise (6) and Post Office v. Estuary Radio, Ltd. (7).

(6) [1966] 3 All E.R. 871; [1967] 2 Q.B. 116.

(7) [1967] 3 All E.R. 663.

Under art. 3 (6) of the Convention the date on which conversion of gold francs into domestic currency is to be made is A

“the date on which the shipowner shall have constituted the limitation fund, made the payment or given a guarantee which under [the domestic law] is equivalent to such payment.”

That provision is wholly inconsistent with the construction of s. 1 of the Act of 1958 contended for by the plaintiffs, which would require the conversion to be made as at the date when the damage occurred. Moreover, although it may be questioned whether sub-s. (4) gives complete effect to art. 3 (6) of the Convention, it seems to me that it represents a clear attempt, at least partially successful, to do so. B

For these reasons I am of opinion, as was KARMINSKI, J., that the registrar has correctly decided the question of law raised by the appeal. It follows that the plaintiffs' appeal fails and must be dismissed. [HIS LORDSHIP then dealt with the plaintiffs' alternative claim, as amended, based on the agreement of settlement between the parties as to the quantum of liability, and concluded that that too failed and would be dismissed. HIS LORDSHIP continued:] It remains for me to deal with the cross-appeals of the two groups of cargo owners and Blue Star Line, Ltd. Both these parties applied for leave to cross-appeal out of time on the question of the rate of interest payable by the plaintiffs on the amount of their limited liability. The cargo owners had served a notice of appeal; Blue Star Line, Ltd. had not. I gave both leave to appeal out of time, and directed that, so long as Blue Star Line, Ltd. wished to do no more than adopt the argument put forward for the cargo owners, they need not serve a separate notice of appeal. C D E

The point raised by the cross-appeals is also of considerable importance. The registrar, in accordance with long-established practice in limitation actions, ordered the plaintiffs to pay interest on the amount of their limited liability at four per cent. from the date of the collision until the date of payment into court. The defendants whom I have mentioned appeal against that order, contending that the rate should be higher, say  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. or six per cent. The amount involved in the cross-appeals is rather over £9,000 if  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. is taken, and about £12,000 if six per cent. is taken. This question also came before KARMINSKI, J., in the appeal from the registrar in The Abadesa (8), to which I referred earlier. In that case he took the view that the four per cent. rate was out of date, and substituted what he regarded as a more realistic rate of  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. He indicated that he thought that the latter rate was one which might, for a period at least, be regarded as of general application in limitation actions. On this point, as on that raised by the plaintiffs' appeal, the decision of KARMINSKI, J., is not binding on me; but again I treat it as of strong persuasive authority, and should follow it, in principal at any rate, unless I were convinced that it was wrong. I say in principle at any rate because the question of rate of interest is not, to my mind, a question of law alone, to be decided in the same way in all cases. It is a question, in part at least, also of discretion, to be exercised in relation to the facts of each particular case. By that I mean that it is necessary in any particular case to consider the period in respect of which interest is due, and to arrive at a rate which is appropriate having regard to commercial lending and borrowing rates during that period. Limitation actions, like other actions, may differ in this respect. I agree entirely, if I may again respectfully say so, with the principle on which KARMINSKI, J., proceeded. That is to say that I agree with him that the four per cent. rate is out of date and that a more realistic rate should be substituted. I also agree with him that the fact that four per cent. has been awarded for over one hundred years does not prevent the court from now awarding a higher rate in order to do justice in the circumstances prevailing today. F G H I

- A The way in which I look at the matter is this. If the plaintiffs' liability were unlimited (as it would be, for instance, if they could not prove that the collision occurred without their actual fault or privity) the Admiralty court would in the ordinary way award interest on the damage claims. It would do so either on the special Admiralty principle explained in The Kong Magnus (9) or under s. 3 (1) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. If the claims
- B were brought in the Queen's Bench Division the court would award interest under the latter section. While the rate of interest would be discretionary, the practice in Admiralty cases has been to award five per cent., and in commercial cases in recent years five per cent. or six per cent. In one very recent case the Commercial judge awarded seven per cent.: see de Maurier (Jewels) Limited v. Bastion Insurance Co., Ltd. and Coronet Insurance Co., Ltd. (10). If these are
- C the rates at which interest would be awarded on unlimited damages, I can see no good reason for awarding interest at lower rates simply because the damages are limited. In so thinking, it seems to me that I am approaching the matter on the same lines as DR. LUSHINGTON did in The Amalia (11).

- The main difficulty in the way of awarding more than four per cent. arises from The Theems (12) which was reluctantly followed by the High Court of
- D Australia in The River Loddon, Commonwealth of Australia v. Asiatic Steam Navigation Co., Ltd. (13). In The Theems (14) BUCKNILL, J., recognised that the usual rate of interest awarded on damage claims in Admiralty was, and had been for some years, five per cent., but held that four per cent. was the proper rate in a limitation action.

- His reasoning, as I understand it, was as follows. The interest awarded in
- E damage actions in Admiralty was awarded, not strictly as interest on damages, but as part of the damages themselves. In limitation actions, on the other hand, interest could not be awarded as part of the damages, for so to award it would conflict with the statute limiting the amount of the damages; it was awarded instead on the ground that the wrongdoer had had the use of the money since the casualty and must pay to the injured party the sum which he had in theory made out of the money. On that basis the proper rate to award was four per cent., because that was the rate payable on a judgment debt. With respect to the judgment of BUCKNILL, J., I find myself unable to agree with this reasoning. In the first place, I think that the supposed distinction between interest on damages and interest as part of damages is unreal. In substance, if not in form, it comes to the same thing. In my view the purpose, and the sole purpose,
- F of awarding interest, whether in a damage action or a limitation action, and, if it be in a damage action, whether in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division or in the Queen's Bench Division, is to compensate for the fact that the damages are paid late: see The Amalia (11), and The Northumbria (15), in which The Amalia (11) is cited with approval. The fact that damages are paid late may be looked at in two ways, by considering either that the wrongdoer has had
- G the money, or that the injured party has been without it. These are, however,
- H only two sides of the same coin.

- In the second place, I do not consider that the right guide to the proper rate of interest to be awarded to compensate for late payment is the rate of four per cent. payable on judgment debts. That rate was prescribed by the Judgments Act, 1838, and has never been altered. In that connexion it is interesting to
- I note that the equivalent rate in Australia is five per cent. (see The River Loddon (13)). If a guide were required, I should have thought a better guide, because it is varied from time to time to take account of prevailing interest rates, is the rate which is prescribed as accruing on moneys paid into court. This was until recently five per cent., and is now six per cent.; see the Supreme Court Funds Rules, 1927, r. 78 (1), as amended by the Supreme Court Funds (Amendment) Rules 1965 and 1968 (16).

Agreeing therefore in principle with the decision of KARMINSKI, J., it remains for me to consider what is the appropriate rate to award, as a realistic rate, in the present case. In The Abadesa (17), KARMINSKI, J., was concerned with the period 1963 to 1968. After considering lending and borrowing rates during that period, he awarded interest at  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. If I were approaching the matter afresh I should myself feel that the choice lay between five per cent. as the lower limit and six per cent. as the upper limit. It follows that I agree with  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. as a fair figure in that case. In the present case I am concerned with the period 1965 to 1968. I think that there is material on which the court could find that commercial interest rates were on the average higher during 1965 to 1968 than during 1963 to 1968. Any such difference is, however, marginal, and I do not think that it should lead me to award a higher rate than KARMINSKI, J., did in the Abadesa (17). As KARMINSKI, J., said in his judgment, some degree of stability of interest rates is most desirable, and I am anxious not to rock the newly stabilised boat unnecessarily. In my view a fair rate of interest to award in this case, as in The Abadesa (17) is  $5\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and I so award. The cross-appeals therefore succeed and the part of the decree relating to rate of interest will be varied accordingly.

LIEW SAI WAH v. PUBLIC PROSECUTOR.

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Dilhorne, Lord Hodson and Lord Upjohn). February 12, April 29, 1968.]

Privy Council—Malaysia—Internal security—Possession of ammunition—Hand grenade bodies—Whether parts of hand grenades were ammunition within Internal Security Act, 1960 (No. 18 of 1960), s. 2, s. 57 (1).

The appellant had in his possession in a security area in Singapore six hand grenade bodies. They were not drill or dummy grenades, but they lacked levers, safety pins, detonators and base plugs. There was no evidence that they were in fact filled with explosive, but there was evidence that such grenade bodies would normally have been filled with an explosive and, if they were used with other explosives, they would explode and cause damage. The appellant was convicted of being in possession of ammunition, to wit, six hand grenades, without lawful excuse and without lawful authority contrary to s. 57 (1)* of the Internal Security Act, 1960. "Ammunition" was defined in s. 2† of the Act of 1960 as including "grenades, bombs and other like missiles... and any ammunition containing or designed to

Appeal.

F This was an appeal by the appellant Liew Sai Wah against the judgment of the Federal Court of Malaysia (appellate jurisdiction), TAN AH TAH, F.J., BUTT-ROSE and WINSLOW, J.J.), dated June 24, 1966, dismissing his appeal against his conviction by the High Court at Singapore (CHOOR SINGH, J., sitting without a jury) under an order dated Nov. 18, 1965, of the offence of having in his possession in a security area at Singapore, on Mar. 21, 1965, ammunition to wit, six hand grenades without lawful authority contrary to s. 57 (1) (b) of the Internal Security Act, 1960. The articles of which the appellant was in possession were in fact hand grenade bodies. Special leave was granted by the Judicial Committee on a question of construction, whether hand grenade bodies were ammunition within the meaning of s. 2 of the Internal Security Act, 1960. The facts are set out in the opinion of VISCOUNT DILHORNE.

H T. O. Kellock, Q.C., and I. C. Baillieu for the appellant.
J. G. Le Quesne, Q.C., and S. N. McKinnon for the Public Prosecutor.

I VISCOUNT DILHORNE: On Mar. 21, 1965, the appellant got off a train at Singapore station carrying a B.O.A.C. travelling bag. He was stopped by the police and in the bag were found six hand grenade bodies. He was arrested and charged and on Nov. 18, 1965, convicted in the High Court at Singapore of having had in his possession in a security area on Mar. 21, 1965, "ammunition, to wit six hand grenades, without lawful excuse and without lawful authority". He was sentenced to death under the provisions of s. 57 (1) of the Internal Security Act, 1960, which is as follows:

"Any person who without lawful excuse, the onus of proving which shall be on such person, in any security area carries or has in his possession or under his control—

"(a) any fire-arm without lawful authority therefor; or

“(b) any ammunition or explosive without lawful authority therefor, shall be guilty of an offence against this Part and shall be punished with death.” A

Section 2 of the Act defines “ammunition” in the following terms:

“‘ammunition’ means ammunition for any fire-arm as hereafter defined and includes grenades, bombs and other like missiles whether capable of use with such a fire-arm or not and any ammunition containing or designed to contain or adapted to contain any noxious liquid, gas or other thing:” B

At the trial before CHOOR SINGH, J., who sat without a jury, expert evidence was given by Sergt. Clifton then attached to the ammunition inspectorate. He gave evidence to the effect that the grenade bodies found in the possession of the accused were bodies of British 36 M grenades; that grenades, unless they were drill or dummy grenades, had their explosive in them and that the bodies found in the appellant's possession were not the bodies of drill or dummy grenades. He said that they were not complete grenades as they lacked levers, safety pins, detonators and base plugs. He had not opened the grenade bodies but said that grenades of this type were normally filled with an explosive called Baratol. No evidence was given at the trial proving that the grenade bodies were filled with an explosive. He said that if the bodies found in the appellant's possession were used with other explosives, they could still explode and cause damage. This assumes, of course, that they were filled with explosive. It is clear from his evidence that, lacking detonators and other parts, these grenade bodies would not have exploded when thrown and when the safety pin was taken out and the lever released in the way that complete grenades of this type do. C

At the trial counsel for the appellant submitted that grenade bodies did not come within the definition of ammunition in the Act of 1960 and that he had, consequently, no case to answer. CHOOR SINGH, J., ruled against him. He said: D

“The word ‘ammunition’ which appears in the fourth line of the definition, in my opinion includes grenades. Therefore a grenade containing or designed to contain any noxious thing comes within the definition of ammunition. In this case the evidence shows that the six grenade bodies found in the accused's bag were designed to contain Baratol which is a noxious thing. The grenade bodies are therefore ammunition within the meaning of the Internal Security Act, 1960.” E

While it is clear that the definition in the Act of 1960 of the word “ammunition” includes grenades and that a grenade designed to contain or adapted to contain any noxious liquid, gas or other thing is covered by it, even if empty of that noxious liquid gas or other thing—there is nothing in the definition to indicate that it was intended to cover not only grenades but parts of grenades such as grenade bodies. F

The appellant appealed to the Federal Court of Malaysia. Dealing with the submission that grenade bodies did not constitute ammunition as defined, that court said: G

“On this aspect of the case it is necessary to consider Sergt. Clifton's evidence which was that these six hand grenades were British 36 M grenades but they had no levers, safety pins or detonators attached to them. They were grenade bodies which are fitted with a high and powerful explosive called Baratol and they all had Indonesian markings. If levers, safety pins and detonators were attached to them they could be used. All grenades have their explosives inside them unless they are drill or dummy ones which these were not. If these six grenade bodies were used together with other explosives they would still explode and cause damage although they were without their component parts. In the light of this evidence we are of the opinion that the six grenade bodies come within the definition of ‘ammunition’ referred to above.” H

- A The Federal Court did not comment on the opinion expressed by CHOOR SINGH, J., but from this passage it appears that they based their conclusion on the ground that the grenade bodies if used together with other explosives would still explode and cause damage. As has been said, no evidence was given at the trial that these bodies were filled with explosive. Sergt. Clifton said that it was possible to remove Baratol from a grenade and that he had not opened these
- B bodies. If they did contain explosive and would have exploded if used with other explosives, it does not follow that they came within the definition. Whether or not they did so, does not depend on whether they would explode if so used. The definition makes it clear that an empty grenade would be covered by it.

The Internal Security Act, 1960, is a penal Act, and must be construed strictly. In 36 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (3rd Edn.), p. 415, para. 631 the following

- C appears:
- "It is a general rule that penal enactments are to be construed strictly, and not extended beyond their clear meaning. At the present day, this general rule means no more than that if, after the ordinary rules of construction have first been applied as they must be, there remains any doubt or ambiguity, the person against whom the penalty is sought to be enforced is entitled to the benefit of the doubt."
- D

As LORD SIMONDS said in London and North-Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (1):

"A man is not to be put in peril upon an ambiguity, however much or little the Act appeals to the predilection of the court."

- E The definition of "explosive" in s. 2 of the Internal Security Act, 1960, includes:

"(d) any material for making an explosive and any apparatus, machine, implement or material used or intended to be used or adapted for causing or aiding in causing, any explosion in or with any explosive, and any part of any such apparatus, machine or implement."

- F The definition of "fire-arm" in the same section includes "any component part of any such weapon as aforesaid".

If it had been intended that the definition of ammunition should include any component part of a grenade, that could easily have been stated. The omission to do so is not only significant when compared with the definition of "explosive" and "fire-arm". In 1958 the Corrosive and Explosive Substances and Offensive Weapons Ordinance (2) was made. In that Ordinance, "explosive substance" (3) was defined to include any bomb or grenade "and any such bomb, grenade..."

- G In their lordships' opinion the definition in s. 2 of ammunition is not wide enough to cover and does not cover grenade bodies alone. Counsel for the Public Prosecutor contended that, as the latter part of the definition covered grenades which were not filled but were designed or adapted to contain any noxious thing, the definition went further than applying to a complete grenade only. While recognising that the definition applies to grenades which are not filled, it does not follow from that that it applies to the component parts of a grenade.
- H

- I At the hearing before the Judicial Committee, counsel for the Public Prosecutor sought leave to advance an additional ground in support of his case, namely

(1) [1946] 1 All E.R. 255 at p. 270, letter G; [1946] A.C. 278 at p. 313.

(2) No. 43 of 1958.

(3) Section 2 provides: "'Explosive substance' shall be deemed to include any materials for making any explosive substance and any bomb, grenade, apparatus, machine, implement or material used or intended to be used or adapted for causing or aiding in causing any explosion in or with any explosive substance and any part of such bomb, grenade, apparatus, machine or implement."

that "if the six grenade bodies were not 'ammunition' as defined by s. 2 of the Act of 1960, they were 'explosives' as defined by the said section, and the appellant was not misled by the error in their description". He sought to contend that the grenade bodies came within that part of the definition of "explosive" quoted previously and he also referred to the case of Lee A Ba v. Public Prosecutor (4) where the appellant was convicted under the Internal Security Act, 1960, of having in his possession "ammunition to wit, two hand grenade detonators". In that case their lordships accepted the submission that detonators were explosives according to the definition and not ammunition. It would not have been necessary to consider whether grenade detonators came within the definition of "explosive" if the definition of "ammunition" could have been interpreted as applying to parts of a grenade. Their lordships were of the opinion that the error in nomenclature was of no significance. Section 156 of the Criminal Procedure Code applicable in that case is in similar terms to s. 155 quoted below (5). In that case it was not contended that the accused was misled, and their lordships held that the error in stating the offence was immaterial and that there was no substance in the defence based on the misdescription of detonators as "ammunition". In that case it was not suggested that s. 57 (1) (b) of the Internal Security Act, 1960, creates not one but two offences, one relating to the possession of ammunition and the other to the possession of explosive.

In their lordships' opinion the ground now sought to be advanced as a reason for the dismissal of the appeal, and sought to be advanced for the first time at the hearing before the Judicial Committee involves the presentation of a very different case to that which the accused had to meet at his trial and to that argued before the Federal Court. In the Lee A Ba case (6) the accused knew that he was charged with the possession of detonators. In this case the appellant was charged with the possession of six grenades when what was found in his possession was six grenade bodies. Detonators are expressly included in the definition of "explosive". Grenade bodies and the component parts of grenades are not mentioned in any definition in s. 2. If it had been alleged against him at his trial that despite the reference to grenades in the definition of ammunition, both grenades and their component parts were covered by that part of the definition of "explosive" quoted above, it may be—their lordships express no opinion on the matter—that the appellant would have had some answer to the charge. Their lordships refused leave to advance this ground as they did not think it right in all the circumstances that such a ground should be allowed to be advanced for the first time at the hearing before them.

For the reasons stated their lordships have allowed the appeal.

POPLE v. EVANS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Ungoed-Thomas, J.), November 14, 16, 17, December 6, 1967.]

Res Judicata—Dismissal of action for want of prosecution—Whether estoppel by record can be founded merely on such dismissal.

Res Judicata—Undisclosed principal—Contract for purchase of land entered into by C. acting as agent for principal whose identity and existence were unknown to vendor—Action by C. for specific performance—C. adjudicated bankrupt—Trustee in bankruptcy elected not to proceed with action—Undisclosed principal brought fresh action—Whether defendant could maintain res judicata based on the dismissal of C.'s action.

In an action by C. for specific performance of a contract for the sale of freehold land to him by the defendant, the latter pleaded that she was induced to enter into the contract by duress, and she counterclaimed for a declaration that the contract had been rendered void. In the purchase C. was acting as the undisclosed agent of the plaintiff, of whose existence the defendant did not know. C. having been adjudicated bankrupt, the official receiver informed the defendant, some months later, that C. had been acting as agent for the plaintiff in property transactions. Subsequently C.'s trustee in bankruptcy elected not to proceed with the action, which accordingly was dismissed. The plaintiff sued the defendant on the alleged contract, and the defendant applied to strike out the statement of claim as res judicata, relying on the order dismissing C.'s action.

Held: the plaintiff's claim was not barred as res judicata for the following reasons—

(i) where one of two parties to a contract was an agent for an undisclosed principal, any trust relationship as between the principal and the agent could not be recognised as between the other party to the contract and the principal (or the agent), with the consequence that in the present case the defendant could not maintain her plea of res judicata nor rely on the dismissal of the first action as a defence to the plaintiff's action (see p. 746, letter G, and p. 749, letter D, post).

F

Dicta of LORD ATKIN in Allen v. F. O'Hearn & Co. ([1936] 3 All E.R. at pp. 830, 831) followed.

G

(ii) estoppel by res judicata could not be maintained merely by reason of the dismissal of an action for want of prosecution, for the estoppel by res judicata was intended to be limited to the decision of issues on their merits as, e.g., when orders were made on trial or on admission or by way of compromise (see p. 752, letters G and I, post).

Motion.

By her notice of motion dated Oct. 23, 1967, Helen Margaret Evans, the defendant in an action commenced by writ issued on July 26, 1967, the F plaintiff, Marguerite Lilian Mary Pople, applied to the court asking that the plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 18, r. 19, and the inherent jurisdiction of the court on the grounds that (a) the statement of claim disclosed no reasonable cause of action in that the plaintiff was privy to proceedings on the same subject matter wherein a final order had been made in the defendant's favour; and (b) the statement of claim was an abuse G of the process of the court in that it averred matters previously conceded in such proceedings and was stale and oppressive. The facts are set out in the judgment.

A In February, 1965, Harry Roy Clarke commenced proceedings against the defendant in the present proceedings, Mrs. Evans, for specific performance of a contract made between them on Jan. 11, 1965, for sale to him of 230, Queen's Road, Portsmouth. The defence, delivered on June 17, 1965, so far as material, admitted the statement of claim, but it also pleaded that the contract was not binding on the defendant on the ground that she was induced to enter into it by duress on the part of Mr. Clarke. The defendant at the time counterclaimed for a declaration that the contract was voidable at the instance of the defendant and had been voided by her, and for other relief. A reply was delivered in August, 1965, which so far as material joined issue.

C A cheque for deposit on the purchase appears to have been signed by Mrs. Pople, the plaintiff in the present action, but although there was some solicitors' correspondence in January, 1965, about the contract it appears never to have been disclosed at that time that Mr. Clarke was acting as agent for Mrs. Pople or otherwise than as principal to the contract.

D In September, 1966, Mr. Clarke was adjudicated bankrupt and it then appears from the defendant's solicitors' letter of Feb. 8, 1967, that the official receiver informed them that Mr. Clarke acted as agent for Mrs. Pople in property transactions. Mrs. Pople's solicitors by letter dated May 18, 1967, claimed that he acted as her agent and trustee in the purchase of 230, Queen's Road from the defendant, Mrs. Evans. It also appears, however—and has been at any rate implicitly accepted throughout for the purposes of the present application—that the contract was made between Mrs. Evans and Mr. Clarke as agent for Mrs. Pople, as the principal both whose identity and whose existence were E disclosed to Mrs. Evans, and that, at the time of the pleadings in the 1965 Clarke action, and indeed until February to May of 1967 the existence of any such agency was not disclosed. In June, 1967, Mr. Clarke's trustee in bankruptcy informed the defendant's solicitors that he was not proceeding with the action, and on July 14, 1967, the action was dismissed by order made by the master. That order for dismissal is the order relied on to establish res judicata in this F case.

G On July 26, 1967, the present action by Mrs. Pople was commenced. The statement of claim is, so far as material, identical with the statement of claim in the Clarke action but with the added allegation that Mr. Clarke was at all material times Mrs. Pople's agent. No defence has been delivered in this present action, but on counsel's statement that it is intended to put in a defence so far as material identical mutatis mutandis with the defence in the Clarke action, it has been accepted with a view to saving costs, particularly as the defendant is legally aided, that the application should proceed as though such a defence had been delivered.

H It will be convenient first to dispose of two matters which were canvassed in argument: (1) the effect of the bankruptcy and the course taken by the trustee in bankruptcy on this application and (2), the application to this case of estoppel between parties and their privies, and of estoppel between parties and their privies and those in a quasi-privy relationship to them by reason of a contract of indemnity between such parties and quasi-privies.

I 1. Under R.S.C., Ord. 15, r. 7, Mr. Clarke's action did not abate on his bankruptcy. If Mr. Clarke's rights under the contract were held by him on trust for Mrs. Pople they would never vest in the trustee in bankruptcy at all; but, if they were not so held on trust, Mr. Clarke's rights would vest in the trustee in bankruptcy (see the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 38 (1) (a) (c) and s. 167) (1). If they vested in the trustee in bankruptcy he would then have the right to elect whether or not to avail himself of the cause of action and go on with the action, and such election is binding on the trustee and his successors in title (see Wright v. Swindon, Marlborough, and Andover Ry. Co. (2), Warder v. Saunders (3) and Selig v. Lion (4)). In this case the trustee in bankruptcy elected not to proceed. Therefore, whether Mr. Clarke's rights under the contract vested in the trustee or not, we are not concerned with any possible claim based on those rights by the trustee or those claiming under him.

2. I was referred to 15 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (3rd Edn.), p. 196, para. 372, which classifies privies as being (i) in blood, (ii) in law and (iii) in estate. It is clear—and indeed I understand it to be common ground—that Mrs. Pople is not such a privy of Mr. Clarke. I will only add that as stated at p. 198, para. 374 in respect of privity of estate, the title relied on to establish such privity must arise after the judgment on which the res judicata is based, or at any rate after the commencement of the proceedings in which that judgment was made: and such title as Mrs. Pople might have here arose before relevant proceedings were commenced. A person who is under obligation to indemnify another in respect of liabilities may in certain circumstances be estopped from disputing a judgment obtained against that other, but such estoppel cannot arise here because it only operates as between the parties to the obligation to indemnify. It is not suggested here that Mrs. Evans is a party to such an obligation or that it arises otherwise than between Mrs. Pople and Mr. Clarke (see 15 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND, p. 199, para. 377 and Mercantile Investment and General Trust Co. v. River Plate Trust, Loan and Agency Co. (5)).

So I come to the two substantial issues in this case as argued before me. (A) Was Mr. Clarke trustee for Mrs. Pople of his rights under the contract with Mrs. Evans in such a sense as to enable Mrs. Evans to rely, as against Mrs. Pople, on the dismissal of the Clarke action; and (B) is that order of dismissal of such a nature that res judicata can be founded on it? If Mr. Clarke was a trustee for Mrs. Pople vis-à-vis Mrs. Evans of his rights under the contract then it is not disputed for Mrs. Pople for the purposes of this application (subject to the question whether the order in this case is of such a nature that res judicata can be founded on it) that Mrs. Pople would be estopped in this action by the judgment in the Clarke action; and the argument has proceeded on that basis. It is not disputed by Mrs. Pople—indeed it is claimed by her—that Mr. Clarke was her agent in entering into the contract, and in my view he would do so vis-à-vis Mrs. Pople as agent and trustee for her and would hold any property under that contract on trust for her; and that in my view would include all her rights under the contract (see, for example, Harmer v. Armstrong (6)). Mrs. Pople contends, however, that, vis-à-vis Mrs. Evans, Mr. Clarke was not a trustee for herself, Mrs. Pople. This raises the question whether an agent for a principal, whose identity and existence are undisclosed to a third party when the agent enters into a contract with that third party, is vis-à-vis the third party a trustee for the principal.

Where a contract is entered into with a third party by an agent for a principal, whose existence is not disclosed, the rights as against each other, of the principal and the agent on the one hand, and the third party on the other hand, may be summarised as a general rule in the ordinary case as follows. The contract may be enforced by the principal and the third party against each other (see 1 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (3rd Edn.), p. 217, para. 494) and by the agent and the third party against each other (see p. 228, para. 516 and p. 236, para. 527). The agent's rights against the third party are lost by the intervention of the principal and are subject to any settlement with the principal (p. 237, para. 528). The principal's rights are not lost by payment to or settlement

A with the agent unless made within the scope of the agent's authority or apparent authority (p. 220, para. 500). The third party's rights against the principal or agent are lost by election of the third party, with the full knowledge of the facts, to look exclusively to the agent or the principal respectively or by judgment against the agent or the principal respectively (p. 219, para. 498 and 2 CHITTY ON CONTRACTS (22nd Edn.), para. 85). This mere summary of itself suggests

B that, as a general rule, in ordinary cases, the rights and obligations of the principal vis-à-vis the third party and of the agent vis-à-vis the third party are independent rights and obligations, save that the agent's rights are subordinate to those of the principal (see 2 CHITTY ON CONTRACTS (22nd Edn.), para. 60). There is no suggestion here that our case falls in any way out of the ordinary case or the general rule (7).

C In Allen v. F. O'Hearn & Co. (7), the first and last paragraphs of the headnote read as follows (8):

“C., an outside broker, who conducted his brokerage business through the defendants, who had a seat on the Toronto Standard Stock and Mining Exchange, gave instructions for the purchase and sale of shares without disclosing the name of his clients. Most of the transactions were on margin.

D C. found himself unable to find the cash for large purchases of a certain class of stock then open, and could not find the client for whom the purchases had been made. The defendants, purporting to act under powers given by the contract between them and C., proceeded to sell shares bought and held as security on the general account which mainly consisted of shares bought on behalf of C.'s clients, and in that way indemnified themselves

E against the loss on the particular stock in question. C. went into bankruptcy, making an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. On a claim for damages by C. and his trustee in bankruptcy against the defendants, the trial judge made a declaration (inter alia) that the defendants held the securities which they sold in trust for C. or his trustee in bankruptcy as trustee for C.'s customers and clients, and that the defendants had no right

F to charge those securities with the purchase price of the stock, and the judgment made provision for the determination and payment of damages. On appeal by the defendants the Court of Appeal of Ontario set aside this judgment. The plaintiffs appealed:—... Judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, setting aside the judgment of the trial judge, affirmed.”

G LORD ATKIN gave the reasons of the Judicial Committee, a committee which also included LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN and LORD MACMILLAN. LORD ATKIN dealt with the relations of the parties first in contract and then in property. With regard to contract he said (9):

“Their lordships are of opinion that this judgment cannot stand. So far as the rights of the parties depend upon contract, either Clarke's customers were undisclosed principals of Clarke in relation to the defendants, and had the contractual rights of such principals, or they were not. If they were, they had the right of suit for breaches of contract, or, alternatively, until they exercised their rights Clarke could sue: but these are ordinary legal rights. The supposed agent's rights would be to recover the damage suffered by him on the footing that he had been principal. He

H has no claim against the other party in the capacity of trustee; and though there have been countless actions in which an agent for undisclosed principals has sued in his own name, there appears to be no precedent for such an agent suing as trustee for his principals. What happens to the proceeds of a successful claim by such an agent is another matter. By virtue of his fiduciary relation to his principals, he may have to account to them for what he receives; but this is not the concern of the other party.”

It was suggested that these observations were directed to the ancient law of bailment, but this suggestion was founded on the mere reference in argument to The Winkfield (10) which was a bailment case. The passage quoted from LORD ATKIN's observations seems to me quite clearly to have no such restricted application. With regard to the claim in property, which consisted of the shares held by the third party brokers, LORD ATKIN said (11):

"If the case is looked at as a wrongful dealing with property apart from privity of contract the result is the same. As far as the shares agreed to be bought are concerned, if there is nothing due from the undisclosed principal either he or the agent must sue. No question of trusteeship arises. As far as the shares deposited as margin are concerned, the agent is in the position of mortgagee with a right to submortgage; a mortgagee is not a trustee; and if the shares are improperly dealt with by the submortgagee, the mortgagee can sue in his own right, or the mortgagor may under proper conditions sue to protect his property; but the mortgagee cannot sue as trustee for the mortgagor, for he is not trustee. In the case in question, either Clarke's rights passed to the trustee, or Clarke's customers alone could sue. Neither Clarke nor the trustee could sue as trustee for the customers . . ."

There is no question in our case, of course, of deposit of property as security, but in so far as the contract itself creates a right of property, it seems to me that it cannot afford any stronger ground for establishing a trust than in "the shares agreed to be bought" to which LORD ATKIN refers.

In Kendall v. Hamilton (12) EARL CAIRNS, L.C., thus explained the rights of a party who enters into a contract with an agent for an undisclosed principal (13):

"I take it to be clear that where an agent contracts in his own name for an undisclosed principal the person with whom he contracts may sue the agent or he may sue the principal, but if he sues the agent and recovers judgment, he cannot afterwards sue the principal, even though the judgment does not result in satisfaction of the debt. If any authority for this proposition is needed, Priestly v. Fernie (14) may be mentioned. The reasons why this must be the case are, I think, obvious. It would be clearly contrary to every principle of justice that the creditor who had seen and known and dealt with and given credit to the agent should be driven to sue the principal if he does not wish to sue him, and, on the other hand, it would be equally contrary to justice that the creditor on discovering the principal, who really has had the benefit of the loan, should be prevented from suing him if he wishes to do so. It would be no less contrary to justice that the creditor should be able to sue first the agent and then the principal, when there was no contract, and when it was never the intention of any of the parties that he should do so. Again, if an action were brought and judgment recovered against the agent, he, the agent, would have a right of action for indemnity against the principal, while, if the principal were liable also to be sued, he would be vexed with a double action. Farther than this, if actions could be brought, and judgments recovered first against the agent and afterwards against the principal, you would have two judgments in existence for the same debt or cause of action. They might not necessarily be for the same amounts, and there might be recoveries had, or liens and charges created, by means of both, and there would be no mode upon the face of the judgments, or by any means short of a fresh proceeding, of showing that the two judgments were really for the same debt or cause of action, and that satisfaction of one was, or would be, satisfaction of both. In the present case, I think that when the appellants sued Wilson and McLay, and obtained judgment against them, they adopted a course which was clearly within their

A power, and to which Wilson and McLay could have made no opposition, and that, having taken this course they exhausted their right of action, not necessarily by reason of any election between two courses open to them, which would imply that, in order to an election, the fact of both courses being open was known, but because the right of action which they pursued could not, after judgment obtained, co-exist with a right of action on the same facts against another person."

LORD CAIRNS was not considering there the rights of the principal or the rights of the agent against the third party, which was the subject of LORD ATKIN's consideration in Allen v. F. O'Hearn & Co. (15). But in LORD CAIRNS' observations again there is no question of any trust or relationship between the principal and agent being recognised as between the third party on the one hand and the principal and the agent on the other hand, although such recognition would enter into the situation which LORD CAIRNS was considering.

C
These cases appear to me to establish that where there is a contract between an agent for a principal, whose identity is undisclosed and a fortiori whose existence is undisclosed, then, whether their relationship with the third party is considered as sounding in contract or in property rights, there is no trust relationship between any of the parties which can be recognised as between the third party on the one hand and the principal and agent, or either of them, on the other hand.

D
So the relationship on which the defendant founds res judicata does not in my view exist and his submission that res judicata applies fails; and it is idle to speculate whether res judicata might be established in some other way or whether some other remedy, such as stay of proceedings, might be obtained on some ground or other, and for my part I can well understand no such case being advanced. Mr. Clarke's agency, which might conceivably have been relied on to fasten the judgment in the first action onto Mrs. Pople was admittedly terminated before judgment, and such agency was thus not relied on for the defendant.

I come now to the second substantial issue, namely whether res judicata can be based on an order of the nature which Mrs. Evans obtained in the Clarke action.

F
VISCOUNT RADCLIFFE in Kok Hoong v. Leong Cheong Kweng Mines, Ltd. (16) thus stated the law with regard to res judicata founded on default judgments:

G
"... default judgments, though capable of giving rise to estoppels, must always be scrutinised with extreme particularity for the purpose of ascertaining the bare essence of what they must necessarily have decided and, to use the words of LORD MAUGHAM, L.C. (17), they can estop only for what must 'necessarily, and with complete precision' have been thereby determined."

H
If the judgment in the Clarke action was a default judgment within LORD RADCLIFFE's observations then it seems to me necessarily to follow that as the material allegations in the statement of claim were admitted, and the only issue on which the defendant could have succeeded in the action was the issue of duress, then that issue must have been determined by the order in the Clarke action and is accordingly res judicata, entitling the defendant to succeed on that ground on the pleadings in the present action. But is the judgment in the Clarke action a default judgment within LORD RADCLIFFE's statement? In the Clarke action there is no admission of duress by pleading, by default or otherwise. There was no compromise of the action and there was no trial. Mr. Clarke's trustee in bankruptcy elected not to proceed with the action and Mr. Clarke just did not attempt to carry it on. The position is thus stated in para. 4 of the affidavit of Mr. Mathews, the defendant's solicitor:

(15) [1936] 3 All E.R. 828; [1937] A.C. 213.

(17) In New Brunswick Ry. Co. v. British & French Trust Corp., Ltd., [1938] 4 All E.R. 747 at p. 756; [1939] A.C. 1 at p. 21.

"On Sept. 28, 1966, Clarke was adjudicated bankrupt. Clarke's trustee in bankruptcy refused to intervene in the said action Clarke v. Evans since he recognised that Clarke had at all times acted as the plaintiff's agent in or about the agreement. The defendant issued a summons in the said action Clarke v. Evans for an order that the action be dismissed on account of Clarke's bankruptcy; the official receiver was the sole respondent to this summons. The said summons was heard before Master HAWKINS in Chambers on June 21, 1967. At such hearing my London agents, Messrs. Bulcraig & Davis by Mr. Baskett attended and explained to Master HAWKINS that Clarke acted as the plaintiff's agent in and about the agreement and that the plaintiff wished to be substituted as plaintiff in the said action Clarke v. Evans though no formal summons for this purpose had been issued. The learned master however held that the plaintiff had no locus standi in the said action and that since Clarke's trustee in bankruptcy wished to take no part in the said action the same must be dismissed and the learned master duly made an order to that effect. At no stage before Master HAWKINS was any argument directed as to whether the agreement was valid and enforceable against the defendant and in this sense the merits of the action were not determined before the learned master."

So it seems clear to me that the dismissal was not as the result of trial admissions pleading default or otherwise in any sense a decision on the merits. It was just dismissal for want of prosecution.

In the Kok Hoong case (18), the judgment relied on to establish res judicata was a judgment in favour of the plaintiff in default of the defendant obtaining leave to appear and defend (19); it was not a dismissal for want of prosecution. Other cases were referred to for the defendant, but they were cases in which the order relied on for res judicata was founded on compromise, admissions or default tantamount to admissions, and thus in a sense at any rate on merit, and certainly not on mere want of prosecution.

I was referred to two cases in which res judicata based on want of prosecution were dealt with. The first was the Irish case of Byrne v. Frere (20). That was decided in the days of the old system of chancery procedure to which LORD RADCLIFFE'S comments on applying decisions covered by the old common law procedure are equally applicable. He said (21):

"But it is a valid criticism of its utility for the solution of questions of estoppel that arise now or in the future that the formula itself [the formula which was adopted in the old case of Howlett v. Tarte (22) to which LORD RADCLIFFE had just referred] could hardly avoid being conditioned by the special and very complicated rules by which the system was governed (see per LORD SHAW in Hoystead v. Taxation Comr. (23), and the exercise of imagination that is required in order to translate modern pleadings into the forms of the older ritual becomes progressively harder to achieve for those for whom the work of translation is by now merely an antiquarian exercise."

In Byrne v. Frere (24) it is stated that in 1797 the plaintiff filed another bill.

"That bill was answered, and issue joined, and the plaintiff not proceeding, the cause was set down by the defendant and the bill was dismissed in 1804, and the order of dismissal duly enrolled. The present bill was filed in 1808, and the plaintiff relied that not having appeared at the hearing for dismissal in 1804, the order of dismissal was an ex parte order, and was not a bar to a new bill for the same purpose."

A The Lord Chancellor of Ireland said (25):

"... it is truly said, dismissal of a bill for non-prosecution is not a bar to a new suit. It amounts to nothing. It has no effect even on the running of time. It lets in the operation of time, ab initio, as if no such bill had ever been filed. It may, I think, be looked to as evidence of conduct, certainly not as a record. But a bill dismissed after publication passed, is not a bill dismissed for non-prosecution. There is a difference between a mere dismissal for want of prosecution, and where the plaintiff having struggled for more time, the court has after publication dismissed the bill. That was the kind of dismissal in 1804. That approaches to adjudication. It cannot be called a dismissal for want of prosecution, because publication was passed, and after publication there can be no dismissal for want of prosecution. The defendant then has a right to a dismissal of a higher kind by setting down the cause, and having the decree of the court. It cannot be for want of prosecution, because the suit has been prosecuted when issue is joined, and each party has been at liberty to prove his case as he can, and publication passed. The dismissal after that is the judgment of the court pronounced against the plaintiff, and may be pleaded in bar if enrolled, or insisted on by way of answer. The decree if not enrolled must, and if enrolled may be given in evidence, if not pleaded in bar. A dismissal for non-prosecution has a different effect, being in effect a mere nullity;—so that the suit so terminated does not even affect the running of time. This is the doctrine which is consistent with common sense; otherwise a plaintiff perceiving that he failed in proving his case would suffer a dismissal, and then construct a new case upon the knowledge derived from the depositions in the suit terminated by dismissal after publication."

There it was held on the facts and in the context of the old procedure that the dismissal was not for want of prosecution; but it was recognised that res judicata could not be founded on dismissal for want of prosecution.

F The second case, Magnus v. National Bank of Scotland, Ltd. (26) was after the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875. The second paragraph of the headnote conveniently states most of the facts:

"The plaintiffs, being in default in making discovery and answering interrogatories, informed the defendants that they intended to abandon the action, and would pay the costs. On the plaintiffs failing to do this, the defendants took out a summons to dismiss the action for want of prosecution. G The plaintiffs thereupon paid the defendants' costs, and at the hearing of the summons they appeared and consented to an order dismissing the action as against the defendants. The plaintiffs subsequently brought a fresh action against the same defendants in respect of the same subject-matter. The defendants raised the question whether the plaintiffs were not estopped by reason of the consent order made on the summons."

H I need only add to this a short paragraph (27). It reads:

"The question to be determined in the action against the National Bank of Scotland was precisely similar to that in the action brought by the plaintiffs against the Queensland National Bank; and it was thought more convenient that the action against the National Bank of Scotland should be I dismissed for want of prosecution or discontinued until after the action against the Queensland National Bank had been tried, and then to commence a fresh action if the decision was in the plaintiffs' favour."

It was held in that case that "as such order did not proceed upon a compromise of the cause of action, it was no bar to the subsequent action". KAY, J., said (28):

"Now, if that consent order had proceeded on a compromise of the cause of action, it would have been an absolute bar to a new action; but here the order was made on a summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, an order on which would not be a bar; and therefore, unless it is shown that the consent proceeded upon the compromise of the cause of action, I cannot see how it is possible to say this would be a bar. Can it be said that when you attend on a summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, and submit to an order by consent, that order is a bar to another action? That seems to me against all the rules of the court. There is a great deal more in this than mere technicality, because the principle of the court is that, unless the merits of the case have been dealt with, the dismissal of one action is not a bar to another action of the same kind. That is a very ancient rule of the Court of Chancery, which I should be sorry to see disturbed . . . how can it be justly said that this order, taken on summons to dismiss for want of prosecution, and taken by consent, ipso facto prevented another action being brought? It seems to me that where an order obtained on such a summons is expressed to be made by consent, the court may look behind the order, and see upon what terms that consent was given, and whether there be any ground for saying that it was intended to compromise the action altogether. On the other hand, if it is plain that there was no such agreement—no agreement whatever to put an end to the cause of action by compromise—then the mere fact that the order was worded ‘by consent’ does not, in my opinion, in the least degree prevent the bringing of this second action.”

This statement refers to the ancient chancery practice. It is in line with the passages quoted from Byrne v. Frere (29), and it applies to and bridges into the context of modern procedure the principle stated in Byrne v. Frere (29) that res judicata cannot be founded on an order of dismissal for want of prosecution. This is in keeping with the considerations of substance, not of technicalities, that have governed the development of res judicata. LORD MAUGHAM, L.C., said in New Brunswick Ry. Co. v. British & French Trust Corp., Ltd. (30):

“The doctrine of estoppel is founded on considerations of justice and good sense. If an issue has been distinctly raised and decided in an action in which both parties are represented, it is unjust and unreasonable to permit the same issue to be litigated afresh between the same parties or persons claiming under them; . . .”

That case and the Kok Hoong case (31) showed the concern of the courts to limit the operation of res judicata to issues which can be fairly regarded or treated as having been disposed of by the order relied on on their merits, for example, by trial admission or compromise. It seems to me that the non-technical and substantial nature of res judicata “founded on the considerations of justice and good sense” has no place for mere dismissal for want of prosecution, and that Byrne v. Frere (29) and Magnus v. National Bank of Scotland, Ltd. (32) rightly so establish.

So on each of the two grounds that have been argued I conclude that this application fails, that is (i) because Mr. Clarke was not vis-à-vis Mrs. Evans’ trustee for Mrs. Pople, and, independently of that ground, (ii) because the order dismissing the Clarke action was for want of prosecution, and res judicata cannot be founded on such an order.

Criminal Law—Sentence—Hospital order—Court of Appeal substituting hospital order with restriction for sentence of imprisonment—Transfer direction previously made by Secretary of State—Medical evidence available on appeal—Mental Health Act, 1959 (7 & 8 Eliz. 2 c. 72), s. 60, s. 65, s. 72—Criminal Appeal Act 1966 (c. 31), s. 4 (2)—Criminal Justice Act 1967 (c. 80), s. 97 (7).

C

The appellant pleaded guilty to charges of indecent assault. The case was one where medical treatment would be appropriate, but, as no medical evidence complying with s. 60 of the Mental Health Act, 1959, was available, a sentence of imprisonment was imposed. After leave to appeal was given, an order was made by the Secretary of State under s. 72 of the Act of 1959 for the admission of the appellant to Broadmoor as a patient. On appeal evidence satisfying s. 60 was available.

D

Held: by virtue of s. 97 (7) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 the Court of Appeal could entertain the further evidence and could make a hospital order, without contravening s. 4 (2) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1966, since a hospital order, which was remedial in purpose, could not be regarded as more severe than a sentence of imprisonment; accordingly the sentence of imprisonment would be quashed and a hospital order under s. 60 of the Mental Health Act, 1959, with a restriction under s. 65 for an indefinite period would be substituted (see p. 755, letters B, C and D, post).

Appeal.

G

This was an appeal by Daniel Joseph Bennett, who had pleaded guilty at Romford magistrates' court in March, 1967, to two charges of indecent assault on a boy. The appellant was committed for sentence to North-East London Quarter Sessions, where he asked for twenty-two similar offences to be taken into consideration. On Apr. 18, 1967, sentence was passed on him of three years' imprisonment concurrent on each charge. He appealed against sentence.

H

N. R. Hannah for the appellant.

WIDGERY, L.J.: The deputy chairman of North-East London Sessions obviously thought that this was a case for medical treatment and clearly, we think, would have been minded to make an order for medical treatment if he had had the power on the material put before him. Unfortunately, for a reason which has not been fully disclosed, the appellant was not represented in the court below; there was no one to see to it that the appropriate medical evidence was provided, and although one adjournment was ordered to try and remedy this omission the deputy chairman eventually found himself on Apr. 18 with a report from the prison medical officer which indicated the desirability of psychiatric treatment, but which was not a report complying with the requirements of the Mental Health Act, 1959, and thus insufficient to enable a hospital order to be made. Accordingly, the deputy chairman did all that he could do in the circumstances, namely, pass a sentence of imprisonment which would enable treatment to be given under the prison rules, and the sentence which he passed was one of three years. A

Leave to appeal was given by the single judge, who clearly thought that another effort should be made to see whether an order involving medical treatment might not be substituted. As a result of that the appellant's mental condition was investigated afresh, and the reports forthcoming were such that the Secretary of State made an order under s. 72 of the Mental Health Act, 1959, under which he was admitted to Broadmoor as a patient. B

On the face of it that might have met the needs of the case, but the appellant proceeds with his appeal, contending through counsel that the proper order in this case was a hospital order under s. 60 of the Mental Health Act, 1959. He recognises that if a restriction order is imposed it may involve his being detained for more than three years, but recognises also that if he recovers within three years he may then regain his liberty. To that end this court has been provided with the appropriate medical evidence to satisfy the terms of s. 60 of the Mental Health Act, 1959. In particular, Dr. Neustatter, a medical officer qualified under s. 28 of the Act of 1959 and who is, of course, very well known to this court, has examined the appellant on two occasions and finds that he is suffering from schizophrenia and recommends that a hospital order should be made. That evidence is confirmed by a written statement from Dr. Schildt, who also diagnosed schizophrenia and also supports the view that a hospital order should be made. The appellant being already in Broadmoor no special arrangements for his admission are required. C D

This court is quite satisfied that the most effective way to deal with this case is to make a hospital order under s. 60 with a restriction under s. 65 for an indefinite period; and it only remains to consider whether there are any technical obstacles in the path of making such an order. First of all, the court's attention has been drawn to R. v. Frith (1) decided in the Court of Criminal Appeal on Oct. 11, 1965, where, in circumstances virtually identical with the present case, LORD PARKER, C.J., when giving the judgment of the court said: E

"The court has been asked notwithstanding to hear evidence now to the effect that at any rate since August this man has qualified for a hospital order. There is no evidence that at the time of the trial any hospital order could have been made. In those circumstances this court has refused to hear the further evidence, and that being the only point, the appeal is dismissed." F

The view taken there evidently was that further medical evidence called before this court would not justify the making of a hospital order; but, in our judgment, the difficulty then presented has been removed by the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, 1967. Section 4 (3) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, under which R. v. Frith (1) was decided, provided: G

"On an appeal against sentence the Court of Criminal Appeal shall, if they think that a different sentence should have been passed, quash the sentence passed at the trial, and pass such other sentence warranted in law by the verdict (whether more or less severe) in substitution therefor as they think ought to have been passed, and in any other case shall dismiss the appeal." H

No doubt the view was taken that since it could not be said that the court below ought to have made a hospital order without evidence that the Court of Criminal Appeal could not do so either. Happily there has now been a relaxation on this point by s. 97 (7) of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, which provides that: I

"On an appeal against sentence under this section or s. 3 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1907, the Court of Appeal, if it considers that the appellant should be sentenced differently for any offence for which he was dealt with by the court below, may—(a) quash any sentence or order which is the

- A subject of the appeal; and (b) in place of it pass such sentence or make such order as it thinks appropriate for the case and as the court below had power to pass or make when dealing with him for the offence . . .”

In our judgment, those new words permit us to hear the evidence of Dr. Neustatter and Dr. Schildt and to act on it, notwithstanding that there was no evidence before the court of trial on which a hospital order could be made.

- B Finally, it is necessary to consider whether the order which we now wish to make is in any way prohibited by the terms of the Criminal Appeal Act 1966 by virtue of which, as is well known, this court cannot when substituting a sentence impose a sentence of greater severity than that which was imposed in the court below. In our judgment, a hospital order, which is a remedial order designed to treat and cure the appellant, cannot be regarded as more severe than a sentence of imprisonment, even though in certain events the hospital order may involve the detention of the appellant for a longer period of time.

- C We are accordingly satisfied that no technical obstacle lies in our path and we are happy to allow this appeal, to quash the sentence of three years' imprisonment and to substitute a hospital order under s. 60 of the Mental Health Act, 1959, with a restriction under s. 65 for an indefinite period, coupled with a direction that he be returned to Broadmoor.

Interlocutory Appeal.

This was an appeal by the defendant, George Shand Davidson, from a ruling that the burden of proof in the action lay on him, and that he should therefore begin, given by His Honour JUDGE LAWSON CAMPBELL, at Colchester County Court on Mar. 26, 1968. The action was brought by the plaintiff, Doris Ellen Seldon, for repayment of £1,550, receipt of which the defendant admitted. The facts are set out in the judgment of WILLMER, L.J. E

R. A. W. Sears for the defendant.

C. W. S. Lubbock for the plaintiff. F

WILLMER, L.J.: The defendant was employed as chauffeur and handyman by the plaintiff. In or about February or March, 1966, he was desirous of purchasing a house. For that purpose the plaintiff paid to him by way of two cheques, drawn respectively on Feb. 16 and Mar. 16, 1966, a sum of money amounting to £1,550. With the aid of that, we are informed, the defendant in fact bought the house. Later the parties appear to have fallen out, and the defendant was dismissed from his employment. In those circumstances the plaintiff sought to get back the money which she had paid to the defendant. On the money not being forthcoming, a specially endorsed writ was issued in the High Court. Appearance was entered but no defence was delivered, and in due course the plaintiff recovered judgment in default of defence. It appeared, however, that the absence of defence was due to some mistake on the part of the solicitor. Application was therefore made to set aside the judgment obtained by default, and an order in those terms was obtained. By agreement between the parties the action was remitted to the Colchester county court. In due course a defence was delivered, and subsequently amended. In its amended form it admitted the receipt of the two sums of money amounting to £1,550, but alleged that the payments made by the plaintiff were intended as a gift. Alternatively it was alleged that, if the payments were intended as a loan, then the loan was not repayable at the date of the issue of the writ. G

On those pleadings the case went to trial, and on Mar. 26, 1968, it was duly called on. At that point a submission was put before the judge by counsel for the plaintiff that, having regard to the admission of the receipt of these two cheques, the legal burden was on the defendant to prove one or other of the defences, that is either that there was a gift or, if a loan, it was not repayable at H

A the date of the issue of the writ. The judge ruled in favour of that submission. Application was then made by counsel for the defendant to adjourn the trial of the case in order that that ruling might be tested in this court. The matter, therefore, is sought to be brought before this court as a preliminary point.

Now that the case has reached this court, we are faced with a further preliminary point in objection to the appeal. It is said that there is no right of appeal against a ruling made in such circumstances as these. We have been referred in that connexion to s. 108 of the County Courts Act, 1959, the material part of which provides as follows:

C "Subject to the following provisions of this Part of this Act, if any party to any proceedings in a county court is dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the judge in point of law or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction, decision or order of the judge may appeal therefrom to the Court of Appeal ..."

It is said that, this being a mere ruling in the course of the trial, the matter does not come within any of the words used in that section, and consequently no appeal lies.

D I find that a question of some difficulty. There is considerable substance in the objection, but I do not propose to express any concluded opinion thereon. I am prepared to assume for the purpose of argument that an appeal against such a ruling does lie. I am happy to make that assumption because I am by no means satisfied that, if an appeal does lie, it is one which is entitled to succeed.

E In other words, I am not prepared to say that the learned judge gave a wrong ruling when he decided, as he did, that it was for the defendant to begin, the burden of proof being on him to make good the assertion put forward in his defence.

The way I look at it is this. Payment of the money having been admitted, prima facie that payment imported an obligation to repay in the absence of any circumstances tending to show anything in the nature of a presumption of advancement. This is not a case of father and child, or husband and wife, or any other such blood relationship which could have given rise to a presumption of advancement. Counsel for the defendant who has argued the case in support of the appeal, was constrained to admit that the house, which had been bought with the aid of the money paid by the plaintiff, is no doubt prima facie subject to a resulting trust in favour of the plaintiff. That being so, it would be strange indeed if the same considerations did not apply to the money paid by the plaintiff to the defendant to assist him in the purchase of the house.

There is very scanty authority on this subject. The researches of counsel took us back to the year 1801, and we were referred to Cary v. Gerrish (1). That was a case which no doubt bore a certain similarity to the present case, but it is, I think, distinguishable on the grounds which appear from the judgment of LORD KENYON. When this question was discussed before him, he said (2):

"No evidence is offered of the circumstances under which the draft was given; it might be in payment of a debt due by the testator, or the defendant might have given cash for it at the time."

I No such considerations arise in the present case; indeed, they are clearly ruled out because we have from the defendant in this case a clear admission of the payment of the money, and no suggestion that it was paid in settlement of an existing debt, or that it was given in return for cash, or anything of that sort. In the absence of any such circumstances, money paid by the plaintiff in circumstances such as these is prima facie repayable on demand. If the defendant seeks to evade repayment of the money which was paid to him, it seems to me that

(1) (1801), 4 Esp. 9.

(2) (1801), 4 Esp. at p. 10.

the learned judge was right in placing the onus on him to prove the facts which he alleges show that the money was not repayable. A

In those circumstances, even assuming that there is a right of appeal to this court on a ruling such as was given in this case, I am not prepared to say that the judge gave a wrong ruling, and I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: As to the first point, namely, whether an appeal is maintainable before this court in the present circumstances, I share the considerable doubts expressed by my lord whether this matter is properly before us. Counsel for the defendant concedes that he finds great difficulty in even attempting to persuade us that the judge's ruling that it was for the defence to begin was a "direction" within the meaning of s. 108 of the County Courts Act, 1959; but he says, so I understand, that he can bring himself within the later words of that same section where reference is made to "the party aggrieved by the judgment, direction or decision or order of the judge", counsel submitting that the judge here, by the action that he took, made an interlocutory order. He submits that, there being power to come before this court in respect of interlocutory orders, this appeal properly lies. B C

Like WILLMER, L.J., I do not propose to express a final view on that submission. But, if it be right that whenever a judge makes a ruling in a county court matter, the party against whom that ruling is given may, in effect, say: "I do not want this county court hearing to proceed any further; I want to go to the High Court to get the ruling tested" and, on such an application being made, the county court judge adjourned the case, it may well be that a chaotic state of affairs would arise. As at present advised (but refraining from committing myself finally) I do not take the view that there was any "order" made by the county court judge in the present case save an order at the request of the defence that the trial should stand adjourned. D E

Leaving that matter in that somewhat inconclusive way, I propose to turn to the real gist of this appeal, for it would be regrettable, the parties being here, that they should go away empty-handed. F

Since the advancement of loans and the making of gifts have been common transactions amongst mankind for many centuries, there is a remarkable paucity of authorities as to on whom the burden lies of distinguishing the one type of transaction from the other. CHITTY ON CONTRACTS (3) and other standard works have been referred to, and from them have been culled two decisions. I propose to refer to both. They are old cases; they are none the worse for that, of course, but they are extremely briefly reported, and the extent to which they throw light on the circumstances of the present case is, with all respect, doubtful. G The important fact in the present case is that there is no blood relationship of any kind between the plaintiff and defendant. It appears that in 1966 the defendant (who for some years was employed by the plaintiff) was minded to buy a house. But he lacked the wherewithal to do so, and, as the pleadings disclose, in February and March, 1966, the plaintiff accordingly advanced to the defendant two sums of money amounting to £1,550. This money he utilised in order to purchase a house that he desired to secure for himself and his wife. There being no blood relationship, no husband-and-wife, no father-and-child, no adoptive-parent and adopted-child relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant, counsel for the defendant was forced to concede that in those circumstances, which accordingly gave rise to no presumption of advancement, the house must prima facie be regarded as being held by the defendant by way of a resulting trust for the benefit of the plaintiff. But, although that is conceded, it is nevertheless said that it is for the plaintiff to prove that the money was advanced by way of a loan and not as a gift. H I

A In the case referred to by counsel for the defendant, Cary v. Gerrish (4), LORD KENYON observed:

“There is no evidence to establish a debt. No evidence is offered of the circumstances under which the draft was given; it might be in payment of a debt due by the testator; or the defendant might have given cash for it at the time.”

B None of those possibilities arise in the present case. It is clear, from the assertion contained in the defence, that the advancements were made by way of gift, that no question here arises of the plaintiff repaying by the advancements a debt which she owed to her employee, nor is there any question of the defendant having given cash in return for the cheques drawn by the plaintiff. Again, if one turns to the only other case cited in CHITTY ON CONTRACTS (22nd Edn., Vol. 2, p. 413) Welch v. Seaborn (5), the facts are quite distinguishable. There the assignees of a bankrupt, in order to establish the petitioning creditor's debt, proved that a sum of money had been paid over; and LORD ELLENBOROUGH, whose judgment is reported in a mere 3½ lines, is said to have been

D “of the opinion there was not sufficient evidence to leave it to the jury whether this money had been advanced . . . by way of loan, since the presumption of law was that money when paid is paid in liquidation of an antecedent debt.”

Again, the state of the pleadings in the present case rules out any such presumption here.

E Accordingly, one is really driven back to consider this matter without the assistance of authority; and, being so unassisted, I ask myself what is to be inferred as to the nature of the transaction when the simple payment of money is proved or admitted between strangers. I entirely agree with WILLMER, L.J., that on that bald state of affairs, proof of payment imports a prima facie obligation to repay the money in the absence of circumstances from which a presumption of advancement can or may arise.

F WILLMER, L.J., has expressed the view that the loan would be repayable on demand. I would say, if not repayable on demand, at least repayable within a reasonable time of a request for repayment; and, of course, if it be the case that mere loans were made, and later on the borrower repudiates the loans and asserts that the advancements were by way of out-and-out gifts, that repudiation of the true nature of the transaction would upon any view render the loans immediately repayable.

G Accordingly, assuming that this court has jurisdiction to hear this appeal, I have come to the conclusion that the ruling of the judge below was perfectly right, and that this trial should proceed on the basis that it is for the defendant to establish that which he asserts, namely, that he received the two sums of money from the plaintiff was by way of a gift.

H I would therefore dismiss this appeal.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Megarry, J.), May 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 1968.]

*Practice—Trial—Lists—Witness list—Estimate of expected duration—Revision of estimate in the light of supervening circumstances—Chancery Division.Action.

This action was set down for trial and entered in Part 1 of the witness list. The duration of the trial was estimated at between two and three days. After the hearing had lasted four days a settlement was reached. After the settlement was agreed and HIS LORDSHIP (MEGARRY, J.) had made an order staying all further proceedings except for the purpose of carrying the terms into effect, he referred to the estimate of expected duration of the trial, intimating that it seemed to have been a substantial under-estimate. There had been no communication with any official of the court that the estimate which was given some while before the case was tried and at a time when the bundle of documents had not yet been agreed, was likely to prove an under-estimate. Moreover counsel who signed the certificate had not at that time seen any of the witnesses, one of whom at any rate, the plaintiff, was not able to speak English fluently.

MEGARRY, J., intimated that estimates were essentially for the counsel concerned to discuss between themselves, that if either side knew of any element that might extend the hearing, there was a duty to disclose it to the other side, and that if there were, as in the present case, a witness (or perhaps witnesses) whose command of English was rather less than perfect that was a consideration that should be disclosed to the other side. [HIS LORDSHIP continued:] In this case the estimate made by junior counsel on each side then engaged in the case was made apparently some while before the hearing commenced. The estimate put in did not in fact bear any date, as it should have done. The estimate was for two to three days. The hearing in this case has so far taken some four days, although part of that time was occupied by judgment being delivered in another case. At all events, well over three full days have been devoted to this case. In that time the case has been opened, the evidence of two witnesses taken on commission has been read, but apart from that no witness called by the plaintiff has yet completed his evidence, and the plaintiff himself is still under cross-examination.

Paragraph 5 of a Practice Direction in 1954 (1) relating to the witness list, reads as follows:

“If circumstances affecting the probable length of a case appearing in the list arise, notice of the fact, and, where appropriate, a revised estimate of the length of the hearing, must be given promptly to the cause clerk, who will note it and transmit it to the clerk of the judge in charge of the list.”

In a further Practice Direction, given in 1966 (2), it is directed:

“If a case is settled, or if circumstances affecting its probable length arise, notice of the fact, and, where appropriate, a revised estimate in writing of the length of the hearing, must be left promptly with the cause clerk (room 136), who will note it and transmit it to the clerk to the judge in charge of the list.”

I should make it plain that I regard it as the primary responsibility of junior counsel to make this estimate, for they are in the best position to judge, or ought to be able to put themselves in that position. Where leading counsel are briefed in a case, as they were in this, they must share that responsibility. The briefing of leading counsel, too, may well be one of the circumstances affecting the probable length of a case within the Practice Direction (2) and so require a reconsideration of any estimate already made.

- A In the present case there has been a woeful under-estimate of the duration of the case, and this under-estimate was never revised. Such under-estimates make the task of regulating the list far more difficult, and in particular they are liable to cause hardship to other litigants and witnesses, their solicitors and their counsel, by making it impossible to provide a judge on the date fixed for the trial. Nobody who has practised for any time at the Bar can fail to appreciate the
- B great difficulty of estimating the duration of a case, and I certainly do not; but I cannot refrain from saying that in this case the estimate of two to three days seems to me to be one which, at the outset of the trial, it was quite impossible to justify as being realistic, even making the most generous allowances for the difficulties inherent in all prophecies, and discounting to the full the advantages of hindsight.
- C I say no more about this particular case, but I have said what I have said in the hope that it will be appreciated by counsel practising in this Division that an estimate of the length of a witness action is not something to be made and then forgotten, but is a continuing representation which may easily become falsified by supervening events. And, I may add, it is not only in the field of vendor and purchaser, where there is With v. O'Flanagan (3) to remind us, that
- D there is a duty to correct a representation if, though true when made, it later becomes untrue.

In examination-in-chief of a defence witness as to the reputation for veracity of the principal prosecution witness, the former was asked whether he would believe her on oath and answered that "in certain particulars she could be believed on her oath". The trial judge intervened to stop further answer, the defence witness merely adding "but . . .". No further question was permitted to be put in this respect. On appeal against conviction, it was accepted that defending counsel would have put the further question whether, from personal knowledge of the prosecution witness, the defence witness would believe her on her oath. The expected reply to this would

Appeals and applications.

These were appeals and applications for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence. The appellant Albert John Longman and the appellant Charles William Richardson were convicted at the Central Criminal Court on July 20, 1967, before O'CONNOR, J., and a jury of two counts of conspiracy to pervert the course of public justice. The appellant Longman was sentenced to eight and six years' imprisonment concurrent, the appellant Richardson to twelve and eight years' imprisonment concurrent. The following statement of facts is summarised from the judgment of the court.

Between June 28 and July 27, 1966, there was a trial at the Central Criminal Court which arose out of an affray on Mar. 8, 1966, at a club in Catford, in the course of which there were many seriously injured and one man was killed. Among those being tried for taking part in that affray was Edward Richardson, the brother of the appellant Richardson. The appellants were known to each other. The case for the Crown was that the appellants, with others, conspired together to pervert the course of public justice: they were charged on count 1 with trying to influence the jury, and on count 2 with suborning witnesses at that trial. The evidence on the existence of those conspiracies depended for all practical purposes entirely on the testimony of a Mrs. Clemence whose evidence conflicted with that of the appellants.

Serving on the jury at the affray trial was Mr. Charles North. On July 1, 1966, he was visited by two unknown men, seeking to tamper with him in the discharge of his duties as a juror. Mr. North reported the visits to the police. On July 13, 1966, a bottle containing a threatening note was thrown through one

A of his windows. Two other jurors testified that they had also received telephone calls from strangers while they were acting as jurors.

In evidence, Mrs. Clemence said that, in September, 1964, the appellant Longman had arrived at her flat telling her that he had been told by the appellant Richardson to look after her and her flat. By November, 1964, they were living together as man and wife; and, except for a period between August, 1965, and

B February, 1966, they continued to do so until July, 1966.

The particulars of the charge laid in count 1, which related to the period between June 28 and July 28, 1966, were that the appellants had conspired with others to attempt to influence the jury in trying Edward Richardson at the Central Criminal Court. Mrs. Clemence testified that, during the week beginning

C with July 11, 1966, the appellant Longman visited the Central Criminal Court, according to him, each day, saying to her that he was going there to look at the jurors' faces and try to find out where one of them lived; and that he also told her that the appellant Richardson wanted a new trial. She gave evidence of three visits which she had paid with the appellant Longman to the appellant Richardson's house, the last being on July 16, 1966, the other two probably being on July 13 and 14, 1966. She said that, on the first visit, they picked up a

D man at a public house who followed them in his car to the appellant Richardson's house. On the way the appellant Longman told her that the man they had picked up had just done ten years for safe blowing. She stayed in the car outside the appellant Richardson's house but later went in, quite shortly after which the man they had picked up left. She then saw the appellant Richardson read out from a list the names of the jurors to the appellant Longman, telling him to

E find their names in the telephone books and to ring up the names until he was sure that he had got the right one. She remembered three of the names which she had heard, one of them being North. Mrs. Clemence asserted that, during this visit, she heard the appellant Longman explain to the appellant Richardson that he planned to follow one of the jurors from the Central Criminal Court to his home. She said that the following evening the appellant Longman again drove

F her to the appellant Richardson's house where once more she remained outside. Later, she saw the appellant Richardson and a man named James Fraser leave the house. The appellant Longman took her to a public house, after which they went back to the appellant Richardson's house. She asserted that the appellant Longman told her that the appellant Richardson had thrown a bottle through a juror's window and threatened her to say nothing about it, or of Fraser and the

G appellant Richardson leaving the house that night. On July 16, 1966, she said that when she and the appellant Longman arrived at the appellant Richardson's house, she again remained outside in the car. Whilst she was there, she saw the man that they had picked up in the public house on the first visit arriving with another man in a car. She said that she became terrified that she was going to be hurt and that she went to a telephone box and telephoned New Scotland

H Yard. That telephone call was confirmed by the police. While she was telephoning, the appellant Longman drove up and she cut short her conversation telling him that she had been speaking to her father. She did not see the appellant Richardson, nor, after that day, did she see either of the appellants. She further said that, during that week, the appellant Longman told her that he was a professional frightener.

I Other evidence tendered in support of the allegations of conspiracy consisted of documents found at one or another of the appellant Richardson's premises and they all related to some part of the affray trial. There was a cigarette packet which had the name of North written on it in the appellant Richardson's handwriting, others were about North and certain police officers being in a conspiracy, and another was a document with the name "Sutters" on it, that being the name of the foreman of the affray jury.

The second count was laid between Mar. 8 and July 18, 1966. It alleged a conspiracy to pervert justice by suborning Crown witnesses on the trial of Edward Richardson for making an affray. The evidence as to that was again that of Mrs. Clemence, who said that, while the appellants were talking during the first visit to the appellant Richardson's house, she heard him say that he was very pleased about the way a girl had given her evidence and asked the appellant Longman if he had looked after her. The appellant Longman replied that they had given her the money and seen her off to Manchester. A document in support of that testimony was tendered. It was in the appellant Richardson's handwriting and contained an entry "Longman 50 Manchester". The appellant Richardson said in evidence that that related simply to £50 which he had lent to the appellant Longman who wanted to go to Manchester.

Mrs. Clemence was strongly attacked, not only as an unreliable witness in the ordinary sense but as a person suffering from hallucinations. It was said that she had spells of drunkenness when her imagination ran riot and she entertained entirely groundless fears. She was said to be a prostitute and a deliberate perjurer, and her whole history and background, as well as her relationship with the appellant Longman was investigated. She maintained that she was terrified of the appellant Longman, that she did not want him at her flat, had no affection for him and had repeatedly tried to get away from him. The appellant Longman said that she was happy with him and even wanted him to marry her.

Apart from the appellant Longman accepting that he went on three occasions with Mrs. Clemence to the appellant Richardson's house, the appellant denied all of Mrs. Clemence's evidence. The appellant Richardson gave an explanation of the document with the name "Sutters" on it, his photograph and name having appeared, it seemed, in a newspaper after the affray trial. To support their case and to discredit Mrs. Clemence, a Mrs. Davies was called to say that Mrs. Clemence appeared to be perfectly happy with the appellant Longman; and a Dr. Hitchens was called to testify concerning Mrs. Clemence's reputation for veracity (see p. 765, letters B to F, post).

EDMUND DAVIES, L.J., having stated the nature of the appeals and reviewed the facts and the evidence, continued:] The principal ground relied on by both appellants involves a point of pure law and it is, therefore, one on which they are entitled to appeal as of right, and, in respect of this and other points of law to be mentioned, we treat this as the hearing of the appeals based on them. It arises from what transpired at the trial when counsel for the appellant Longman sought to discredit the vital evidence of Mrs. Clemence by calling a witness to establish that her testimony could not be relied on. The method resorted to for this purpose, although little known, has considerable antiquity in the law. It was considered in detail by LORD GODDARD, C.J., in R. v. Gunewardene (1), which in this respect was unaffected by, and indeed approved, in Toohy v. Metropolitan Police Comr. (2). The legal position may be thus summarised:—

1. A witness may be asked whether he has knowledge of the impugned witness's general reputation for veracity and whether (from such knowledge) he would believe the impugned witness's sworn testimony.
2. The witness called to impeach the credibility of a previous witness may also express his individual opinion (based on his personal knowledge) whether the latter is to be believed on his oath and is not confined to giving evidence merely of general reputation.
3. Whether, however, his opinion as to the impugned witness's credibility be based simply on the latter's general reputation for veracity or on his personal knowledge, the witness cannot be permitted to indicate during his examination-in-chief the

A particular facts, circumstances or incidents which formed the basis of his opinion, although he may be cross-examined as to them.

This method of attacking a witness's veracity, though ancient, is used with exceeding rarity. Nevertheless, it was sought to be made use of in the present case by junior counsel who appeared for the appellant Longman. He called a Dr. Hitchens, a geologist, who occupied with his wife a flat immediately above

B that of Mrs. Clemence, and the material part of the transcript reads in this away:

"Q. Are you aware, doctor, of her reputation for veracity? A. In a general way, yes. Q. Would you believe that lady on her oath? (O'CONNOR, J.) Now think carefully before you answer that question. You are on your oath. Do you understand the question which counsel had put to you?

C A. I do indeed, my lord. Q. Yes? A. I would say that in certain particulars she could be believed on her oath. (O'CONNOR, J.) Yes, that is enough.

A. But—— (O'CONNOR, J.) No that is enough. (Counsel) With your lordship's permission—— (O'CONNOR, J.) Certainly not. You have got your answer from the witness. (Counsel) The witness has said that certain conditions might be applied to her oath. (O'CONNOR, J.) You are not allowed to enquire into conditions. I have ruled on it and I am not going to permit it.

D (Counsel) In my respectful submission, the witness should be permitted by your lordship to finish the answer to the question which he has given.

[Then the learned judge intervened] He has answered that question. You cannot put it again. (Counsel) My lord, with respect—— (O'CONNOR, J.)

E He has given you your answer, and I am not going to permit you to put it again. (Counsel) Would your lordship forgive me? (O'CONNOR, J.) That is the question framed in a different way, from a different case. It is only an example of a writer of a text-book giving examples of this anomaly in our law. (Counsel) My lord, I am bound to say that on my understanding of the two questions set out in ARCHBOLD (3), para. 1350, there is difference in substance between those two questions. (O'CONNOR, J.) I have ruled against you on this."

F We have thought it right out of respect for junior counsel and for the submission based on it to quote the entirety of the passage in the transcript which relates to this particular matter. Dealing with Dr. Hitchens' evidence in the course of his summing-up, the trial judge said:

G "The law permits a defendant to call a witness to come and say, if he is prepared to do so, 'I would not believe that witness on her oath'. Full stop.

And I assure you it was in no way derogatory to Dr. Hitchens that I asked him whether he had any religion before he was sworn. I wanted to make sure, if he was going to give that piece of evidence—because there was no other purpose to call him, there was nothing more that he could say—that you should appreciate just where we stood on it, and that he should appreciate

H it; what he was saying, if he was going to say, 'I don't believe that person on oath.' When it came to the crunch, of course, he didn't say it.

Perhaps it came as no surprise to you."

The criticism based on these passages is of two kinds and we deal with them in turn. First, it is said that, while junior counsel was permitted to ask Dr. Hitchens whether, in the light of Mrs. Clemence's general reputation for veracity,

I he would be prepared to believe her on her oath, the question was never allowed to be answered in its entirety. It is submitted that the form of such answer as

Dr. Hitchens gave showed that he desired to qualify it in some way and was prevented by the judge from uttering more than the single qualifying word,

"But——." It is clear from the transcript that junior counsel also desired to ask another question of Dr. Hitchens, and we were told (and we accept) that it would have been in this form: "From your personal knowledge of Mrs.

Clemence would you believe her on her oath? " That question, in our judgment, he should have been permitted to put, but we have some sympathy with the trial judge suddenly confronted as he was with a situation which so rarely arises that not one of their lordships who decided Toohy's case (4) had throughout their extensive careers ever experienced it. Nevertheless, we are obliged to rule that the trial judge was technically wrong in ruling out that further question. Whether he was also wrong in cutting short Dr. Hitchens' attempt to qualify his earlier answer is far less clear; for it looks very much as though the witness was proceeding to adduce his reasons for qualifying it, and we know of no authority which permits that to be done. In any event, however, granted some degree of technical irregularity, the ultimate question must be whether it appears that a miscarriage of justice resulted or whether this is a case for applying the proviso to s. 4 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. To enable this court to decide that point, we inquired of leading counsel for the appellant Longman what was the most that junior counsel hoped to elicit from Dr. Hitchens had he not been checked by the trial judge. With the candour one would expect, leading counsel told the court that junior counsel hoped to obtain from Dr. Hitchens evidence establishing the following passage in his proof (and I quote it verbatim):

" If she [Mrs' Clemence] were under pressure or frightened or bore some hostility towards someone, she would be capable of telling lies on oath. I would not say she would always be, and in my opinion it would depend on the circumstances."

This court entertains the strongest doubt that, in the light of the existing authorities, Dr. Hitchens could have been permitted to say any such thing. It seems tantamount to giving reasons why at times he would not believe Mrs. Clemence even when on oath, and that would certainly be impermissible; but even if such an answer were strictly admissible, what possible help could the jury have derived therefrom? Did they need to be told that Mrs. Clemence, in common with a myriad other people, might be tempted to stray from the path of strict veracity if she walked in terror or suffered from feelings of hostility! The material question for them (as for any jury in any case) was whether the particular witness could in the proved circumstances be regarded as reliable, and as to this the hoped-for answer from Dr. Hitchens would afford no guide whatsoever. Accordingly, if irregularity there was, we have no hesitation in holding that no miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom and applying the proviso thereto.

It is secondly complained that, in the passage from the summing-up which we have quoted, the trial judge did not accurately represent the answer which Dr. Hitchens in fact gave and made no reference to the qualifications which he desired to make. As far as it went, we think that the summing-up was correct, for it was the truth that Dr. Hitchens had not unqualifiedly said: "I don't believe Mrs. Clemence on oath". The jury had heard all that had transpired, and we have already expressed our doubts that junior counsel was entitled to pursue the matter any further than he did. Even were he entitled to do so, however, and had elicited from Dr. Hitchens the aforementioned material, and assuming that the effect thereof had been duly dealt with in the summing-up, we cannot conceive that it could have made any possible difference to the outcome of the trial. In this respect also, if it be necessary, we do not hesitate to hold that no miscarriage of justice resulted and that the proviso should be applied to cure any possible technical irregularity. [His LORDSHIP then referred to other grounds of appeal on behalf of the appellant Longman, said that the court found them ill-founded and refused the application for leave to appeal founded thereon and continued:] Furthermore, for the reasons already given, the appeal by the appellant Longman based on points of law against his conviction on both counts is dismissed.

A We turn to the case of the appellant Richardson. We have already said all that we desire to say regarding the point of law as to the evidence of Dr. Hitchens as to which this appellant also is entitled to appeal as of right, which appeal we now have heard. Counsel for the appellant Richardson's next submission, involving as it does a point of law, entitled the appellant Richardson to appeal, and again that appeal we have heard. It has reference to the direction of the learned judge on the relevance of evidence relating directly not to the appellant Richardson but to the appellant Longman's previous bad character. The defence, having attacked the character of Mrs. Clemence, it was obvious that the appellant Longman would in due course be cross-examined as to his previous criminal record, and to anticipate this his counsel brought out his record in examination-in-chief. The judge's direction on the relevance of evidence of bad character was in these terms:

"As far as Longman is concerned, you have heard that he has got a long and painful criminal record for dishonesty and violence. You have heard that Mrs. Clemence has been before the court a long time ago. Only make use of that as far as Longman is concerned in helping you to make up your minds as to whether you can believe what he has to say. The mere fact that he has been guilty of crimes over a long period of time, however serious, is not evidence that he is guilty of this one. Just bear it in mind as one of the factors as to whether you think he may have been telling you the truth. Bear in mind at all times that it is not for him to prove anything. It is for the prosecution to make sure before you can convict."

E Subsequently this passage is to be found:

"Do not hold it against Longman, save when it comes to considering whether you can believe him, that he had got a long criminal record."

Then the learned judge proceeded to deal with Mrs. Clemence. Counsel for the appellant Richardson accepts that, when evidence is properly given as to the good character of the accused, this evidence goes to credibility and that the jury should be instructed that they may treat a proved good character as an indication that the witness is likely to be truthful; see R. v. Bellis (5). Counsel denies, however, that the converse applies to evidence of bad character and complains that the judge was wrong in telling the jury that they could make use of the appellant Longman's bad character "in helping you to make up your minds as to whether you can believe what he has to say".

G The basis of this submission is that evidence of the accused's bad character is admissible only in particular circumstances and can be used only in relation to the situation which rendered it admissible. Thus, so it is submitted, if the accused's character is let in under proviso (f) (ii) to s. 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, by reason of the accused calling evidence of good character, it is contended by counsel for the appellant Richardson that evidence of bad character can do no more than rebut or cancel out the effect of the evidence of good character and that the jury must be instructed not to be influenced by the evidence of bad character in general assessment of the accused's credibility. We do not think that this is the general practice, and we have the gravest doubts whether a jury could be expected to understand such a direction, which verges on the metaphysical. There is nothing in the statute to suggest that the use of evidence of bad character should be restricted in this way but counsel says that this follows from certain pre-1898 authorities, notably R. v. Rowton (6). That case decided that, if the accused called evidence of good character, the Crown could adduce evidence of bad character by way of rebuttal, and much stress has been laid on the frequent references in the report to the fact that the Crown evidence is called to "rebut" that relied on by the accused. We get no assistance, however, from this, because evidence of the prisoner's character could not in those days have gone to his credibility, since he was not a competent witness. Further, we see no reason to attach specific significance to the word "rebut" in this context, since it was the obvious word to describe a procedure which all would recognise is that of calling evidence in rebuttal. The weakness of counsel's argument is disclosed by further reference to s. 1 of the Act of 1898, under which there are many instances of bad character being admissible when there has been no previous evidence of good character to rebut; for example, when the accused has made an attack on the character of a witness for the prosecution. Counsel seeks to argue by parity of reasoning and to say that, in this case, the evidence of bad character can be used only to neutralise the attack on the prosecution witness, and he seeks to support this by reference to the direction to the jury in R. v. Cook (7), set out in a footnote in CROSS ON EVIDENCE (3rd Edn.) at p. 355, which direction was approved of by the Court of Criminal Appeal (7). We have studied the direction in R. v. Cook (7) and do not think that it was so restricted or that any jury could have been expected so to regard it.

In our view, evidence of character, when properly admitted, goes to the credibility of the witness concerned, whether the evidence discloses good character or bad character. If the accused calls evidence of good character and is shown by cross-examination to have a bad character, the jury may give this fact such weight as they think fit when assessing the general credibility of the accused. They cannot be expected to execute the metaphysical feat of treating the evidence as relevant to credibility on one issue but irrelevant on another, and they are not required to do so. No fault, can, therefore, be found in the direction in this case as to the manner in which they should deal with the evidence of the appellant Longman's previous convictions.

The only other point pursued before us on the appellant Richardson's behalf does not involve a point of law and is treated accordingly as an application. It was that, insofar as the judge put his defence before the jury at all, he did so by (as it were) inserting it by fragments into the interstices of the Crown case as he reviewed it. We do not think that this was so. There are two broadly different types of summing-up. The first is to proceed solidly and stolidly through the Crown case before touching on the defence. When this is adopted, the familiar criticism is that the jury was denied proper assistance in contrasting the conflicting versions. The second type is, when dealing with the allegations of the prosecution, to remind the jury there and then of the answer put forward by the accused so that they can have the contrasting versions of each incident brought to their attention before proceeding to the next stage, and many consider that the more helpful method. Be that as it may, it was the one here adopted and, as we think, fairly adopted.

None of the grounds submitted on the appellant Richardson's behalf is, in our judgment, sound. Accordingly, in his case (as in that of the appellant Longman), his appeal on the points of law involved is dismissed and his application for leave to appeal on other grounds is refused. [His LORDSHIP considered the applications of both the appellants for leave to appeal against their sentences, refused the application of Richardson, granted the application of Longman, treated it as the hearing of the appeal and substituted concurrent terms of five years' imprisonment on each count.]

A MANN AND ANOTHER v. GOLDSTEIN AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Ungoed-Thomas, J.), November 1, 3, 7, 15, 1967.]

Company—Winding-up—Compulsory winding-up—Creditor's application—Disputed debt—Existence of debt disputed—Company unable to meet its debts as they fell due—Petitions presented by alleged creditors of two companies—Injunctions sought to restrain prosecution of petitions—Debts disputed on substantial grounds—Whether prosecution of petitions an abuse of process of the court—Whether injunctions should be granted.

The shares in each of two companies, J., Ltd. and C., Ltd., were held equally by the plaintiffs and by the first defendant and his wife. Each company was insolvent in the sense that it was unable to pay its debts as they fell due. The first defendant presented a winding-up petition against J., Ltd., based on an alleged debt for director's fees. The debt was contested on the ground of the first defendant's drawings from J., Ltd. without deduction for income tax. There was no authority for the drawings other than the voting of the director's fees. Thus there was a substantial defence to the alleged debt, which would require investigation before the debt was established. W., Ltd., the second defendant, presented a winding-up petition against C., Ltd., based on an alleged debt of £347 for goods supplied. C., Ltd. and M., Ltd., which latter company had been sold to the first defendant, used the same premises. There appeared to have been confusion whether goods ordered from W., Ltd. were supplied to C., Ltd. or M., Ltd. Thus there was again a substantial defence to the alleged debt, which required investigation. There was evidence that a winding-up petition would injure the goodwill of each company. In an action to restrain the prosecution of the winding-up petitions,

Held: the existence of the debt on which each winding-up petition was founded was disputed on grounds showing a substantial defence requiring investigation the petitioner did not establish that he was a creditor and thus had the locus standi to present the petition and the companies court was not the appropriate court to decide the dispute; accordingly, the presentation of the petitions was an abuse of the process of the court, and injunctions would be granted restraining, until trial or further order, the advertisement or prosecution of the winding-up petitions (see p. 776, letter I, and p. 778, letters C and F, post).

[Editorial Note. Where the dispute is as to the amount of indebtedness to a petitioning creditor, but not to the existence of any indebtedness at all to him, a dispute as to the precise amount owed (there being no dispute as to an amount sufficient to entitle the creditor to petition) will not provide a sufficient answer to a winding-up petition against an insolvent company (see Re Tweeds Garages, Ltd., [1962] 1 All E.R. 121, cited at p. 776, letter C, post).

Motion.

By writ issued on Oct. 20, 1967, the plaintiffs, Peter Mann and his wife Anita Mann, brought an action against the defendants Sidney Bernard Goldstein and Wallands Laboratories, Ltd., for injunctions to restrain the first defendant from prosecuting a winding-up petition against Joanita, Ltd. ("Joanita") and to restrain the defendant company from prosecuting a winding-up petition against Charmaine Coiffeur d'Art Ltd. ("Charmaine"). By notice of interlocutory motion dated Oct. 24, 1967, the plaintiffs sought an injunction against the first defendant that he might be restrained until the trial of the action or further order from advertising or taking any further steps in the prosecution of a winding-up petition against Joanita, and against the defendant company, that it might be restrained until the trial of the action or further order from advertising or taking any further steps in the prosecution of a winding-up petition against Charmaine. Both companies against which winding-up petitions had been presented were unable to pay their debts as they fell due, but the alleged indebtedness on which the winding-up petitions were founded was disputed. The facts relating to the petitioning creditors' alleged debts are set out in the judgment at p. 775, letter H, to p. 776, letter B, p. 776, letters F and H, and p. 777, letters A to I, post.

Cur. adv. vult. G

Nov. 15. UNGOED-THOMAS, J., read the following judgment: This is an action by Mr. Peter Mann and his wife, against Mr. Sidney Bernard Goldstein and Wallands Laboratories, Ltd. ("Wallands"). The notice of motion asks that the first defendant, Mr. Goldstein, might be restrained until trial of the action or further order from advertising or taking any further steps in the prosecution of a winding-up petition against Joanita, Ltd. ("Joanita"); and it also asks for an injunction in similar terms against the second defendant in respect of a petition against Charmaine Coiffeur d'Art, Ltd. ("Charmaine"). Leave was given to amend so as to join those two companies as defendants and enable the plaintiffs to sue, in a representative capacity, for shareholders in those companies, other than the defendant, Mr. Goldstein.

Each of the companies carries on a hairdressing business and the shares in each company are held equally between Mr. Mann on the one hand and Mr. Goldstein on the other hand, or between Mr. and Mrs. Mann on the one hand and Mr. and Mrs. Goldstein on the other hand. Mr. Mann managed the Joanita business in Pinner and Mr. Goldstein the Charmaine business in Haverstock Hill. Since July, there have been strained relations between Mr. Mann and Mr. Goldstein, apparently, partly because Mr. Mann thought that he did not have a fair deal over the sale of a subsidiary company of Charmaine called Charmaine Marguerite, Ltd. ("Marguerite") which was sold to Mr. Goldstein.

A It was also partly due to friction over Marguerite's business continuing to be conducted from the Charmaine premises at Haverstock Hill after that sale.

Proposals for one side to buy out the other in Charmaine and Joanita were made, but no agreement was reached, and in these circumstances Mr. Goldstein presented a creditor's winding-up petition to wind up Joanita—and I quote from the petition—"... for loans made to or monies left in the company, the present amount of such indebtedness being £1,869 16s. 3d." Wallands also presented a petition to wind up Charmaine as creditor for £340 for goods sold and delivered to Charmaine.

The hostility between Mr. Mann and Mr. Goldstein has become acute and there is, apparently, a deadlock between them over the conduct of the two companies, Joanita and Charmaine: but Mr. Goldstein's petition is not based on deadlock, nor has deadlock been relied on by either side in the submissions made to me. The plaintiffs claim that they are entitled to the injunctions mentioned in the notice of motion, on the grounds that (i) the defendants are not creditors at all of these companies; or, alternatively, (ii) that their debts are disputed on substantial grounds: (iii) that the petitions are not bona fide petitions but an abuse of the process of the court: and (iv) that the companies are solvent.

D Each of these grounds involves questions of fact and of law and it will be convenient to deal first with the law.

It is well established that this court has jurisdiction to restrain the presentation or advertising of a winding-up petition and restrain all further proceedings on it. That jurisdiction is a facet of the court's inherent jurisdiction to prevent an abuse of the process of the court. It will be exercised where a winding-up application is presented or prosecuted otherwise than in accordance with the legitimate purpose of such process (see, for example, Re A Company (1)).

The presentation of a petition is governed by statutory provision. Section 224 of the Companies Act, 1948, provides that an application to wind up a company shall be by petition presented, so far as material for present purposes "... by any creditor or creditors ...". The section seems to me plainly, on the face of it, exhaustive, so that a person not within its ambit cannot petition. This conclusion is in accordance with the note in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS (13th Edn.) 462, based on the observation of WYNN-PARRY, J., in Re H. L. Bolton Engineering Co., Ltd. (2). Of course, a person not named in s. 224 as a person entitled to present a winding-up petition, does not become so named because the company is insolvent. Therefore, so far as material to our case, if the defendants are not creditors they are not entitled to present or advertise their petitions or apply for a winding-up order; they have no locus standi, and their petitions are bound to fail even though the company be insolvent. So if a creditor's petition is not restrained by such an application as is now before me and comes before the companies court, that court will, in limine, before proceeding further, consider the petitioner's claim to be a creditor. As stated in BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS (13th Edn.), p. 451, in a passage quoted with approval by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Re Welsh Brick Industries, Ltd. (3):

"At one time petitions founded on disputed debt were directed to stand over till the debt was established by action. If, however, there was no reason to believe that the debt, if established, would not be paid, the petition was dismissed. The modern practice has been to dismiss such petitions. But, of course, if the debt is not disputed on some substantial ground, the court may decide it on the petition and make the order."

I What the companies court will not do is to proceed any further at all on a petition founded on a debt which is not thus shown in limine to exist, for in such a case there are not, of course, the necessary creditors required by s. 224 to apply for a winding-up order.

(3) [1964] 2 All E.R. 197 at p. 198.

The defendants, however, relied on the observation of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., in Niger Merchants Co. v. Capper (4), that "... where a company is insolvent, no doubt it is reasonable to wind up the company, even where the debt is disputed."

This statement, however, is tentatively phrased in an apparently unreserved judgment, unreported at the time, in the early period of the development of the jurisdiction, and, so far as I know, stands alone. Naturally judges have referred, with due regard to the facts of the particular cases before them, to a company's solvency or insolvency, as the case might be, as emphasising the desirability of the dismissal of an application to restrain winding-up proceedings or of granting an injunction to restrain such proceedings, as the case might be. There is no authority, however, so far as I have been able to ascertain, to support the suggestion that a company might be wound up on a creditor's petition where the company is insolvent, though the debt on which the petition is founded is disputed. It seems to me to be neither in accordance with the requirements of the Companies Act nor the practice recognised by LORD GREENE, M.R. (5), and I do not consider it justifiable to treat SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R.'s (6) observations as other than the incidental and tentative observation which it appears to me to be.

To enable the companies court to make the winding-up order itself, not only must the petitioner have been shown to be entitled to present the petition, but also one of the grounds specified in s. 222 of the Companies Act, 1948 (7) must be established: and the only such ground relied on in the petition and before me was that the company is unable to pay its debts. This requirement is additional to the pre-condition of presenting the petition, that the petitioner must be a creditor, and is not alternative to it. The insolvency requirement, however, unlike the creditor requirement, is only a pre-requisite of the order and not a pre-requisite of the presentation of the petition. So if a person is entitled to present a petition, then the company's inability to pay its debts is the very matter which it is appropriate for the companies court to enquire into and decide in the exercise of its jurisdiction to make a winding-up order.

I come now to the allegation of lack of bona fides and to abuse of process. It seems to me that to pursue a substantial claim in accordance with the procedure provided and in the normal manner, though with personal hostility or even venom and from some ulterior motive, such as the hope of compromise or some indirect advantage, is not an abuse of the process of the court or acting mala fide but acting bona fide in accordance with the process. Certainly no authority suggesting otherwise has been brought to my attention. In Re Welsh Brick Industries, Ltd. (5) LORD GREENE, M.R., treated a bona fide claim as being a claim based on some substantial ground, when he referred to "... considering whether or not the dispute is a bona fide dispute, or, putting it in another way, whether or not there is some substantial ground for defending the action."

So far as is material here, the winding-up process provides that the petition shall be presented by a creditor and that the winding-up order shall be on the ground that the company is unable to pay its debts. As SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., said in Cadiz Waterworks Co. v. Barnett (8), if the court

"... sees a petition to wind-up presented, not for a bona fide purpose of winding-up the company, but for some collateral and sinister object, on that ground it will be dismissed with costs."

A There the purpose of winding-up the company is treated as a bona fide purpose in contrast with some purpose other than the winding-up of the company.

What then is the course for this court to take (i) when the creditor's debt is clearly established; (ii) when it is clearly established that there is no debt; and (iii) when the debt is disputed on substantial grounds?

B (i) When the creditor's debt is clearly established it seems to me to follow that this court would not, in general at any rate, interfere even though the company would appear to be solvent, for the creditor would, as such, be entitled to present a petition and the debtor would have its own remedy in paying the undisputed debt which it should pay. So, to persist in non-payment of the debt in such circumstances would itself either suggest inability to pay or that the application was an application that the court should give the debtor relief which it itself could provide, but would not provide, by paying the debt. Further, the winding-up order on the ground of inability to pay debts would be the very matter which it would be for the companies court to decide after presentation of the petition: and validly to present a creditor's petition which the company inexplicably would not pay could hardly, in general at any rate, be an abuse of the process of the court.

D (ii) When it is clearly established that there is no debt, it seems to me similarly to follow that there is no creditor, that the person claiming to be such has no locus standi and that his petition is bound to fail. Once that becomes clear, pursuit of the petition would be an abuse of process, and this court would restrain its presentation or advertisement. Indeed, I understand counsel for the second defendant to concede this proposition.

E (iii) When the debt is disputed by the company on some substantial ground (and not just on some ground which is frivolous or without substance and which the court should, therefore, ignore) and the company is solvent, the court will restrain the prosecution of a petition to wind up the company. As SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., said in Cadiz Waterworks Co. v. Barnett (9), of a winding-up application,

F "... it is not a remedy intended by the legislature, or that ought ever to be applied, to enforce payment of a debt where these circumstances exist—solvency and a disputed debt."

As SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., (10) said in the judgment from which I have already quoted, "When a company is solvent, the right course is to bring an action for the debt: . . ." So, to pursue a winding-up petition in such circumstances is an abuse of the process of the court.

G What, however, if the debt is disputed by the company on some substantial ground but it appears that the company is unable to pay its debts? Researches have not produced any decision covering this point. Words interpreted out of context are amply available to support the plaintiff's claim that this court should, in such circumstances, grant the injunction. Thus, for example, in Re Imperial Guardian Life Assurance Society (11), SIR WILLIAM JAMES, V.-C., said, "A winding-up petition is not to be used as machinery for trying a common law action". In that case, however, voluntary liquidators had in fact offered to be personally liable and set aside assets to meet the disputed claim if proved and that was the only claim against or debt due from the company. In Re Gold Hill Mines (12), SIR JAMES BACON, V.-C. said:

"The Act of Parliament [that is the Companies Act] has given a creditor who cannot get paid a right to present his petition against a company which not only refuses to pay him, but is in a state of insolvency. That is all the Act does. It does not countenance applications to wind up as a means of enforcing the payment of debts which the company dispute."

(12) (1883), 23 Ch.D. 210 at pp. 211, 212.

Then LINDLEY, L.J. said (13):

"Now it ought to be understood that winding-up proceedings are not to be had recourse to for the purpose of recovering a disputed debt, especially when, as here, the company appears to be solvent . . . In fact we have no evidence of insolvency."

In Niger Merchants Co. v. Capper (14), SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R. said that SIR RICHARD MALINS, V.-C., in Cadiz Waterworks Co. v. Barnett (15), granted an injunction to restrain winding-up proceedings

"... on the ground that it is the object of the court to restrain the assertion of doubtful rights in a manner productive of irreparable damage . . ."

WILLMER, L.J., in Charles Forte Investments, Ltd. v. Amanda (16), quoted this passage of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., with approval. In Niger Merchants Co. v. Capper (17) and Cadiz Waterworks Co. v. Barnett (18), however, where the debt was disputed and the injunction was granted, the company was solvent. In Charles Forte Investments, Ltd. v. Amanda (19), the petition was not a creditor's petition but a contributory's petition, where an injunction was granted on the ground that the petition was bound to fail and an abuse of the process of the court, and it is in line with the early leading case of Re A Company (20), which I have already mentioned.

The strongest statement which I have seen in favour of the plaintiff's contention is that of KEKEWICH, J., in New Travellers' Chambers, Ltd. v. Cheese and Green (21):

"Of course the question whether this is a debt or not may possibly be tried by a winding-up petition; but it has been said over and over again, that the presentation of a winding-up petition is not a convenient, and often not a proper method of trying a disputed debt. If there is any reasonable ground for disputing the existence of the debt—if the question is not a mere question of quantum, but whether there is in fact a debt or not—a petition ought not to be presented, and therefore the court ought to restrain the presentation of the petition."

No reference was expressly made here to irreparable damage to the company, but, again, it appears, from the end of the argument as reported, that the company was in fact solvent, and it could then well go without saying that the presentation of the petition which was restrained would cause irreparable damage to the solvent company.

If the company is unable to pay its debts as they fall due, it seems to me that the presentation or advertisement of the petition might or might not cause it damage. It might prevent its pulling through a period of financial difficulty and becoming solvent, or it might result in worse insolvency. In the case of Charmaine the evidence is that its profits are improving, and in the case of both companies that a winding-up petition would injure goodwill.

It might be suggested that this court should, where the company is insolvent, intervene on the ground that it would be to the detriment of future possible creditors to countenance the continuation of a company unable to pay its debts as they fall due. The companies court, however, in accordance with the practice which I have mentioned, does dismiss a petition founded on a substantially disputed debt whose validity it cannot conveniently decide even though the

A company be insolvent. Also, as I have indicated, this, in my view, is in accordance with the requirements of s. 224 of the Act of 1948; and this court is certainly no less conveniently placed than the companies court to decide a disputed claim. Of course, if a creditor's petition turns out before the companies court to be based on a substantially disputed debt, there is the opportunity, under the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1949 (22), r. 37, for substituting another petitioner in place of the one whose debts are disputed. Such other petitioner, however, could in any event present such a petition—as indeed could the plaintiff, Mr. Mann, in this case, on the ground of deadlock.

These considerations appear to me to be complicated and inconclusive and afford no satisfactory basis for the exercise of the court's jurisdiction. For my part, I would prefer to rest the jurisdiction directly on the comparatively simple propositions that a creditor's petition can only be presented by a creditor, that the winding-up jurisdiction is not for the purpose of deciding a disputed debt (that is, disputed on substantial and not insubstantial grounds) since, until a creditor is established as a creditor he is not entitled to present the petition and has no locus standi in the companies court; and that, therefore, on substantial grounds) or after it has become clear that it is so disputed is an abuse of the process of the court. This seems to me to be in accordance with the statement of KEKEWICH, J. (23), which I have quoted, even though it be borne in mind that the company in that case was solvent: and the references to irreparable damage in the other cases which I have mentioned, where the petitioners were contributories or creditors petitioning against solvent companies, do not exclude an injunction being granted to prevent an abuse of the process of the court. Indeed, the prevention of the abuse of the process of the court is the very essence of the whole of this court's jurisdiction to restrain the presentation of a winding-up petition.

So I return to what was mentioned earlier in this judgment, that it is an abuse of the process of the court to prosecute a winding-up application otherwise than in accordance with the legitimate purpose of such a process. The legitimate purpose of such a process is to wind-up a company on a ground specified in the Companies Act, 1948, which, so far as material to this case, is the ground that it is unable to pay its debts. It is not its legitimate purpose to decide whether a petitioner claiming to be a creditor is a creditor, because s. 224 makes it a pre-requisite that he should be a creditor before he is even entitled to present a petition at all and before any consideration of the company's insolvency can become relevant. So, in my view, when a petitioning creditor's debt is disputed on such substantial ground this court should restrain the prosecution of the petition as an abuse of the process of the court even though it should appear to the court that the company is insolvent.

So I come to examine the debts which the defendants allege to be due to them from the companies in this case.

The defendant Mr. Goldstein alleges a debt of £1,869 for director's fees and its payment was demanded before presentation of this petition. It is not now disputed that fees to this amount were duly voted by Joanita in the years 1959-60 to 1964-65; and none has been voted since. Mr. Mann's evidence is that, since October, 1965, until June 12, 1967, £33 a week was drawn by Mr. Goldstein from both companies, of which £15 was drawn from Joanita and the remainder from Charmaine, without deduction for P.A.Y.E., which Mr. Goldstein should bear. It is submitted for the plaintiffs that Joanita is liable to pay tax on the £15 so drawn, that Mr. Goldstein is ultimately liable to bear that tax, that the sums drawn are, therefore, net sums, and that those sums grossed up, if I may use that useful phrase, at the appropriate rate of tax, are the sums, in effect, drawn by Mr. Goldstein from Joanita and that such sums exceed the £1,869. Mr. Goldstein has not contested this submission except by submitting that the £15 drawings must be treated as not being in respect of the fees voted amounting to £1,869, and that even if so treated the evidence establishes that the £15 figure should be £7, thus leaving a substantial part of the £1,869 still owing to Mr. Goldstein. There is no authority whatsoever for the drawings other than the voting of the £1,869 and I have no hesitation in concluding that the drawings were or are to be treated as being in payment of the £1,869.

With regard to the contention that the drawings from Joanita were £7 and not £15 a week, if part of the £1,869 were still owing to Mr. Goldstein, then, in accordance with KEKEWICH, J.'s observations (24) which I have quoted and the decision in Re Tweeds (Garages, Ltd.) (25), there would be sufficient debt to entitle the petitioner to qualify as a creditor for the purpose of presenting the petition. Mr. Mann's affidavit stated:

"Since October, 1965 and until July 12, 1967, Mr. Goldstein and I were each drawing £33 per week from both companies—as to £15 from Joanita and the remainder from Charmaine."

Mr. Goldstein observed on this that—"It is quite untrue . . . that he and I were drawing £33 each from Charmaine prior to July 12, 1967"—though, I may interject, Mr. Mann never in fact said that the £33 was drawn from Charmaine. Mr. Goldstein produced Charmaine's "Salary Book" to show that

". . . throughout the period covered by the entries therein both Mr. Mann and I were drawing a gross salary of £26 per week from that company."

The book does show from its commencement such entries of £26 gross each for the last fifteen weeks of one year and the first twenty weeks of the following year, making a total of thirty-five weeks. I am then invited to deduct the £26 gross mentioned by Mr. Goldstein from the £33 drawings mentioned by Mr. Mann as drawn from both companies to produce the figure of £7 which I have mentioned, and, further, to infer that Mr. Goldstein's drawings from Joanita were limited to that £7 not only during the thirty-five weeks which I have mentioned, but throughout the much longer period since October, 1965, mentioned by Mr. Mann. Mr. Mann, although he stated that £33 was drawn from both companies, also stated, perfectly clearly, that he and Mr. Goldstein drew £15 per week from Joanita. Mr. Goldstein has had ample opportunity to deal with that statement about Joanita. Nevertheless, his quoted observations appear to be directed entirely to drawings from Charmaine and not expressly, at any rate, to drawings from Joanita at all. I feel quite unable to conclude, on the material before me, that Mr. Goldstein's drawings from Joanita were limited to £7 a week. I am not satisfied that Mr. Goldstein is a creditor of Joanita for any part of the debt on which his petition is founded, although it is possible that if full investigation of Mr. Goldstein's claim to the debt were made, with full discovery and cross-examination, that some substantial part of the alleged debt at any rate would be established. There is, however, in my view, a substantial defence to the whole of Mr. Goldstein's claim and, as I have indicated, the companies court is not the proper court to decide the issue that thus arises.

So I come to the debt on which the Wallands company's petition against Charmaine is based and the payment of this debt appears to have been duly demanded.

Wallands is a company incorporated in the course of this year to take over the

A business of a Mr. and Mrs. Muller, and it claimed to be the creditor of Charmaine in respect of wigs and similar goods supplied on its own account, and as assignee of debts in respect of such goods supplied to Charmaine by Mr. and Mrs. Muller. The Mullers had business dealings with Charmaine Marguerite, Ltd., which, as I have said, was a subsidiary of Charmaine and to which the Mullers supplied such goods. The businesses of both Charmaine and Marguerite were carried on by B Mr. Goldstein at the same premises and Mr. Goldstein ordered goods from the Mullers for both Marguerite and Charmaine. The Mullers' dealings with Marguerite were far bigger than any dealings which they had with Charmaine. They amounted to £1,000 to £1,500 a week, whereas the debts claimed against Charmaine for wigs, and so on, spreading over the nine months January to September, 1967, amounted only to £347, according to Mr. Muller's evidence; and it is on these alleged C debts that the Wallands' petition is founded. Mr. Muller seeks to establish it by a list "... in which ..." he says "... there is itemised all goods sold to Charmaine between Jan. 13, 1967, and the end of September, 1967", amounting, in total, to £347. He then says, "All goods shown thereon were despatched to Charmaine's premises ...". Charmaine's premises, however, were the same as Marguerite's premises. He adds, "... and to the best of my knowledge were ordered by Mr. D Goldstein for Charmaine and were despatched to that company". Mr. Goldstein says, "To the best of my recollection all the items shown therein [that is, in Mr. Muller's list] were ordered by me on behalf of Charmaine, were delivered to Charmaine and subsequently sold to Charmaine's customers". Statements so phrased themselves invite doubt whether the goods were sold to Charmaine at all.

Mr. Muller, in his affidavit, said that Charmaine paid, in May, 1967, £87 6s. E in respect of debts due from it up to Dec. 31, 1966. The £87 6s. was certainly paid by a cheque of Charmaine Coiffeur d'Art, Ltd. It seems clear, however, from the evidence of Mr. Shelley, a chartered accountant, who gave evidence for the plaintiffs, that, of the six invoices for this debt, only one was invoiced in 1966, namely, on Dec. 27, 1966, for £17, and that the rest were in 1967; that four F invoices were to "Marguerite", that one was to "Charmaine Marguerite" and only one to "Charmaine"—without the addition of "Marguerite" or "Coiffeur d'Art"—and that not one was invoiced to Charmaine Coiffeur d'Art. It seems that here not only was Mr. Muller confused in respect of the debts, but he was treating goods invoiced to Marguerite as goods supplied to Charmaine and that, insofar as any sum is owing in respect of debts now relied on by Wallands, it is the plaintiffs' contention here that the goods were supplied to Marguerite and not to G Charmaine at all. Further, Mr. Muller said, as I have mentioned, that his list itemised all goods sold between January, 1967, and the end of September, 1967, to Charmaine; but as the £87 6s. was in payment of a number of invoices for goods sold between those dates it is clear that this statement is not accurate if, as Mr. Muller said, the £87 6s. was for payment of goods sold to Charmaine, or even if the one invoice addressed to "Charmaine" were to "Charmaine Coiffeur d'Art".

H However, on July 20, Marguerite ceased to carry on business at Charmaine's premises, and from about the middle of September Mr. Goldstein ceased to attend there regularly and Mr. Mann conducted Charmaine's business. The only invoice forthcoming for goods within Wallands' claim is an unreceipted invoice addressed to "Charmaine London, N.W.3" showing an amount of £7 charged for goods supplied, dated Sept. 28, 1967, and an invoice number corresponding to those in I the last item in Mr. Muller's list of invoices in respect of the debt claimed. This invoice, however, is produced by Mr. Goldstein without any explanation how he obtained it, though he did say elsewhere in his evidence that he visited Charmaine's premises intermittently since he ceased to conduct this business. He adds that two names appearing on the invoice, opposite the two items of goods there mentioned as supplied, were those of a hairdresser and customer of Charmaine. Mr. Mann says that he is informed by Charmaine's receptionist/cashier that for the past four or five months all deliveries from Mr. Muller or his company have been for cash-on-delivery, and that she understood that this had been the arrangement since about the beginning of this year. A

I find this evidence and much of the evidence on both sides very unsatisfactory. The evidence with regard to the claim for the £7 for goods supplied in September is stronger than with regard to the rest of the claim, but I do not consider even the claim for this sum satisfactorily established having regard to all the circumstances of this case. All that is perfectly clear is that there is considerable confusion of goods ordered for Charmaine and goods ordered for Marguerite and that the evidence before me has to be approached with considerable care. There is here a defence to Wallands' claim that requires thorough investigation, with full discovery and opportunity for cross-examination. As in Mr. Goldstein's allegations of debt against Joanita, I am not satisfied that any of the debt on which Wallands founds its petition is owing, though the debt may, of course, be established in proper proceedings for the purpose. As I have indicated, winding-up proceedings are not proper proceedings for that purpose. B C

There remain two matters which I can quite quickly dispose of. The first is the plaintiffs' allegation of the lack of bona fides in the defendants in presenting their petitions. I have already dealt with the meaning of bona fides in presenting a petition. It is clear, if I am correct in my conclusion so far, that, as the debts are disputed on substantial grounds, to pursue the petitions would be an abuse of the process of the court. That is all I need say on bona fides or all that it is advisable that I would say on it at this stage of the conflict between the parties. D

The second matter to mention is the companies' insolvency. Insolvency in connexion with a winding-up petition means inability to pay debts as they fall due and not a deficiency of assets as compared with liabilities. Indeed, insolvency in that sense, of inability to pay debts as they fall due, clearly appears from Mr. Mann's own affidavits. The evidence of such insolvency of both companies is altogether so conclusive to my mind that I do not propose to analyse or particularise it, especially as I do not rely on it for my conclusion but come to my conclusion despite it. E

My conclusion, therefore, is, in the case of each company, for the reasons which I have given at length, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the injunctions which they claim, until trial or further order, unless, of course, the parties, by chance, consent to agree to treat this motion itself as the trial of the action. ## MOORE v. MAXWELLS OF EMSWORTH, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

Road Traffic—Negligence—Unlighted motor vehicle stationary on dark night—Prima facie evidence of negligence, there being no street lighting—Rebuttal of presumption of negligence.

C

On a dark night in January the driver of a lorry, towing a trailer, stopped on an unlit two-track by-pass because of a signal from another driver, and found that the tail light of the trailer had failed. In finding the cause, a fault in the plug connecting the trailer lights to the lorry, he fused all the lights on the trailer. He sent his mate to stand by the rear of the trailer to try to stop on-coming traffic colliding with it, while he changed the plug by the light in his cab. He did not think that it would take him long to change the plug and mend the fuse. The driver of a chassis, who was not keeping a proper look out, drove violently into the trailer. The lorry-driver had tested his lights, and found them to be in working order, after coupling up the trailer before setting off for his journey, and again before lighting-up time. Seven hundred yards or so ahead of the lorry the road was lit, but the lorry-driver did not know this. There was a wide verge at the point where the lorry stopped, but the lorry was so heavy, and the verge so soft, that had the driver driven his lorry on to the verge he would have needed a crane to extricate it. In an action by the chassis-driver against the owners and driver of the lorry for damages for negligence, the defendants gave no evidence as to the servicing of the lorry.

Held: the lorry-owners and driver had both shown that they had taken all reasonable steps to avoid creating or prolonging the danger caused by the stationary unlit lorry, and accordingly the presumption of negligence arising from its presence unlighted on the unlit road had been rebutted; the lorry-driver's decision that he could mend the vehicle's lighting without driving on to another place was a reasonable decision, and the chassis-driver's action failed (see p. 781, letters C and H, and p. 782, letters C, D and F, post).

Appeal.

I

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Derek John Moore, against the judgment of DONALDSON, J., dated Nov. 9, 1967, dismissing his action for damages for negligence against the defendants, Maxwells of Emsworth, Ltd., the owners of a lorry and trailer with which the plaintiff's vehicle had collided while the lorry was stationary and unlighted on the road at night, and against their servant, David Charles Ind, the driver of the lorry. The facts are set out in the judgment of HARMAN, L.J.

M. R. Hickman for the plaintiff.

Patrick Bennett for the defendants.

HARMAN, L.J.: This is a very stale case. The accident happened as long ago as January, 1964, and it did not come to trial till November, 1967. How, under the circumstances, any witness could expect to remember anything much about it I do not myself understand; but it is the fact that two victims of the accident, one of whom was the plaintiff, are without any recollection of the circumstances at all and, therefore, what we do know about it is largely a matter of inference.

It appears that Mr. Ind, the second defendant ("the defendant driver"), who was the employee of the first defendants ("the defendant lorry-owners") and engaged on their business of transport, was driving a very heavy lorry and trailer, loaded with agricultural tractors, southwards on the Oxford by-pass between Headington and Cowley on the evening of Jan. 27, 1964. It was about 5.30 p.m., and it would be dark of course. There was no moon; it was fine and clear. He was going along the near side of the track, this being a two-track road, and was passed by a motorist who flashed his lamps at him, which indicated to him that there was something wrong. So he got out and sure enough there was: the tail light of the trailer was out. So the defendant driver thought that he might locate the trouble by seeing whether there was any fault in the coupling, that is to say the plug which connected the trailer's light with the lorry's lights. The lorry's lights, or at least the obligatory ones, were on the same circuit as the obligatory lights on the trailer, which also had reflectors on the back. While the defendant driver was trying to mend the lighting, he fused all the obligatory lights and was left in the dark. He decided to try to change the plug and mend it. He got back to his lorry, sent his mate to the rear to stand by and to try to stop oncoming traffic from colliding with the vehicle, that being the best that he could do, and was proceeding with the aid of a light in the cab of the lorry to change the plug. At that moment he was run into violently from behind by the plaintiff, who was driving a brand new vehicle having a lorry chassis with no body on it but merely a cab with a screen in front. It seems quite clear that the plaintiff hardly saw the defendants' vehicle at all. On the evidence he did swerve very slightly at the last moment. He never put his brakes on. He ran violently into it. He not only injured himself, he injured the defendant driver's mate seriously as well. He sues each of the defendants severally in negligence saying that each on his own account was in default in that duty which a man owes to his neighbour in circumstances such as these.

In this court, at any rate, it is not denied that the plaintiff was guilty himself of negligence in that he did not keep an adequate look-out. It was said below that he did not keep any at all, but that the judge did not accept, and I do not think it necessary to go as far as that; but he did not keep any adequate look-out anyhow and so he is to blame, and the question here is whether there is contributory negligence on the part of one or other of the defendants.

The point of attack in counsel for the plaintiff's very well marshalled argument as against the defendant lorry-owners is this: that there is a presumption of negligence (counsel says) in the presence of an unlit vehicle on a road, and for that he cites some words of DENNING, L.J., in Hill-Venning v. Besant (1):

"The presence of an unlighted vehicle in a road is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the driver, and it is for him to explain how it came to be unlighted and why he could not move it out of the way or give warning to oncoming traffic."

The case itself I do not find of any assistance because, like all other accident cases, the facts differ from the facts of this case, and in particular there was no reason why the motor-cycle there in question should not have been lifted on to the verge, which was a perfectly simple and obvious precaution to take: but anyhow there is this presumption.

(1) [1950] 2 All E.R. 1151 at p. 1153.

A The fact of the vehicle being on the road unlighted does need explanation, and the explanation given is that this was a sudden and unforeseeable failure of the lighting system, for whatever cause, and that so far as fulfilling his duty to his neighbour was concerned the defendant driver had fulfilled that by testing the lights when he coupled up the trailer to the body of the lorry and testing them again just before lighting-up time and on both occasions they were working perfectly. I do not see what more can be demanded of the employer than that his employee should do that.

C It is said that the lorry-owners ought to have produced some evidence of regular servicing of the lighting system. I do not think that the absence of that evidence means that the owners have failed to discharge the burden which is on them. I do not think that it is a point which called for explanation from them in that particular detail, and, therefore, I think that the mere fact that this vehicle was where it was without any lights is sufficiently explained to rebut that presumption of negligence.

D Next it is said that the lorry-owners should have provided flashing lamps or torches for their employee and his mate to stand at the rear of the vehicle and wave them or keep them flashing so as to call attention to the fact that the lorry was there; but I do not think that is itself evidence of negligence. There was no evidence that the provision of such flash-lamps is, or anyhow was in 1964, when the accident happened, prevalent or even known; and, in the absence of any evidence that it was customary or that it was the proper thing to do, I cannot think that that is evidence of negligence. That really completes the tale of the story against the lorry-owners.

E Now as to the employee, the driver, it is said first of all that when he found his tail light out and knew that he had to mend it he should have driven on to the verge. There was a wide verge at this point and I suppose we must take it that he could have driven on to it; but it was very soft and, as the police officer said, entirely unsuitable. He had a very heavy lorry: he could have got on to the verge, I suppose, but he never would have got off it again without a crane, and I do not think that he was bound to take any such drastic action as that; and that is where the case differs from the one that I have cited, Hill-Venning v. Beszant (2).

G Next it is said that he should have driven on until he found either a place where there was sufficient street lighting or where there was a lay-by. There was street lighting, as we now know, though he did not know, seven hundred yards or so ahead, where there was a roundabout which was lit. This has been the critical point so far as I am concerned; but even supposing that it was a misjudgment on the part of this man, it was not, I think, an act of negligence. He did not suppose that it would take him very long to mend the fuse; he did not think that he ought to drive on without any lights; and the point, taken late in the case, that he still had his headlights is too doubtful to rely on at this juncture, and even if it were not so, I should not have thought that it made any difference. I think that the decision that he could afford to mend his light without driving anywhere else in order to do so was a decision which he might reasonably take; but that the plaintiff was negligent and could have seen the trailer if he had kept a look-out is not in dispute; the only question has been as to the conduct, or the want of precaution, on the part of the defendants.

I In the end, I have come to the conclusion that the judge arrived at the right assessment of this and that we ought not to interfere. I would dismiss the appeal.

DIPLOCK, L.J.: I agree, and would only add a little about the proposition submitted to us by counsel for the plaintiff about the duty of the owner of a vehicle on the road in relation to its lighting.

Counsel for the plaintiff, as I understood it, put the proposition this way. That if the lights of a vehicle fail, that is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the person responsible for the maintenance of the vehicle: in other words the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies, and the onus lies on the person responsible for the maintenance of the vehicle to prove that he has taken all reasonable steps for its maintenance.

Counsel for the plaintiff seeks to derive that proposition from observations of DENNING, L.J., in Hill-Venning v. Beszant (3), which HARMAN, L.J., has cited (4), and similar observations by EDMUND DAVIES, J., in Parish v. Judd (5). Those observations, however, are not authority for the proposition which counsel for the plaintiff has sought to advance but for a quite different one, which is, I think, not a proposition of common law but an application of common sense: that is, that the presence of an unlighted vehicle in a road is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the driver and it is for him to explain how it came to be unlighted and why he could not move it out of the way or give warning to oncoming traffic. That really means no more than this, that anyone in charge of a motor vehicle should realise that if he leaves it after dark in a highway it is a potential source of danger to other users of the highway, particularly those who are not taking reasonable care for their own safety. It follows, therefore, that the person responsible for its being there must show that he has taken all reasonable steps to avoid creating or prolonging that danger. In my view the two defendants in this case did succeed in showing that they took all reasonable steps to avoid creating or prolonging the presence of these unlighted vehicles on the road. So far as creating it is concerned, the defendant driver proved that before he set off on his journey at all, after coupling up the trailer, he tested the lights, and that before lighting-up time he tested them again, and on both those occasions they were working properly. It does not seem to me that in those circumstances any onus lay on the defendants to call evidence as to the maintenance of the vehicle. As regards the other matters of which the plaintiff has complained, I do not find it necessary to add anything to what has been said by HARMAN, L.J., except that I agree.

FENTON ATKINSON, L.J.: I also agree. The only point that has troubled me is what counsel for the plaintiff called the second barrel of his second gun. If it had been proved that the defendant driver knew or, by looking ahead, could readily have seen, that good street lighting began only seven hundred yards ahead, I see much to be said for the view that he should have proceeded that distance before undertaking any repairs to his rear light, having regard to the danger to other southbound traffic on a road of this kind, stopped, as he was, in a very dark spot and where he was unable to give any effective warning to traffic coming from behind; but on the evidence the necessary factual basis was not established; and I agree that this appeal fails.

WAKEHAM v. MACKENZIE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Stamp, J.), January 25, 26, February 14, 1968.]

Contract—Oral contract that plaintiff should have deceased's house after his death—Part performance—Plaintiff gave up her flat and lived with deceased, looking after him and his house—Specific performance of oral contract decreed after deceased's death—Question of relief where it would have been fraudulent for deceased to repudiate contract for want of writing—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5 c. 20), s. 40.

After his wife's death in December, 1963, B., who was seventy-two years of age, orally agreed with the plaintiff, who was a widow and sixty-seven years of age, that if she would move into his house, and look after it and him for the rest of his life, she should have the house (which he owned) and contents when he died. It was a term of the agreement that she should pay for her own board and coal. The plaintiff gave up her council flat and moved to B.'s house. She looked after it and him until he died, and she paid for her board and coal. B. died in February, 1966. He did not leave the house or contents to the plaintiff. In an action by the plaintiff for specific performance of the agreement.

Held: the giving up of the plaintiff's flat in order to make her home at B.'s house, her moving into that house, her acts in looking after B. and the house and in paying for her board and coal were acts of part performance which must be referred to some contract, and were referable to the contract that she alleged; accordingly the court would decree specific performance of the oral contract by B. with the plaintiff that she should have his house and contents after his death (see p. 787, letter H, and p. 788, letter B, post).

Quaere whether, assuming (contrary to the decision stated above) that there had not been part performance, the plaintiff would have been entitled to specific performance on the footing that it would have been fraudulent for B., immediately before his death, to have repudiated the oral contract for want of writing (see p. 788, letter E, post).

Action.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, Margaret Elizabeth Wakham, against the defendant, Lionel Rusk Sprot Mackenzie, the executor of George Frederick Ball, deceased, by writ issued on Aug. 31, 1966, claiming specific performance of an oral contract alleged to have been made by the deceased with the plaintiff in the months of October and November, 1964.

Mr. Ball, the deceased, lived with his wife at 172, Wilton Road, Shirley, Southampton, which was a small house, having two living rooms and three bedrooms, one of which was very small. At the time of Mr. Ball's death, the house was valued for probate at £4,000. The plaintiff, Mrs. Wakeham, was an old friend and neighbour of Mr. and Mrs. Ball; she was a widow, aged sixty-seven, and lived in a council flat about half-a-mile away. She had little income, only her state pension and £9 monthly provided by her deceased husband. In December, 1963, Mrs. Ball died. Mr. Ball was then left living alone at No. 172. He was seventy-two and had bad health. Before Mrs. Ball died she had indicated to the plaintiff the hope that the plaintiff would look after Mr. Ball. The plaintiff went round to see Mr. Ball five or six times a week. On Oct. 7, 1964, the plaintiff was not well and did not go. Mr. Ball came to her flat, and suggested that she should give up her flat and move to his house, 172, Wilton Road, where she could have a room of her own and make the house her home. He promised that, if she did this, he would leave her the house and contents when he died. The proposition was discussed again a few days later on Oct. 12, 1964. On October 28, 1964, the matter was again discussed, the plaintiff's daughter then being present. According to their evidence at the trial Mr. Ball then said that he was leaving the house and contents to the plaintiff, that he had fixed things up with his solicitor and that the plaintiff could move in so soon as she wished. The plaintiff did not move in; she said in evidence that she was waiting for written proof before she gave up her council flat. On Nov. 23, 1964, Mr. Ball was not at all well. The plaintiff told him on this occasion that she would accept his proposition if he had made legal arrangements; she said in evidence that he gave her his word of honour that he had made legal arrangements. Accordingly she gave up her council flat and on Dec. 3, 1964, moved into 172, Wilton Road. Thereafter she shared the house with Mr. Ball, looking after it and him, and sharing the cost of food and coal. Mr. Ball died on Feb. 12, 1966. He had not in fact arranged anything with his solicitor and had not left the plaintiff anything by will.

K. C. L. Smithies for the plaintiff.

M. Essayan for the defendant.

Feb. 14. STAMP, J., read the following judgment in which, having stated the nature of the proceedings, he reviewed the circumstances and the evidence. In the course of this review HIS LORDSHIP intimated that in deciding what findings of fact he ought to make, he had had to bear in mind the suspicion with which the court should regard the claim against the estate of a deceased person and his duty to subject such a claim to a very close scrutiny. After referring to certain correspondence and the evidence in relation thereto, HIS LORDSHIP continued: It is not in issue that, from the day when the plaintiff moved into 172, Wilton Road, she did all that was contemplated by the arrangement which had been made. She kept house and tended Mr. Ball, she had her own room and furniture there, and 172, Wilton Road was her home. Mr. Ball and the plaintiff each contributed £2 a week for food and so on, and when it was not enough the plaintiff did not ask for more. At times she was very unhappy. He was only concerned with his own comfort and was very selfish. When Mr. Ball died there was no provision for the plaintiff.

I am satisfied not merely on the balance of probability but beyond all reasonable doubt that Mr. Ball promised the plaintiff that if she would move into 172, Wilton Road and make her home there, look after the house and him for the rest of his life, she should have it and its contents when he died. I am equally satisfied that the plaintiff accepted that offer orally on Nov. 23, 1965, and I find as a fact that it was a term of the agreement so made that the plaintiff should pay for her own board and coal; I find as a fact that the plaintiff performed her part of the agreement.

I also make these additional findings of fact, which are not necessary for the purpose of this judgment but which could be relevant, for reasons which I will

A explain later, if the case should go further. I find as a fact that there was prior to Nov. 23, 1964, an oral agreement in the terms I have found, but subject to a condition that Mr. Ball should put the agreement into legal form. I find as a fact that the condition was not performed because Mr. Ball on Nov. 23, promised and assured the plaintiff that it had been performed. I find as a fact that, before the condition had been performed, the plaintiff, relying on that promise and assurance, entered into oral agreement on Nov. 23, 1964, gave up her little council flat and moved into 172, Wilton Road. In making these additional findings, I record that the additional facts so found form part of the plaintiff's case as pleaded or argued, and that I have taken no account of them in coming to my conclusions.

C It was submitted on behalf of the defendant executor, first, that apart from s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, there was no contract enforceable against Mr. Ball; there was, it was said, want of mutuality. The plaintiff might have looked after the house and Mr. Ball well or she might have done so badly. Had she done it badly or had she failed otherwise to fulfil her promise, Mr. Ball would have had no remedy. His promise to leave her the house and contents was no more, so it was said, than a statement of his then present intention. D These and other similar submissions, in my judgment, assume the non-existence of a contract. If there was a contract in the terms which I have found and the plaintiff had failed to perform her obligations, Mr. Ball could not have had an action for a specific performance because the contract was a contract for the performance of personal service; but I cannot see why he should not have had damages, whether substantial or only nominal, for her failure to perform her part of the contract. E Nor does the submission that there was no more than a unilateral promise by Mr. Ball that, if the plaintiff looked after him for the rest of his life, he would leave her the house and contents appear to me well-founded.

If a man promise another that, if he serve him for a year, he will pay him £1,000 and the promisee does so serve, it has never been doubted that entering on the service is an acceptance of the offer, nor held that the promise to pay at the end of the year is unilateral and cannot be enforced when the service has been performed. No case has been cited to me which establishes that it makes any difference whether the service is for one year or five years or, as in this case, the life of the promisor. It is common ground that a contract to leave a house and its contents on death is one which this court can enforce. The submissions G that there was in this case no binding contract are not, in my judgment, well-founded.

Then it is contended that, assuming that there was a binding contract, no action can be brought on it by the plaintiff by reason of s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which replaced part of s. 4 of the Statute of Frauds. It is an unhappy reflection that in this year of grace it should be possible, and indeed the duty of H the defendant as an executor and in answer to a contract so very clearly proved, to rely, if it applies, on a statute replacing one passed nearly three hundred years ago for "prevention of many fraudulent practices which were commonly endeavoured to be upheld by perjury and subornation of perjury"; a statute passed at a time in the history of our law, when the defendant to the action could not give oral evidence and when, as until recently, in an action at law on a I contract the facts were found by a jury; a statute which, almost from the outset of its existence, was held by the judges was not to be used as an engine of fraud or to cover fraud; a statute which was held not to operate to avoid a contract but merely to prevent an action being brought on it. Nothing could have been more fraudulent to the way of thinking of the old equity lawyers than that Mr. Ball, or his executor standing in his shoes, having induced performance of the contract and enjoyed the benefits of that performance, should have repudiated his obligations in reliance on the statute. And the question which I have to decide is whether that performance was such as to raise equities which, consistently with the authorities, entitle the plaintiff to have the contract performed by the defendant: authorities which are neither consistent nor easy to reconcile because the common law judges until comparatively recent times regarded as most satisfactory a statute which the equity judges, not dependent on a jury to find the facts, would, if the doing of equity required it, endeavour to circumvent.

What is said on behalf of the defendant is that the acts of the plaintiff in performing the contract are not referable to a contract relating to any land or to a contract relating to 172, Wilton Road and, therefore, are not acts of part performance on which the plaintiff can rely. In support of this contention the defendant relies first on Alderson v. Maddison (1) in the Court of Appeal, and on appeal to the House of Lords, Maddison v. Alderson (2).

In Chaproniere v. Lambert (3), WARRINGTON, L.J., after referring very specifically to Maddison v. Alderson (2), summed the matter up by referring (4) to a passage in FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (5th Edn.) p. 290, in which it was stated that among other conditions required to satisfy the requirements of part performance to withdraw a contract from the operation of the statute, the acts of part performance must be such as to be not only referable to a contract such as that alleged, but to be referable to no other title. There are certainly passages in Maddison v. Alderson (2) from which this might be inferred. If the matter rested there I should of course endeavour to apply what WARRINGTON, L.J., said to the facts of the present case. I am however happily relieved of the task of doing so by the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Kingswood Estate Co., Ltd. v. Anderson (5). The essential facts of that case as set out in the head-note, were that the tenant, an elderly widow, had resided for about forty-five years at premises controlled by the Rent Restriction Acts, of which she became the statutory tenant, her invalid son residing with her. Her landlords, a property development company, whose managing director, Y. was also a partner in the firm of estate agents who acted for the company, were anxious to obtain possession of the premises for the purposes of development. Accordingly, the landlords purchased another house and offered the tenant accommodation at a flat therein. Conversation then took place between the tenant and her daughters and Y. at which Y. stated that in the event of the tenant moving into the flat together with her son there would be no need for a tenancy agreement as they would be there for the rest of their lives. On the faith of Y.'s representations, the tenant with her son moved in September, 1959, to the flat and paid rent, being supplied with a rent book of a type ordinarily used for weekly tenancy. The landlords, having served the tenant with a notice to quit, claimed possession of the flat in the county court contending that the tenant had moved there on the terms that she was to become a contractual weekly tenant, entitled to no more than four weeks' notice.

All the lord justices took the view that there was a sufficient act of part performance to take the case outside s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Because UPJOHN, L.J., referred specifically to the rules stated by WARRINGTON, L.J., in Chaproniere v. Lambert (4), I will refer first to his judgment where he rejected the argument which had been advanced, and which is advanced in the present case, that the part performance must be referable to the contract alleged and not to any other title. What he said was this (6):

"Then it is said that, even if that was the contract, it was an oral contract and there is no written memorandum to satisfy s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. But leaving No. 91 and going into possession of No. 46 constitute

- A acts of part performance which entitled the tenant to rely on a bare oral contract and which prevents the landlords from taking any objection to the want of writing. With all respect to the submission of counsel for the landlords, I should have thought that his argument founded on the want of writing was quite unarguable, for, in my judgment, this is a complete text-book case of part performance. However counsel relies on the well-known conditions necessary to prevent the operation of the statute laid down by WARRINGTON, L.J., in Chaproniere v. Lambert (7), and says that the acts of part performance here do not satisfy the first condition, namely, that the acts of part performance must not only be referable to a contract such as that alleged, but be referable to no other title. So he says the acts of part performance here are equally consistent with a weekly tenancy and to a tenancy for lives, so that it cannot be said that the acts of part performance are referable to no other title. This, however, is a long exploded idea. The true rule is, in my view, stated in FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (6th Edn.), p. 278, s. 528: 'The true principle, however, of the operation of the acts of part performance seems only to require that the acts in question be such as must be referred to some contract, and may be referred to the alleged one; that they prove the existence of some contract, and are consistent with the contract alleged'."

WILLMER, L.J., took a similar view when he said (8):

- E "On the question of part performance, I do not think that there is any room for doubt. Where the question is whether there was an agreement for a tenancy, I cannot imagine any better evidence of part performance than the fact of a tenant going into actual occupation. It is said, however, that the act of the tenant in going into occupation was equivocal, in that it might be referable to any kind of tenancy agreement. I do not understand, however, that part performance must necessarily be referable to the agreement, and only the particular agreement, relied on. I cite from ANSON'S LAW OF CONTRACT (21st Edn., 1959), p. 75, where the principle is stated, as I think correctly, in the following terms: 'The acts of performance relied upon must of themselves suggest the existence of a contract such as it is desired to prove, although they need not establish the exact terms of that contract.' As I understand it, if there is evidence of such part performance, that is sufficient to warrant the admission of oral evidence to prove what the exact terms of the contract were."

- G RUSSELL, L.J., said quite simply (9):

"I agree further that the contract was partly performed by the tenant's move from No. 91 to No. 46; this is quite clear."

- H I conclude from Kingswood Estate Co., Ltd. v. Anderson (10), first that it is not the law that the acts of part performance relied on must be not only referable to a contract such as that alleged, but referable to no other title, the doctrine to that effect laid down by WARRINGTON, L.J., in Chaproniere v. Lambert (7) having been exploded; and, secondly, that the true rule is that the operation of acts of part performance requires only that the acts in question be such as must be referred to some contract and may be referred to the alleged one: that they prove the existence of some contract and are consistent with the contract alleged.

I The acts of part performance in this case, the giving up of the plaintiff's home to make her home at 172, Wilton Road, the moving into a new home, the acts which the plaintiff performed in looking after the deceased and looking after that home and putting £2 a week into the common pot clearly, in my judgment, raise an equity in her. Those acts were, in my judgment, such as must be referred to some contract. The expression "must be referred to some contract", used by UPJOHN, L.J., in the Kingswood Estate case (11), cannot exclude any act which could possibly be referable to love or affection, for whenever a man goes into possession of land he may be there by the grace and favour of another.

In the circumstances in which the plaintiff found herself at the relevant time I cannot suppose that she gave up her own home, took up residence at No. 172 and did what she did otherwise than by reference to some contract. If it were necessary to do so, I would further hold that the act in making her home at 172, Wilton Road during the whole of the residue of the life of Mr. Ball and keeping house, were acts of part performance relating to 172, Wilton Road.

Earlier in this judgment I made findings regarding Mr. Ball's statement to the effect that he had fixed things up with his solicitor, which I said were unnecessary for the purposes of this judgment. I did so because in my view it would have been fraudulent of Mr. Ball immediately before his death to have repudiated the bargain for want of writing. The defendant who stands in his shoes can be in no better position. The question whether in these circumstances, assuming I am wrong as to the effect of the part performance, the court ought to grant relief despite s. 40 was not argued and the facts on which such an argument could be based were not pleaded. It would therefore be wrong for me to consider whether such an argument could have been well-founded.

It is, however, perhaps just worth noting in this connexion the notes of the case of Maxwell v. Lady Mountacute (12). It is perhaps before I read worth observing, refreshingly enough, that the case was heard at my Lord Chancellor's House. The note of the case is this (12):

"In this case a distinction was taken, and agreed by the court that where, on a treaty for a marriage, or any other treaty, the parties come to an agreement, but the same is never reduced into writing, nor any proposal made for that purpose, so that they rely wholly on their part agreement, that unless this be executed in part, neither party can compel the other to a specific performance, for that the Statute of Frauds is directly in their way; but if there was any agreement for reducing the same into writing, and that is prevented by the fraud and practice of the other party, that this court will in such case give relief; as where instructions are given, and preparations made for the drawing of a marriage settlement, and before the completing of it the woman is drawn, by the assurances and promises of the man, to perform it, and after to marry him."

How far that is consistent with the later cases I know not. I made the additional findings of fact so that if the point is worth taking in a higher court and that court should think it right to allow it to be taken, the findings of fact may not be wanting.

The first defendant ("Magnet") contracted with the plaintiff ("A.M.F.") that the plaintiff would provide and install valuable timber and other specialised bowling alley equipment (the woodwork being of a value of £40,000 in a total contract price of £57,651) in a building for whose construction Magnet contracted with the second defendants ("Trenthams"). A.M.F. were not sub-contractors of Trenthams. The timber used for the bowling lanes had to be kiln dried timber with a small moisture content.

G

Under the contract the title to the timber and goods to be installed remained in A.M.F. until completion of the installation. The architect in charge was in the employ of an associated company of Magnet, but he employed an outside firm of architects to provide certain architectural services under his overall professional responsibility. The architect in charge was regarded by the court as being in law in the full-time employment of Magnet, and the outside firm of architects were found not to be independent contractors.

H

Trenthams entered on the building site and began work in December, 1963. They, as well as Magnet, knew that A.M.F.'s installation would incorporate timber that was valuable and for which absence of damp and complete dryness was of great importance. At Magnet's request A.M.F. began installation, with Trenthams' concurrence, on July 6, 1964, the contract (which was signed subsequently) between Magnet and A.M.F. providing

(by cl. 3 (B)) that "the bowling centre shall be ready to accept delivery of the . . . goods and for the commencement and uninterrupted performance of their installation" therein on the date that Magnet should confirm. In fact precautions against entry of flood water into the building were not adequate at that time. An exception clause (cl. 5) in the contract provided that neither party should be liable to the other "for any . . . damage caused by . . . failure of performance of any part of this agreement occasioned by . . . flood . . . accident . . . act of God . . .". At about this time enquiry of A.M.F. was made by Magnet about insurance cover during the period of installation. The reply was that A.M.F. "cover all their own risks". There was no express representation that A.M.F.'s insurance covered any interests but their own. On July 21, 1964, consequent on an exceptionally heavy rainstorm a considerable quantity of water entered the building through (so the court found) an uncompleted doorway, pouring over a plank let into the threshold as a guard against water. A.M.F.'s timber, which was then on the premises was seriously damaged. The flood damage was not, so the court found, attributable to an act of God, but the risk of water overcoming such defence as had been placed at the threshold was readily foreseeable and could have been guarded against fairly easily. The building contract between Magnet and Trenthams contained an indemnity clause (condition 14 (b)) whereby Trenthams were to indemnify Magnet against liability in respect of any damage to property arising "out of or in the course of or by reason of the execution of the works", provided that it was due to negligence of Trenthams. The court found that "the works" included items referred to in the bills of quantities which contained provisions requiring Trenthams to provide for the diversion of storm water, to allow for protection of all work and materials from injury by weather and to prevent the accumulation of water on the site; and the court further found that if these had been complied with water should not have entered the building. Condition 10 of the building contract provided that nothing contained in the bills of quantities should override or modify the application of the conditions of the building contract. In fact Magnet had relied wholly on Trenthams in regard to the discharge of their obligations in the contract. In an action by A.M.F. against Magnet and Trenthams, claiming damages for breach of contract and in tort against Magnet and the same sums as damages in tort against Trenthams, salvage expenses* being treated as consequential loss (cf. holding (A) (iii) post) flowing from the damage to timber.

Held: (A) Magnet and Trenthams were both liable in damages to A.M.F. on the following grounds (see p. 809, letter D, post):

(i) (as between A.M.F. and Magnet, contractual liability) (a) Magnet were under a contractual obligation, either by virtue of cl. 3 (B) or by implied warranty of fitness, to A.M.F. that the building would be fit to receive delivery of A.M.F.'s goods, viz. would in particular be watertight against all reasonably foreseeable risks, and Magnet were in breach of that obligation; (b) the exception clause (cl. 5) was inapplicable because the damage to timber was occasioned by the failure to have the premises fit to receive A.M.F.'s goods not by flood (see p. 800, letters B, C and G, post).

(ii) (as between A.M.F. and Magnet, tortious liability) Magnet, as occupiers, were not within such protection as was afforded by s. 2 (4) (b)† of the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, because:

(a) Magnet should have taken some steps, through a qualified person, to check that the building would be ready for A.M.F. to start installation on July 6, 1964, but had not done so and had given no instructions in regard to anti-flooding precautions (see p. 803, letter E, and p. 806, letter G, post).

Green v. Fibreglass, Ltd. ([1958] 2 All E.R. 521) distinguished.

(b) although protection of the building against flooding was within the description work of "construction, maintenance or repair" in s. 2 (4) (b) (see p. 802, letter G, post), and although an occupier might be acting reasonably by employing a competent independent contractor to fulfil his duty in regard to technical work and might not incur liability for the negligence of the independent contractor (see p. 803, letter H, post), yet on the facts of the present case the firm of architects were not in the position

A of independent contractors in relation to Magnet, and Magnet could not escape tortious liability on this ground (see p. 805, letter H, and p. 806, letter E, post).

(iii) (as between A.M.F. and both Magnet and Trenthams, tortious liability) the liability of an occupier of premises under the rules applied by s. 1 (3) (b)* of the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, extended to financial loss flowing from damage to property as well as to damages for physical injury to personal property (see p. 808, letter A, post).

B Workington Harbour & Dock Board v. S.S. Towerfield (Owners) ([1950] 2 All E.R. 414) distinguished.

(iv) (as between A.M.F. and Trenthams, tortious liability) Trenthams were occupiers of the premises as well as Magnet (see p. 808, letter I, post), and were liable under the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, for failure to take reasonable care in regard to temporary precautions against flooding; further, they would be similarly liable in negligence (see p. 809, letters B and D, post).

C Clay v. A. J. Crump & Sons, Ltd. ([1963] 3 All E.R. 687) applied.

(B) (as between Magnet and Trenthams) (i) Magnet were entitled to recover from Trenthams, as damages for breach of contract by virtue of the terms of the bills of quantities, the sum for which A.M.F. were entitled to judgment against Magnet in respect of damage to timber (see p. 815, letter H, post).

(ii) the extent of the responsibility of Magnet and Trenthams respectively for the damage suffered by A.M.F. was forty per cent. and sixty per cent., and accordingly any contribution mutually recoverable under s. 6 (1) (c), (2) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, in respect of their tortious liability would be in those proportions (see p. 810, letter D, post).

(iii) since Magnet were liable to A.M.F. in tort (see (A) (ii) and (iii) ante) Magnet were not entitled to indemnity under the exception clause (condition 14 (b) of the building contract) for Magnet's negligence had the consequence that Magnet's liability was outside the scope of the indemnity clause, which should be construed so as to extend only to liability of Magnet to third parties arising without negligence on Magnet's part (see p. 815, letters B and C, post).

G Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd. v. Regem ([1952] 1 All E.R. 305) applied.

(C) (as between Magnet and A.M.F., counterclaim by Magnet) Magnet were not entitled to damages against A.M.F. based on A.M.F.'s answer to Magnet's enquiry as to insurance, for the answer was not a representation that A.M.F.'s insurance would cover Magnet against liability for damage to A.M.F.'s property (see p. 801, letters G and H, post).

E Action.

This was an action for damages, brought by A.M.F. International, Ltd. (in this report called "A.M.F.") against Magnet Bowling, Ltd. (in this report called "Magnet") and G. Percy Trentham Co., Ltd. (in this report called "Trenthams") claiming a sum of £21,453 12s. 10d. as damages in respect of damage caused by water entering a building, a bowling centre, then in course of erection

F by Trenthams for Magnet, in which A.M.F.'s equipment, in particular wood for bowling lanes which it was important to keep dry, was being installed by A.M.F. The installation of the timber of sixteen alleys had been almost completed at the time when the water entered. The claim was made in contract and in tort against Magnet and in tort against Trenthams. Magnet claimed indemnity or

G contribution from Trenthams both by virtue of an indemnity clause in their building contract with Trenthams and under s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. The issues are stated at p. 797, letter A, to p. 798, letter D, post. There was no contract between A.M.F. and Trenthams, but both companies contracted directly with Magnet. The price which A.M.F. were to receive under their contract with Magnet for the provision, sale and installation of their equipment in the bowling centre was £57,651 17s. 1d., of which the

H woodwork constituted about £40,000.

John D. Stocker, Q.C., and M. Stuart-Smith for the plaintiffs (A.M.F.).

I. N. Duncan Wallace and Humphrey Lloyd for the first defendants (Magnet).

Bernard Caulfield, Q.C., and P. J. M. Kennedy for the second defendants (Trenthams).

Apr. 3. MOCATTA, J., read the following judgment: The plaintiffs ("A.M.F.") are an English subsidiary of an American company called the American Machine and Foundry Corporation. In this action they claim £21,453 12s. 10d. as damages for breach of contract and in tort against the first defendants and the same sum as damages in tort against the second defendants. Their claim arises out of a flood at the partially constructed bowling centre of the first defendants at Barnsley on July 21, 1964, which caused great damage to A.M.F.'s equipment then being installed. The first defendants, whilst denying all liability to A.M.F., claim an indemnity from the second defendants under the terms of the building contract entered into between the two defendants. Alternatively, the first defendants claim contribution from the second defendants under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. It was agreed on the first day of the trial that I was concerned with liability only. A

A.M.F. (inter alia) manufacture in this country and install the woodwork and machinery required in a modern ten-pin bowling alley. [His LORDSHIP then referred to the growing popularity in this country of the highly sophisticated and mechanised modern form of ten-pin bowling, and after explaining the high precision required in the construction of the lanes, whose surface is composed of pine and maple, kiln dried and with a moisture content of not more than seven per cent., and after indicating the cost of the installation and the value of the woodwork, His Lordship continued:] The first defendants ("Magnet") were incorporated in September, 1963, have their head office in London, and are a subsidiary of the well-known industrial holding company, British Electric Traction, Ltd., whom I will call "B.E.T." Another such subsidiary, called the Potteries Motor Traction Co., Ltd., whom I will call "P.M.T.", with its head office at Stoke-on-Trent, was an associated company of Magnet. At all material times P.M.T. had at their head office an architect's department, of which the head in 1963 and down to May 26, 1964, was one R. C. L. Jones, A.R.I.B.A. Mr. D. C. Smith, who had been working in the architect's department of P.M.T. from 1954, then became chief architect and head of the department. In connexion with the building of their Barnsley bowling alley Magnet made use of P.M.T.'s architect's department. No point was taken that Magnet and P.M.T. were and are separate legal entities and the case was conducted on the basis that Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith could be treated in law as in the whole-time employment of Magnet. B C D E

It is clear that some time in 1963, if not earlier, B.E.T. had decided in principle to go in for bowling alleys in a big way and that, before the incorporation of Magnet in September, 1963, there had been discussions between some manifestation of the group and A.M.F. for the provision and installation by A.M.F. of bowling alley equipment in bowling centres belonging to the group. The main contract between A.M.F. and Magnet was not in fact signed until Mar. 24, 1964, but its principal terms at least must, on the evidence, have been agreed in the late autumn of 1963, if not earlier. Under the main contract it was recited that Magnet intended to establish ten-pin bowling centres at Longton, Barnsley, Mansfield, Crews, Bristol and Cambridge, with varying numbers of lanes, and at further centres in the United Kingdom up to a total of 250 lanes and desired that all those centres should be equipped with bowling equipment to be acquired from A.M.F. on the terms and conditions therein set out. By cl. 2 it was agreed that A.M.F. should sell and Magnet purchase exclusively from A.M.F. 250 bowling lanes and other related bowling equipment, as described in Sch. A to the contract, for installation in ten-pin bowling centres to be established by Magnet in the U.K. on sites approved in advance by A.M.F. By cl. 3 the purchase price was to be the list price generally being quoted by A.M.F. at the time each purchase order was signed by Magnet. By cl. 6 Magnet were, not less than twenty weeks before the date chosen by them for the commencement of the installation of the equipment in each centre, to deliver to A.M.F. a purchase order, which should be accepted by A.M.F., and not less than twelve weeks before the chosen date a duly signed sale agreement in the form attached at Sch. C. Clause 15 contained an exception clause headed "Performance" in the same terms as a similar (1) clause, numbered 5, in Sch. C. Clause 16 provided: F G H I

"So far as is consistent herewith the schedules hereto shall be deemed to be part of the agreement and their terms shall be deemed to be incorporated

A herein, such terms governing inter alia performance of this agreement by A.M.F. and [Magnet].”

Documentation between A.M.F. and Magnet consistently lagged behind the event. The site for the proposed centre at Barnsley, an old car and bus park, seems to have been acquired in or about September, 1963, and a building contract
 B to have been negotiated between Magnet and the second defendants, whom I will call “Trenthams”, in or about November of that year. By Dec. 5 Trenthams were in correspondence with A.M.F. about their provisional building programme, and on Dec. 16 A.M.F. were represented at a meeting with (inter alia) Trenthams at which various details in relation to the building and A.M.F.’s installation were discussed. Trenthams had been given possession of the site
 C on Dec. 9, 1963. Notwithstanding these and other matters, A.M.F. did not provide Magnet with a quotation until Apr. 14, 1964. This was accepted by Magnet on May 5, 1964, in a letter which must be regarded as a purchase order in the language of the main contract; this in turn was acknowledged by A.M.F. on May 7, 1964. It was, however, only the next day that a discussion was opened with A.M.F. as to when they might begin installation. The scheme of the main contract was further departed from in that although A.M.F., at Magnet’s request, began installation on July 6, 1964, and, after the flood of July 21, began a second installation in September, the sale agreement in the form of Sch. C to the main contract, with some deletions made owing to the late date, was not signed by A.M.F. and Magnet until Oct. 29, 1964, by which time installation by A.M.F. had long been completed. Although a point was taken in Magnet’s defence based on this ex post facto documentation, it was not pursued in argument, quite rightly in my opinion. The contractual position as between A.M.F. and Magnet must be determined on the true construction of the main contract and the terms of the form of sale agreement at Sch. C thereto. I must consider those terms in detail later, but it is important to note at this stage that they provided that title to and ownership of the goods should remain in A.M.F. until completion of installation.

Similar ex post facto documentation occurred between Magnet and their builders, Trenthams. The latter are a large and well-known company carrying on business as building contractors. Their head office is in Reading, but they have area offices in Stoke and Liverpool. The building contract between them and Magnet for the construction of the bowling centre on the site mentioned in the centre of Barnsley was a negotiated one, that is to say it did not result from G Magnet calling for tenders from various contractors. The bill of quantities, which formed part of the ultimate written contract in the R.I.B.A. form, was dated November, 1963. Trenthams were given possession of the site on Dec. 9, and immediately began work, but the final contract was not executed until June 2, 1964. Fortunately, again, nothing turns on the late execution of the contract. It is, however, interesting to note that the contract sum for the works to be constructed, called “a bowling centre shell and finishings with ancillary works” was £134,543 13s. 8d. A.M.F. were, of course, not sub-contractors to Trenthams but direct contractors to Magnet. The cost to Magnet of their contract with A.M.F., namely £57,651, was therefore a very substantial addition to the cost of the building contract and if the woodwork element of the A.M.F. contract was in the region of £40,000, it was equivalent in value to nearly H a third of the total cost of the building contract.

I must complete this introduction of the mis-en-scène by referring to Messrs. Clarke & Harper, a firm of architects carrying on their practice from offices in Stoke-on-Trent and, therefore, in close proximity to the architect’s department of P.M.T. and the area office of Trenthams. One partner in this firm was Mr. Harper, who was not called as a witness, and another was Mr. Bate, who was. The exact relationship of Clarke & Harper to Mr. Jones, Mr. Smith and Magnet was the subject of much evidence and argument, since if I found negligence on the part of the firm, it was contended for Magnet that they were not vicariously responsible for it in tort. The appointment of Mr. Harper or his firm was contained in a much debated letter from Mr. Jones of Sept. 20, 1963, to which I must return later, but which it is convenient to read at this stage. The letter is addressed to A. R. Harper, Esq., A.R.I.B.A., Messrs. Clarke & Harper, 86 Moorland Road, Burslem, Stoke-on-Trent. A

"Dear Mr. Harper, Bowling Centre at Barnsley Following our recent meetings regarding your capacity for carrying out certain architectural services for me, I now confirm that I would like you to act for me in the above project along the lines we discussed and I am to retain overall professional responsibility as consulting architect for this and any other similar project which I may decide to release to you, and my name is to appear on all principal drawings. All matters of policy to be decided by me and copies of any relative important correspondence you may have with others are to be forwarded to me. All drawings are to be forwarded for perusal and must bear my approval stamp before being released. Specialists, suppliers and nominated sub-contractors to be approved by me. Mining engineers, soil investigation reports, quantity surveyors and all other consultants to be nominated by me and their fees will be paid direct. If not already in existence, your firm is to provide and prove that you hold professional indemnity insurance sufficient for the projects upon which you will be engaged. By reason of my overall responsibility, copyright on all drawings to be vested in me. Regarding our present arrangement on fees these to be based on [two-thirds of] the standard R.I.B.A. scale for new works and I also confirm that, in order to assist your firm financially, I am prepared to sanction intermediate fees accounts at rather more frequent intervals than provided for in the scale at such times as may be mutually agreed. An appropriate scale of fees will require to be discussed and agreed when considering standardization of Centres if and when the need transpires. For the present time all correspondence and drawings forwarded to this office must be addressed to me personally marked 'Strictly Confidential'. Yours sincerely, (signed) R. C. L. Jones, A.R.I.B.A., Company Architect." B C D E F

The articles of the building contract recited that drawings and bills of quantities had been prepared by or under the direction of "Clarke & Harper, A.R.I.B.A. . . . and R. C. L. Jones, Esq., A.R.I.B.A., consultant architect of P.M.T.", and provided that the term "the architect" in the conditions of the R.I.B.A. form should mean "A. S. Harper A.R.I.B.A. of Clarke & Harper". From the evidence it appeared that, although Mr. Harper played some part in the work performed by his firm in relation to the building contract, the lion's share fell to Mr. Bate. I should add that in March, 1966, before serving their defence, Magnet initiated third party proceedings against Clarke & Harper based on allegations of professional negligence by the latter and pleadings took place therein. Shortly before the trial, however, Magnet discontinued those proceedings. G H

The trial of this action took five long weeks during the course of which the pleadings were extensively amended and re-amended. In part the length of the trial and the need for amendments was due to very indifferent discovery, particularly on the part of Trenthams, but to some extent also on the part of Magnet. Apart, however, from what came to light as the result of additional discovery given frankly and fully after the trial had started, the original defences of Magnet and Trenthams required considerable amendment. Ultimately the pleadings did cover the major points arising, though not of course all the issues in law, and before going further into the facts it will be convenient if I briefly summarise the salient issues of fact and law. I omit points pleaded, such as nuisance and estoppel, which were not pursued in the later stages of the trial. I

There is no doubt that a considerable quantity of water entered the uncompleted building during the afternoon of July 21, 1964, causing serious damage

A to the timber which A.M.F. then had on the premises with which they were constructing the thirty-two bowling alleys. The installation of the timber work of sixteen of such alleys had been more or less completed at the time. As regards this entry of water it was in issue, as primary matters of fact, (i) whether the water entered through (a) the roof (b) a doorway at the N.E. corner of the building and/or (c) another doorway at the N.W. corner: (ii) if it entered at all through either

B of the doorways, whether its source was in whole or in part (a) the rainwater stacks from the gutter running along the north wall, (b) backpounding through an incomplete twelve-inch diameter drain ending in the open more or less opposite the N.E. doorway, (c) run-off from higher land to the north and east of the building, (d) an uncharted drain, exposed during excavation for foundations, coming from the N.E. and S.E. and open near to and a little to the south of the

C N.E. corner of the building.

The next question arising, which is perhaps a mixed question of law and fact, is whether the entry of water, consequent on the exceptionally heavy storm that undoubtedly occurred, was reasonably foreseeable as a possible cause of damage and was a risk of the type which a reasonable man would take steps to guard against. On this point, counsel for Magnet took up the cudgels for the

D defence, receiving only the most luke-warm support from counsel for Trenthams, and argued strongly that on the facts and law this was an act of God. He prayed this in aid as a defence both in contract and in tort.

A.M.F.'s case against Magnet in contract stated shortly was, first, that the state of the building on July 6, 1964, and thereafter until July 21 was such that it was not ready to receive A.M.F.'s timber and that there was a breach of an express

E term of the contract contained in the sale agreement in Sch. C to the main contract (2); secondly, that, in the alternative, there was a breach of an implied term as to the fitness of the building. Magnet denied that on the true construction of the contract there was any relevant express term, but admitted there was an implied term as to fitness the breach of which was denied. Magnet further relied on the exception clause (3) in their contract with A.M.F.

F A.M.F.'s case in tort against Magnet was based alternatively on the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, or the general law of negligence as exemplified in Donoghue v. Stevenson (4). As regards liability under the Act of 1957, counsel for A.M.F. argued that s. 2 (4) (b) had no application (5) because (a) on the facts there was nonfeasance here and not faulty execution of any work, etc., and (b) Magnet had not taken reasonable steps to satisfy themselves that Trenthams had done their

G work properly. If (which was denied) Clarke & Harper were independent contractors, Magnet could not, as a matter of construction of the Act of 1957, escape liability by reason thereof. Magnet's answer was that, whilst admitting that they were occupiers, they were not liable for the negligence, if there were any, of Trenthams or Clarke & Harper, both of whom were independent contractors; alternatively, that they brought themselves within s. 2 (4) (b). They raised the

H same defence as regards independent contractors in answer to the claim in tort outside the Act. In connexion with these points taken on behalf of Magnet the relationship between Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith on the one hand and Clarke & Harper on the other became relevant. The answer of counsel for A.M.F., with which counsel for Trenthams joined, was that (i) Clarke & Harper were not, on the most unusual facts here, independent contractors and (ii) if they were, they were not properly instructed by Mr. Smith. Finally Magnet raised a counterclaim, if they were liable, based on the principle in Hedley Byrne & Co., Ltd. v. Heller & Partners, Ltd. (6).

(4) [1932] All E.R. Rep. 1; [1932] A.C. 562.

I (5) Section 2 (4) of the Act of 1957 provides that "In determining whether the occupier of premises has discharged the common duty of care to a visitor, regard is to be had to all the circumstances, so that (for example) - . . . (b) where damage is caused to a visitor by a danger due to the faulty execution of any work of construction, maintenance or repair by an independent contractor employed by the occupier, the occupier is not to be treated without more as answerable for the danger if in all the circumstances he had acted reasonably in entrusting the work to an independent contractor and had taken such steps (if any) as he reasonably ought in order to satisfy himself that the contractor was competent and that the work had been properly done".

As against Trenthams, A.M.F. relied on the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, and the general law of negligence. Counsel for Trenthams argued that Trenthams were not occupiers and that, owing to the interposition of Clarke & Harper and Magnet between them and A.M.F. they could not be liable to the latter. He also raised a novel and interesting point as to the damages recoverable under the Act of 1957 for damage to property. As between the two defendants, Magnet relied on (a) an indemnity (7) under cl. 14 (b) of the building contract and (b) the provisions of the bill of quantities. Alternatively they claimed one hundred per cent. contribution under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935. Trenthams raised various points of construction and law in answer to the contractual claims and, as regards contribution, argued that on the facts Magnet were at least equally to blame and that, at the worst, liability should be borne equally.

I will now make my findings as to how the water entered the building and its source or sources. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence as to the entry of the water in to the building and concerning the guttering and drainage. The building was in essence a shell with a concrete slab base of 190 feet from east to west and 92 feet from north to south on which the bowling alley lanes were being constructed. On a visit to the site on June 10, 1964, Mr. Smith had observed water on the concrete floor, and was somewhat alarmed by this, since by then it had been agreed by A.M.F. that they would begin installation on July 6, and Mr. Smith, as well as Trenthams' site agent (Mr. Tyrer, who left on July 10, 1964), Mr. Bate of Clarke & Harper, Mr. Dravers (Magnet's general manager) and Mr. Normington (Magnet's sales executive) all knew, as they always had, of the great importance of complete dryness and absence of damp to the woodwork of the bowling lanes. A plank or board was set, prior to the flooding, across the threshold of the north-east doorway. The doorway had been fitted with a wire framework covered in polythene to keep out rain and moisture, but the door had not yet been fitted. The level of the ground to the north-east of the building was materially higher than that of the concrete floor of the building and of a sump, which had been formed by excavation adjacent to the threshold of the doorway. The sub-soil in the area was clay. The rainfall during the week-end prior to Tuesday, July 21, 1964, was heavy. On the afternoon of July 21 an estimated rainfall of 2.63 inches fell during the one hundred minutes of the storm. HIS LORDSHIP found that all the water that entered the building and damaged A.M.F.'s timber came through the doorway at the north-east corner of the building, where it was seen by a foreman on the site at the time pouring over the board that had been let into the threshold. The bottom portion of the wire framework over the door had been bent inward and upwards by the pressure of the water. The architect expert witnesses called by the parties agreed that the drainage of a building should be designed to deal with rainfall at a rate of three inches per hour for ten minutes. HIS LORDSHIP found that unconnected rainwater stacks were a source of the water that entered the building, and that water from the two most easterly stacks could have found its way into the sump and thence through the doorway of the building; he further found that an additional source of the water was from the land to the north and north-east of the doorway, from which water could have run off. Thus the source of the water was from the roof and from the higher land. HIS LORDSHIP considered an argument on behalf of Magnet that the danger of the storm on July 21, 1964, was so unexpected and exceptional that failure to take special steps to guard against it were not negligence; after considering the decisions in

(7) Clause 14 (b) of the building contract is set out at p. 810, letter G, post.

- A Nichols v. Marsland (8), Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (9), and Greenock Corpn. v. Caledonian Ry. Co. (10), relevant to the defence of the act of God, HIS LORDSHIP continued:] On the evidence I take the view and find as a fact that that the risk of water collecting in the sump and overcoming the not very robust defences of the threshold was readily foreseeable, that it could have been fairly easily guarded against and that steps should have been taken to guard against it over and above what was done, particularly in view of the special and known susceptibility of the A.M.F. timber and its value. [HIS LORDSHIP then considered the evidence given by the three architect expert witnesses, all of whom were agreed that the danger was evident and suggested precautions which could have been taken to prevent the ingress of water into the building. HIS LORDSHIP also referred to the evidence of Trenthams' site agent (who had left on July 10, 1964, and not been succeeded by another site agent till the day of the flood) that had A.M.F. been subcontractors of Trenthams, he would not with his ordinary knowledge of the English climate have allowed A.M.F. to bring in their valuable equipment until he had been perfectly satisfied that the building was thoroughly watertight. HIS LORDSHIP then continued:] I need say little more on this matter. It is true no water entered during the week-end and that it is impossible to say what intensity of rainfall was required to force an entry. In view, however, of the evidence as to the obvious danger of flooding and risk of damage and the relatively simple precautions that could have been taken, apart altogether from giving warning of the risk involved before A.M.F. were allowed in, I am quite unable to accede to the argument of Magnet's counsel. I think that he signally failed to establish that an act of God took place within LORD WESTBURY'S definition in Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (11), namely,

"circumstances which no human foresight can provide against, and of which human prudence is not bound to recognise the possibility."

I can now deal with A.M.F.'s claim in contract against Magnet. Clause 3 of Sch. C to the main agreement between them reads as follows:

- F " (A) The purchaser shall make at its own expense and in accordance with A.M.F. specifications all alterations and changes to the bowling centre and its equipment required for the installation of the said goods (including without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing main electrical conduits and wiring and a flat concrete surface for the machines and lanes, all to A.M.F. specifications) and shall ensure that the heating installation of the bowling centre shall have been continuously operating for not less than seven days immediately preceding the commencement of the installation by A.M.F. (B) The bowling centre shall be ready to accept delivery of the said goods and for the commencement and uninterrupted performance of their installation therein on or about . . . 196 . . . and the purchaser hereby agrees to confirm the said date to A.M.F. at least . . . days prior thereto. (C) Subject to compliance by the purchaser with the provisions of paras. (A) and (B) of this clause A.M.F. shall deliver and install the said goods within . . . days following the date referred to in cl. 3 (b) above and agrees to notify the purchaser of the estimated date of delivery at least fourteen days prior thereto."

- I Counsel for A.M.F. argued that on the facts the bowling centre was plainly not ready to accept delivery of A.M.F.'s goods on July 6, 1964, and that there was a clear breach of an express term of the contract. He did not claim that the obligation as to the physical readiness of the building made Magnet an insurer. He submitted that cl. 3 (B) amounted to an undertaking that the building would (inter alia) be watertight against all reasonably foreseeable risks. Counsel for Magnet argued that cl. 3 (B) only referred to freedom from interference by other work or subcontractors and availability of space. Fitness of the building qualitatively was covered by cl. 3 (A). I think this argument unsound. Clause 3 (A) only refers to certain aspects of the qualitative fitness of the building. Indeed the first half seems wholly inappropriate to a purpose-built building as distinct from one being adapted. The second half only deals with heating. Accordingly I think counsel for A.M.F. right in his express term argument.

This is, however, a little academic since counsel for A.M.F. and counsel for Magnet were ad idem that if the word "ready" in cl. 3 (B) did not include watertightness, there must be an implied term that the building should be fit for the reception of A.M.F.'s timber, such fitness to include watertightness and to be judged by the standard of the exercise of reasonable care. On my findings, regardless of whether the failure to exercise reasonable care to protect against flood damage was that of Trenthams, of Clarke & Harper, of Mr. Smith, or of someone else in Magnet or of some or all of them, it is plain that A.M.F. must succeed in contract, subject to the argument of counsel for Trenthams on the exception clause, with which I now deal.

Clause 5, headed "Performance", of Sch. C reads:

"Neither party shall be liable to the other for any loss or damage caused by delays in or failure of performance of any part of this agreement occasioned by war or warlike operations fire flood embargo transport shortage accident explosion act of God confiscation or commandeering or wilful destruction by any government or governmental authority or by any municipal or local authority materially affecting this agreement strike lockout or any labour troubles stoppage of or interference with or reduction of the supply of materials relevant to this agreement whether because of governmental action affecting either or both of the parties or their suppliers any action suit or proceeding at law or in equity or otherwise or any events whatsoever over which the parties have no control."

Counsel for Magnet argued that they were protected by the word "flood" in this clause and, even if they were negligent by themselves, their servants or agents, on the application of the well-known principle laid down in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. (12), the exception clause still applied. In my judgment the clause is inapplicable to the facts here as I have found them, regardless of whether that principle applies on the true construction of the clause to negligence by Magnet. A.M.F.'s timber was damaged by reason of the failure of performance of Magnet to comply with the express or implied terms as to readiness. That failure existed on July 6; it was in no way occasioned by flood. The argument fails in limine. It fails for similar reasons as an answer to A.M.F.'s claims in tort if those are otherwise well founded.

It is convenient to deal here with Magnet's counterclaim, though this, if sound, applies whether A.M.F. succeed in contract or in tort. The counterclaim relies on paras. 4 (f) and 9 of the defence, which I must read:

"(4) . . . In rebuttal of the alleged implied term the defendants will rely on the facts and/or contentions: . . . (f) that on or about the date for starting work, the plaintiffs by one Mayard in response to a specific enquiry assured one Normington on behalf of the defendants that the parties' interests in the plaintiffs' equipment and materials were covered by insurance taken out by the plaintiffs against all risks during the period of installation.

"(9) Further or alternatively, in reliance upon the plaintiffs' representation set out in para. 4 (f) hereof the defendants did not (as they were willing and able to do) insure their interest in the plaintiffs' materials and equipment against all risks, and the defendants will contend that the plaintiffs are thereby estopped from claiming damages for breach of contract in respect of A any matter insurable under an all risks policy, and in particular the matters relied upon in the statement of claim in this action."

The counterclaim is:

B "By way of counterclaim the defendants repeat paras. 4 (f) and 9 hereof. The representation made by the plaintiffs set out therein was made in the knowledge that it would be acted on by the defendants and in circumstances where the plaintiffs owed the defendants a duty of care in relation thereto, but in breach of the said duty the statement was inaccurate in that only the plaintiffs' interest in their goods and materials was insured and the defendants have thereby suffered damage equivalent to any sum awarded to the plaintiffs in this action."

C On the evidence as it came out the facts proved fell far short of what would be required to support the counterclaim based on Hedley Byrne & Co., Ltd. v. Heller & Partners, Ltd. (13). I have already pointed out that A.M.F. were direct and not sub-contractors. Accordingly the provisions of the building contract between Magnet and Trenthams regarding insurance were inapplicable to A.M.F.'s timber. Mr. Smith, as appears from the correspondence, drew this to the attention of D Mr. Normington shortly before July 7, 1964, and asked him to enquire of A.M.F. as to the insurance position. Mr. Normington accordingly paid a visit to Mr. Mayard, whose office was a few doors away. He asked Mr. Mayard the specific question whether or not A.M.F.'s insurance covered the period of installation. Mr. Normington said he was assured by Mr. Mayard that it did so and he reported accordingly to Mr. Dravers, Magnet's general manager. In answer Mr. Dravers E wrote to Mr. Smith on July 9, 1964, as follows:

"I confirm the information given you by Mr. Normington that A.M.F. cover all their own risks prior to a centre being handed over to the operator."

F Mr. Normington confirmed in evidence that that letter accurately set out what he had told Mr. Dravers and what Mr. Mayard told him. Mr. Mayard had no recollection of any such conversation, but I accept that it took place in the terms spoken to by Mr. Normington. That is the totality of the evidence on this point, save that if Mr. Dravers had appreciated that A.M.F.'s policy did not cover Magnet against liability for damage to A.M.F.'s property, Mr. Dravers would have seen that Magnet insured. There was clearly no express representation by Mr. Mayard that A.M.F.'s insurance covered any interest but their own. Nor is there any G evidence that Mr. Mayard's mind was specifically directed to the question whether A.M.F.'s insurance went any further than he said it did. He was asked a specific question and gave an accurate answer. A.M.F. cannot be held to blame or to be under any legal liability if the Magnet personnel concerned misconstrued Mr. Mayard's answer or were ignorant of or not alive to the relevance of the doctrine of subrogation. The counterclaim, therefore, fails.

H I must now deal with A.M.F.'s alternative claims in tort against Magnet, primarily because they are very material to the position as between the two defendants, and also lest I should be wrong in my decision that A.M.F. are entitled to succeed in contract. I will first deal with their claim under the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957. It is admitted that Magnet were occupiers. Counsel for A.M.F. submitted, first, that, unless someone who was sued under the Act as an occupier could bring himself within s. 2 (4) (b), it was of no avail to him to establish that he had employed a qualified independent contractor and that the latter had been negligent (14). In particular, in support of this argument he relied on the words in s. 2 (4) (b) "the occupier is not to be treated without more as answerable for the danger", etc. (The italics are mine.) It seems to me there is I great weight in this argument, at least in cases to which the opening words of s. 2 (4) (b) apply, namely, "where damage is caused to a visitor by a danger due to the faulty execution of any work of construction, maintenance or repair", and I accept it. Secondly, counsel for A.M.F. argued that on the facts here s. 2 (4) (b) had no application for the following reasons: (i) the facts did not bring the case within the words "faulty execution of any work of construction, maintenance or repair", because here nothing was done at all to drain the area around the north and north-east corner of the building. It was a case of non-feasance, not faulty execution; (ii) whilst it was reasonable to entrust the work of flood precautions to Trenthams, who are experienced builders of high repute, this was a case in which Magnet should have taken steps to see that Trenthams did or had done their work properly, that they could not as a matter of law escape liability if they left this to Clarke & Harper (assuming the latter to have been negligent) on the grounds that they in turn were independent contractors; (iii) alternatively, on the facts the defence that Clarke & Harper were independent contractors, if otherwise good, was not available to Magnet, since Clarke & Harper were never properly instructed on the relevant matter; (iv) on the peculiar and very special facts Clarke & Harper were not independent contractors; (v) Magnet were themselves in the person of Mr. Smith or alternatively Mr. Bate responsible for seeing that Trenthams did their work properly, and both Mr. Smith and Mr. Bate were negligent in this respect.

(14) Section 2 (4) (b) is set out at footnote (5), ante.

Points (i) and (ii) are points primarily of law and of considerable importance, but they can fortunately be dealt with shortly. The other three points require further examination of the evidence. As to (i) I approach the point of construction with a self-confessed reluctance to adopt too rigid and technical an interpretation of an Act passed to bring order into what had become, notwithstanding the clarity of the words of WILLES, J., in Indermaur v. Dames (15), a jungle of technicalities and refinements. It seems to me that if a builder in the course of constructing a building fails to take adequate precautions against flooding and that causes damage to the property of a visitor, it would be altogether too technical to hold this not within the true construction of the words "a danger due to the faulty execution of any work of construction, maintenance or repair". It is true that no ultimate drainage work of any kind relevant to the protection of the N.E. doorway had been done. On the other hand the upright board had been fixed across the threshold and the polythene screen fitted to the doorway and, according to Mr. Kelly, there was the small trench or gulley which it was the handyman's duty to keep free from silt. Something, however inadequate, had therefore been done to prevent flooding during the work of construction. I would hold that this was sufficient to bring the matter within the words "faulty execution of any work of construction" or "maintenance". I would add that the bill of quantities provides in item 1/8/B:

"Provide as necessary for the diversion of storm water to requisite channels, drains, etc., and provide temporary connections, as may be required, where storm and foul drains are to be diverted."

Counsel for Trenthams argued that on its true construction this provision only applied when storm and foul drains were to be diverted, but in my view the two halves of the sentence are plainly to be read disjunctively. This provision constituted part of the obligations of Trenthams under the building contract. This may not be conclusive, but supports my view that the facts here do fall within the words in question. I reject this argument of counsel for A.M.F.

As to (ii), s. 2 (4) (b) of the Act of 1957 (16) contemplates that it may be reasonable to delegate work of construction or maintenance to an independent contractor. It is accepted, clearly rightly, that it was reasonable for Magnet to employ Trenthams. But the subsection also contemplates that in such circumstances, in determining whether the occupier has discharged the common duty of care, the court may further have to consider whether the occupier ought to have taken

(16) For s. 2 (4) (b), see footnote (5), ante.

A any steps to satisfy himself that the work had been properly done by the independent contractor. In the case of the construction of a substantial building, or of a ship, I should have thought that the building owner, if he is to escape subsequent tortious liability for faulty construction, should not only take care to contract with a competent contractor or shipbuilder, but also to cause that work to be supervised by a properly qualified professional man such as an architect or surveyor, or a naval architect or Lloyd's surveyor. Such cases are different in fact and in everyday practice from having a flat re-wired (as in Green v. Fibreglass, Ltd. (17)).

Whilst these examples refer to completed work, I cannot think that different principles can apply to precautions during the course of construction, if the building owner is going to invite a third party to bring valuable property on to the site during construction. Whilst it may well be that an architect employed by a building owner to supervise construction by a builder has no power under the building contract to dictate how the builder is to perform the contract or what temporary steps he should take during construction to guard against flooding, nevertheless advice from the architect to the builder may have the desired effect. Above all, however, if the architect is dissatisfied with such precautions and cannot persuade the builder to improve them, he will be able to inform the building owner of the position. The latter will then be able not to invite the third party on to the site, or postpone the invitation, or, possibly, obtain the third party's consent to entry at his own risk. I think, therefore, Magnet should have taken steps, before inviting and allowing A.M.F. to enter, to satisfy themselves that Trenthams had done their work properly including temporary anti-flood precautions, and there is no doubt they could have done this either by Mr. Bate or Mr. Smith.

So far on this point I accept the argument of counsel for A.M.F. and reject that of counsel for Magnet, who submitted, as I understood him, that Magnet only needed to rely on s. 2 (4) (b) in respect of damage to property if that was caused by some fault in the permanent design of the building by their architects. Counsel for A.M.F. continued, however, that if the architect employed to supervise the building was an independent contractor and was negligent, Magnet had not brought themselves within the words "and had taken such steps (if any) as he reasonably ought in order to satisfy himself that . . . the work had been properly done."

The latter words, counsel submitted, imposed a personal and non-delegable obligation.

I cannot accept this argument as applying regardless of the circumstances. In my judgment, in cases like I have decided the present to be, where it is reasonable for the occupier to employ an independent contractor to perform technical work and he ought to see that the work has been properly done, then, if, as here, it was reasonable for him to perform the latter duty through a professional man as an independent contractor, he is not to be rendered liable because of negligence by the latter. This would revive what was thought, on one view of it, to be the anomaly in Thomson v. Cremin (18). It would also, in effect, in technical cases equate the "common duty of care" under the Act with the obligation of an underwriter under an all risks policy. The view which I have expressed derives by analogy some support from Waulle v. Wallsend Shipping Co., Ltd. (19). The contrary view involves "an almost unlimited retrogression" (20).

I must now deal with the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs at point (iii), namely, that if, in accordance with the conclusion which I have just reached, Magnet could escape liability for faulty supervision or lack of precautions (if any) taken by Mr. Bate on the grounds that he was an independent contractor, that defence is not available to them since they never instructed him or his firm properly on the relevant matter. I assume for this purpose that Mr. Bate, a qualified architect and partner in a firm of qualified architects, was vis-à-vis Magnet an independent contractor. There is no doubt that when a building owner employs a qualified architect in private practice in connexion with the construction of a building, unless there are some other quite unusual circumstances, the architect is an independent contractor: see per SALMON, J., in Clayton v. Woodman & Son (Builders), Ltd. (21). The decision was reversed on another point (22). That case, in both courts, further establishes that an architect has no right to instruct a builder how his work is to be done or the safety precautions to be taken. It is the function and right of the builder to carry out his own building operations as he thinks fit. The architect, on the other hand, is engaged as the agent of the owner for whom the building is being erected, and his function is (inter alia) to make sure that in the end, when the work has been completed, the owner will have a building properly constructed in accordance with the contract and any supplementary instructions which the architect may have given: per PEARSON, L.J. (23).

The flood in this case occurred when the building was far from complete and when no permanent drainage, save the north and south culvert had been completed. The lack of precautions which allowed the water into the building was of temporary steps necessary during the course of construction. I have already referred to the provision in the bill of quantities at item 1/8/B in relation to the diversion of storm water (24). There were other comparable provisions in the bill of quantities. Thus item 1/5/C reads "allow for protection of all work and materials from injury by weather or any other cause", and item 1/6/E "cover and ease up and protect all work whensoever as needed". Counsel for Trenthams argued that the "work" in those provisions is the work of construction: counsel for Magnet riposted that the "work" included work being undertaken by direct contractors like A.M.F.; see condition 23 of the building contract. I find it unnecessary to decide this point: "the work" clearly included the concrete floor of the unfinished building. In addition item 2/1/B provided that no water was to be allowed to accumulate on any part of the site. All these were obligations falling on Trenthams in the course of construction. They did not affect the safety, fitness or watertightness of the building once construction was completed. Accordingly, if Mr. Bate was not consulted by Trenthams about flood precautions and never gave them his advice on the subject, there is considerable difficulty on the facts as I have so far stated them, and on the statements as to the functions of an architect in Clayton v. Woodman & Son (Builders), Ltd. (25), which I have cited, in blaming Mr. Bate for what occurred. Unless he were asked by Magnet for his advice as to the fitness of the building to receive A.M.F.'s timber, or to ensure its safety, I do not think, on the authority of Clayton v. Woodman & Son (Builders), Ltd. (26), that I could hold him in law to blame for not warning Magnet to prevent A.M.F. coming in until the position had been secured and in not seeking to persuade Trenthams to do more than they did. However, the present question is whether Magnet ever instructed Mr. Bate on the problem, i.e. did they ask his professional advice whether it was or would be safe for them to invite A.M.F. to start installation on July 6, 1964, or give him instructions either to achieve safety from flood damage by that date or warn them if this was not achieved? In my view of the

- A evidence the answers are in the negative. Mr. Smith admitted he never specifically told Clarke & Harper to make sure things were ready for A.M.F. Mr. Bate said he was never asked to express his opinion if the building was or would be ready for A.M.F. and that the decision to invite A.M.F. on to the site was not his; he said he regarded it as a definite instruction. The correspondence, on my reading of it, confirms this oral evidence. It is true that Mr. Smith had an assurance from
- B Trenthams that they would be ready though they clearly thought it would be a tight fit. For the reasons which I have already given, however, I do not think Magnet were entitled to rely on that without checking on it, either by Mr. Bate or Mr. Smith or some other suitably qualified person, in relation to the safety of the valuable and sensitive property, which they were inviting A.M.F. to bring into the building.
- C Counsel for Magnet sought to avoid the consequences of the above by arguing on the evidence that if Magnet had specifically consulted Mr. Bate on the question whether it was safe for A.M.F. to start their installation work on July 6, he would have answered in the affirmative. Having carefully considered Mr. Bate's evidence and the way he gave it, I am, however, not satisfied that this would have been the case. I am sure he would have devoted some real attention to the matter,
- D which he did not in fact do, and he might well, as I am satisfied he should have, at least have given a warning. Accordingly, if Mr. Bate is properly to be regarded as an independent contractor vis-à-vis Magnet, I accept the argument of counsel for A.M.F. that this is of no assistance to them.

- In view of this, point (iv) in counsel's argument (27) does not strictly speaking arise for my decision. Nevertheless it was much debated both in argument and
- E on the evidence. I think, therefore that I should express my view on the matter. I have already stated what is the general position in relation to the employment of an architect in private practice by reference to what was said by SALMON, J., in Clayton v. Woodman & Son (Builders), Ltd. (28). The special facts here were, however, at least strange. I have already read the letter of appointment by Mr. Jones of Clarke & Harper dated Sept. 20, 1963 (29). That letter refers to "certain
- F architectural services" and "along the lines we discussed". Neither Mr. Harper nor Mr. Jones was called, so one is left in some doubt what those words were intended to cover. Mr. Jones was dismissed by P.M.T. on May 26, 1964. His place as head of P.M.T.'s architect's department was immediately taken by Mr. Smith. He, as well as Mr. Dravers, Magnet's general manager, was unaware of the letter of Sept. 20, 1963, until it was found, not on the appropriate file,
- G in December, 1964. It is common practice for government departments, local authorities and large companies with much building or property maintenance work to employ qualified architects within their own organisations on a salaried basis (whom for convenience and without intending any offence I will call "tame architects") and also, for specific projects, to employ architects in private practice as "project" architects, who would undoubtedly for the purposes of the law of
- H tort be regarded as independent contractors. However, I am quite unable, on the special and peculiar facts of this case and in the absence of any evidence from Mr. Harper and Mr. Jones, to hold that Clarke & Harper or the partners in that firm were independent contractors vis-à-vis Magnet. The letter (30) states that Mr. Jones is to retain overall professional responsibility, is to decide all matters of policy and to approve all drawings. Mr. Hammett (31) said these expressions
- I were unusual as between a building owner with a tame architect and a project architect. Mr. Hodgkiss, who acted after Mr. Smith took over as a clerk of works, was appointed by Mr. Smith. Mr. Fairweather (32) said this was unusual in that in his experience the project architect appointed the clerk of works although the latter was paid by and acted for the building owner. In the experience of both these expert witnesses tame architects, when their names appeared on bills of quantities, etc., were usually called "associate architects" and not "consultants" as Mr. Jones was described in the letter in the preamble to the articles of the building contract and on the bill of quantities. Whilst Mr. Harper of Clarke & Harper is described in the articles to the building contract themselves as "the architect" referred to in the conditions of the contract and under condition 24 was to grant interim certificates, those certificates which have been produced show that in all cases save one Mr. Jones or Mr. Smith countersigned the certificates before payment, in addition to the signatures of Mr. Harper or Mr. Bate, but that in one case only Mr. Smith signed the certificate. Whilst some letters in the correspondence use the language one would expect if the relationship were the normal one of tame and project architects, others seem to depart strikingly from that norm. I refer to Mr. Smith's important letter of June 16, 1964, written directly to Trenthams; to his letter of July 31, 1964, to Trenthams, particularly the last two paragraphs; and to Mr. Dravers's letter of June 30, 1964, to Mr. Smith, though this is I think of less importance, both because Mr. Dravers was a layman and also because of the explanation he gave that he wrote as he did to give self-confidence to Mr. Smith, who had recently succeeded Mr. Jones as head of P.M.T.'s architect's department, but, although very experienced, had no professional architectural qualifications. None of the above matters is perhaps by itself conclusive, though the terminology of the letter (33) of Sept. 20, 1963, to my mind points strongly against the independent contractor relationship. It is, however, sufficient for me to hold as I do that that relationship has not been established on the evidence before me and, in consequence, Magnet are unable to rely on it for the purpose of escaping tortious liability.

(27) Viz., that Clarke & Harper were not independent contractors (see at p. 804, letter A, ante).

I now come to counsel for the plaintiff's final point, point (v), which can be dealt with quite shortly (34). On my previous findings and decisions Magnet should have taken some steps, either through Mr. Smith or Mr. Bate or some other qualified person, to check on Trenthams' statements that they would be ready for A.M.F. to start installation on July 6, 1964. It is clear on the evidence that no proper steps were taken by either Mr. Smith or Mr. Bate. Mr. Bate was not asked or instructed to check and advise on the matter and made no attempt to do so. Mr. Smith admittedly carried out no inspection himself in relation to the suitability of anti-flooding precautions. No instructions were given to any other qualified person. Accordingly Magnet cannot escape liability in tort under the Occupiers' Liability Act. In view of this conclusion the question of Magnet's liability in tort under the Donoghue v. Stevenson (35) principle does not arise.

A final point was raised by counsel for Trenthams on behalf of the builders in their defence against the claim of A.M.F. against them in tort. If good, this point is equally available to Magnet in answer to A.M.F.'s claim against them in tort, so I deal with it here. In so far as A.M.F.'s claim rested on the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, the argument was that the sum recoverable must be limited as the result of the words "in respect of damage to property" in s. 1 (3) (b) of the Act of 1957, (36) to physical damage and that consequential financial loss was irrecoverable. Counsel for Trenthams expressly disclaimed any reliance on this point in answer to A.M.F.'s alternative tortious claim against the builders based on the principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson (35). As I have said, by agreement between all the parties I was not concerned at the trial with the quantum of A.M.F.'s claim, and, unless this can be agreed, the assessment of their damages must be referred to an official referee for determination. In consequence no evidence has been led about the particulars of the damages claimed amounting to a total of £21,453 12s. 10d.

(36) Section 1 (3) (b) of the Act of 1957 is set out at p. 807, letter E, post.

A and I have given no consideration to the details pleaded. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, admitted that the salvage expenses claimed, amounting as pleaded to £476 14s. 4d., might be considered as consequential financial loss flowing from the damage to the timber. It was agreed by all counsel concerned that I should decide the point of law raised by counsel for Trenthams as a matter of principle, leaving its application to the details of the claim, if not agreed, to be decided ultimately by the official referee. In dealing with the point I therefore express no view one way or the other as to which, if any, of the items making up the total claim can properly be considered as items of financial loss consequential on damage to the timber as distinct from items quantifying the physical damage caused to the timber itself.

Section 1 (1) of the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, provides that:

"The rules enacted by [s. 2 and s. 3] shall have effect, in place of the rules of the common law, to regulate the duty which an occupier of premises owes to his visitors in respect of dangers due to the state of the premises or to things done or omitted to be done on them."

If the Act of 1957 had stopped there, it would have been arguable that the rules in s. 2 and s. 3, which nowhere mention damage to property (37), had no application to such damage. Section 1 (3), however, provides that those rules

"... shall also apply, in like manner and to the like extent as the principles applicable at common law to an occupier of premises and his invitees or licensees would apply, to regulate— . . . (b) the obligations of a person occupying or having control over any premises or structure in respect of damage to property, including the property of persons who are not themselves his visitors."

Prior to the passing of the Act of 1957 there was some doubt as to the extent to which an invitor's duty was to prevent damage not only to the person of his invitee, but also to his property: see SALMOND ON LAW OF TORTS (14th Edn.), p. 379. It seems clear, however, from Workington Harbour and Dock Board v. Owners of S.S. Towerfield (38), particularly per LORD PORTER (39), LORD NORMAND (40) and LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON (41), that a duty to prevent damage to property did exist, though there was a difficult series of cases on the extent of such duty in the case of loss of property by theft (see the article by PROFESSOR GOODHART in 73 L.Q.R., p. 313). In my judgment the effect of the somewhat cautious provisions of s. 1 (3) (b) of the Act of 1957 was to recognise that the common law did have principles placing obligations on an invitor in relation to the prevention of damage to the property of his invitee and to substitute for those principles the rules in s. 2 and s. 3, but only to the extent to which such common law principles would have applied. In other words if the common law principles did not, rightly understood, apply, for example, to loss by theft, neither would the new rules in the Act of 1957. So much was not really disputed before me, but stress was laid on the apparently narrow wording used, i.e., "in respect of damage to property". Suppose for example, a visitor brought on to the occupier's premises a car used by him for hiring out and this was damaged by a dangerous wall falling on it. Could the visitor recover in damages not only the cost of repairing the car, but also his loss of earnings from hirings whilst the car was undergoing repair? In my judgment this question should be answered in the affirmative and the argument of counsel for Trenthams should be rejected. The rules in s. 2 and s. 3, which are substituted for the principles applicable at common law (42), define a duty and make no attempt to quantify or limit the damages recoverable on proof of breach of that duty and damage caused thereby. If the duty extends to the prevention of damage to property, I can see no reason in principle why the damages flowing from a breach of such duty should be limited or restricted (in the absence of express contractual provisions to that effect) other than by the application of the ordinary rules as to the measure and remoteness of damage. It is true that when negligence, not amounting to breach of contract, causes financial loss but no physical injury to person or property, financial loss is apparently irrecoverable, except in the rare cases to which the principle in Hedley Byrne & Co., Ltd. v. Heller & Partners, Ltd. (43) applies; for the most recent case, see Weller & Co., Ltd. v. Foot & Mouth Disease Research Institute (44). Financial loss consequent, however, on personal injury is recovered every day in the courts and the same is frequently recovered in cases of damage to property; see, for example, The Okchampton (45) and various admiralty cases cited shortly and conveniently in WINFIELD ON TORT (8th Edn.), pp. 697-701. Financial loss of this kind is sometimes described as parasitic (see Mr. P. S. ATIYAH, NEGLIGENCE AND ECONOMIC LOSS, (1967), 83 L.Q.R. p. 248) since it would be irrecoverable unless the breach of duty had also caused physical damage to person or property. Accordingly I can find no justification for the interesting argument advanced by counsel for Trenthams. Indeed, if it were right, I think it would, notwithstanding his disclaimer, equally apply to restrict A.M.F.'s damages recoverable under the principle in Donoghue v. Stevenson (46). I would add that I have not overlooked that in the Workington Harbour Board case (47), the board's counterclaim under s. 74 of the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, for "any damage done by such vessel to the harbour, dock or pier", was limited in the House of Lords to physical damage to the opera manufacta of the undertaking and was held not to cover consequential loss of revenue through inability to use the harbour. That limitation, however, arose on the construction of s. 74 on which the board's counterclaim was based. That section gave a statutory right of recovery for damage to the harbour works regardless of whether the damage had been occasioned by negligence. I do not therefore think that the limited interpretation placed on the words "any damage done by such vessel" in the statute there under consideration is of any assistance on the present point.

I now pass to A.M.F.'s claim against Trenthams in tort. This was based again on the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, and, alternatively, on the general law of negligence. Counsel for Trenthams argued that they were not occupiers. They had not themselves invited A.M.F. on to the premises. This was done by Magnet, who alone were in contractual relationship with A.M.F. Trenthams merely permitted the entry of A.M.F. pursuant to condition 23 of the building contract. Moreover the concrete slab part of the building was, when A.M.F. entered, cut off from the southern part by a large polythene screen, whilst the N.E. doorway was blocked by its polythene screen and the N.W. doorway closed by hardboard. Counsel for Trenthams further sought to rely on the fact that Trenthams were doing their work under the building contract under the supervision of an architect, Mr. Bate, who was himself working under the overall responsibility first of Mr. Jones and later of Mr. Smith. In my judgment it is clear from Wheat v. E. Lacon & Co., Ltd. (48) that Trenthams were occupiers, notwithstanding that Magnet were also. Under the old law, which is still applicable under the Act of 1957, an invitor did not need to have exclusive possession; see Hartwell v. Grayson, Rollo & Clover Docks (49). Although the concrete slab portion of the building was separated by the large polythene screen from the remainder of it, I am quite

A unable to find that Trenthams were excluded from that portion for all purposes such as, for example, attention to lighting and heating. Nor do I think it material to the claim under the Act of 1957 or Trenthams' duty thereunder that they were working under the supervision of Mr. Bate and that he was working under Mr. Jones and, later, Mr. Smith. I do not think that the discharge of Trenthams' common duty of care was, in all the circumstances, lessened or qualified by what

B may be called the interposition between them and A.M.F. of Mr. Bate and Mr. Smith. What was lacking on July 6, 1964, and thereafter until the flood on July 21, was the exercise of reasonable care in the taking of temporary anti-flooding precautions in the course of construction. This duty fell peculiarly within Trenthams' province. This conclusion receives some support by analogy and parity of reasoning from Clay v. A. J. Crump & Sons, Ltd. (50). Moreover, it

C seems to me clear by virtue of condition 23 of the building contract and the fact that Trenthams knew of and agreed to A.M.F. starting their installation work on July 6, 1964, that A.M.F. were visitors of Trenthams within the meaning of that word in the Act of 1957, since they entered on the premises with Trenthams' permission. Accordingly on the facts as I have found them Trenthams are liable to A.M.F. under the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957. Had I decided otherwise, I

D should have had no hesitation in holding Trenthams liable on the Donoghue v. Stevenson (51) principle, and on this aspect of the case Clay v. A. J. Crump & Sons, Ltd. (50) would have been directly in point. A.M.F. are, therefore, entitled to judgment against both defendants for a sum to be ascertained by an official referee if not agreed.

I can now deal with the interesting points raised in relation to Magnet's claims

E against Trenthams (a) for an indemnity under Condition 14 (b) of the building contract, (b) for damages under the provisions of the bill of quantities and, alternatively, (c) for contribution, which they put at one hundred per cent. under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act of 1935. As I have said, Trenthams argued that Magnet's claims failed under (a) and (b) and that accordingly the issues between the two defendants fell to be decided under the Act of F 1935. On the facts they argued that at the worst for Trenthams I should find the two equally to blame and order that each should contribute to the other accordingly.

Before dealing with Magnet's claims in contract, it is convenient, for reasons which will emerge, to deal with the cross-claims for contribution between the defendants under the Act of 1935 as they would arise for decision were there no

G contractual provisions on which Magnet could rely. On this hypothesis I have to decide the amount of the contribution to the total liability to A.M.F. which should be made by each on the basis of what I find to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of the responsibility of each for the damage. The flooding took place during the course of the construction of the building and was not, on the facts, due to any permanent defect in the construction due to faulty

H design on the part of Magnet's architect. I have already cited from Clayton & Son (Builders), Ltd. v. Woodman (52) the general proposition that an architect has no right to instruct a builder how his work is to be done or the safety precautions to be taken. Moreover in general an architect owes no duty to a builder to tell him promptly during the course of construction, even as regards permanent work, when he is going wrong; he may, if he wishes, leave that to the final stages

I notwithstanding that the correction of a fault then may be much more costly to the builder than had his error been pointed out earlier; see HUDSON ON LAW OF BUILDING AND ENGINEER'S CONTRACTS (19th Edn.) pp. 280/281 and East Ham Borough Council v. Bernard Sunley & Sons, Ltd. (53). In addition the builder by his site agent and other servants is on the site continuously whereas the building owner and his architect are not. The builder is by reason of this in a considerably better position than the building owner or his architect to assess the dangers of flooding during construction owing to the lie of the adjacent land and any water traps formed during the building work. Apart from the above, Trenthams and Magnet were equally well informed as to the value of A.M.F.'s timber and its susceptibility to damage from damp or water. A

Despite all the foregoing points (save the last) pointing to a greater responsibility resting on Trenthams than on Magnet, I cannot take the view that the latter's share was either negligible or unsubstantial. They failed to direct the mind of Mr. Bate to the issue and ask his advice. Moreover Mr. Smith did not himself go and inspect the site to verify the position; Mr. Fairweather, Magnet's own immensely experienced expert architect witness, said he thought that he himself, had he been the "consultant" or associate architect, knowing that his employers were inviting A.M.F. to enter and instal material of great value, would probably have gone to the site to see what had been done. As things were left, Magnet in my view took an unjustifiable risk in leaving everything to Trenthams. My conclusion on this matter is that Trenthams' share of responsibility was sixty per cent. and Magnet's forty per cent. and under the Act of 1935 I would make the appropriate orders for mutual contribution accordingly. C

I now turn to Magnet's claim in contract. They first of all claim a full indemnity under condition 14 (b) of the building contract. It is desirable to read both parts of condition 14:

"(a) Injury to persons. The contractor shall be solely liable for and shall indemnify the employer in respect of any liability, loss, claim or proceedings whatsoever arising under any statute or at common law in respect of personal injury to or the death of any person whomsoever arising out of or in the course of or caused by the execution of the works, unless due to any act or neglect of the employer or of any person for whom the employer is responsible E

"(b) Injury to property. Except for such loss or damage by fire as is at the risk of the employer under cl. 15 (b) (B) of these conditions the contractor shall be liable for and shall indemnify the employer against any loss, liability, claim or proceedings in respect of any injury or damage whatsoever to any property real or personal in so far as such injury or damage arises out of or in the course of or by reason of the execution of the works, and provided always that the same is due to any negligence, omission or default of the contractor, his servants or agents or of any sub-contractor." F

It is hard to imagine anyone being proud of the draftsmanship of this condition. Nevertheless, counsel for Magnet, whilst being freely critical, claimed that sub-para. (b) clearly covered him. Magnet have been held liable in respect of damage to A.M.F.'s property. Such damage arose out of or in the course of or by reason of the execution of "the works" and was due to negligence, omission or default of Trenthams. The claim was prima facie, at any rate, unanswerable. H

Counsel for Trenthams advanced a number of arguments to the contrary. First "the works" in condition 14 (b) could not include the work undertaken by A.M.F. under the permission granted by condition 23. This may be so, but the provisions in items 1/5/C, 1/6/E, 1/8/B and 2/1/B of the bill of quantities, to which I have already referred (54) were in my judgment part of "the works". It is clear on the facts as I have found them that had these provisions been complied with water should not have entered the building. For these reasons I reject this argument. Secondly, counsel for Trenthams said that condition 10 prevented Magnet placing any reliance on any of these items in the bill of quantities so as to entitle them to indemnity under condition 14 (b). Condition 10 reads: I (54) See at p. 802, letter H, and p. 804, letters E and F, ante.

A “The quality and quantity of the work included in the contract sum shall be deemed to be that which is set out in the bills of quantities mentioned in cl. 2 of these conditions which bills unless otherwise expressly stated shall be deemed to have been prepared in accordance with the principles of the standard method of measurement of building works last before issued by the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and the National Federation of Building Trades Employers, but save as aforesaid nothing contained in the said bills of quantities shall override, modify or affect in any way whatsoever the application or interpretation of that which is contained in these conditions.”

I accept the answer of counsel for Magnet to this point. The items in question constituted part of the quantity of the work included in the contract sum within the opening words of that condition. There is therefore no conflict, as counsel for Trenthams argued, between the last part of condition 10 and condition 14 (b) to prevent Magnet from relying on the latter as they do.

Thirdly, counsel for Trenthams raised a point of law of general importance and some difficulty. Relying on my anticipated (and now actual) finding that the damage to A.M.F.'s property was partly caused by the negligence of Magnet, he submitted that on authority Magnet were unable to recover anything under the indemnity clause. He relied on Rutter v. Palmer (55), Joseph Travers & Sons, Ltd. v. Cooper (56), and similar well-known cases following on them, as establishing the general principle that an exception clause does not protect against negligence unless it expressly so provides on the true construction of the words used, or unless no content can be given to the words used unless they protect against negligence on the principle laid down in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry, Ltd. (57). These points are nowhere more clearly stated than in Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd. v. Regem (58) in the well-known passage, which it is unnecessary for me to read. Condition 14 (b) could be given content to protect Magnet against liability to third parties arising through no negligence on their part. Counsel for Trenthams instanced Hughes v. Percival (59) as an example. In that case the building owner was held liable in tort for damage caused to his neighbour's house by bad work by his builder, notwithstanding that he had employed a competent architect and builder. Another example relied on was Balfour v. Barty-King (60). On this point I think counsel for Trenthams was undoubtedly right. He further argued that these principles applied as much to claims by persons suing on indemnity clauses as to defendants seeking to escape liability under exception clauses. This undoubtedly seems to have been accepted by the Privy Council in Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd. v. Regem (61). It seems to have been assumed, at least as a possibility, in A. E. Farr, Ltd. v. The Admiralty (62) and Westcott v. J. H. Jenner (Plasterers), Ltd. and Bovis, Ltd. (63), though in both those cases the person relying on the indemnity succeeded by reason of the language used being held to have been sufficiently clear to have covered his own negligence.

The most relevant and powerful authority relied on by counsel for Trenthams was Walters v. Whessoe, Ltd. and Shell Refining Co., Ltd. decided by the Court of Appeal on Nov. 18, 1960, but unfortunately not hitherto reported (64). In that case a widow sued Whessoe and Shell under the Fatal Accidents and Law Reform Acts in respect of the death of her husband. Mr. Walters had been an employee of Whessoe, who were constructing a tank for Shell at their Stanlow Refinery at Ellesmere Port. The construction involved electric welding. Owing to the negligence of contractors for whom Shell were responsible, an oil drum with dangerous vapour within was, between the cessation of work on a Saturday and its resumption on a Sunday, placed near the construction work and in contact with steel railway lines which themselves were in contact with some steel plates with which the tank was being constructed. The earthing of the welding equipment was defective, but this would have been relatively harmless but for the contact with the drum. Electric current used in the welding caused the vapour to explode, and the lid of the drum struck Mr. Walters on the head, and he later died. The trial judge and the Court of Appeal held Shell eighty per cent. and Whessoe twenty per cent. responsible. Shell, however, sought a complete indemnity from Whessoe in reliance on an indemnity contained in condition 3 of their contract with Whessoe. This read:

"Injury and Damage: The contractor shall indemnify and hold Shell their servants and agents free and harmless against all claim (sic) arising out of the operations being undertaken by the contractor in pursuance of this contract or order or incidental thereto in respect of: (a) personal injury, including death and industrial disease, sustained by any employee of the contractor or of a sub-contractor; (b) loss or damage to the property and personal injury, including death, to the person of any third party; and (c) loss or damage to the property, equipment or tools of the contractor, a sub-contractor or any of their employees."

The Court of Appeal unanimously rejected this claim of Shell. SELLERS, L.J., said:

"It is well established that indemnity will not lie in respect of loss due to a person's own negligence or that of his servants unless adequate and clear words are used or unless the indemnity could have no reasonable meaning or application unless so applied. The words used in this contract do not in terms refer to negligence on the part of Shell or their servants but to all claims arising out of the operations. 'All claims' gives a wide cover, but I am satisfied that claims might arise creating liability on Shell quite apart from liability for their own or their servants' carelessness. In the course of Whessoe's work on Shell's site there might arise a direct liability of Shell to a contractor's servant or to a third party due to acts of Whessoe putting Shell either into a breach of a statutory duty which fell on them or of a common law duty."

SELLERS, L.J., concluded:

"Therefore applying the law which the learned judge invoked I would uphold the view that the indemnity under cl. 3 is inadequate to embrace the claim which Shell make in this case where their liability has been brought about by their own failure in respect of the claim."

DEVLIN, L.J., said:

"It is now well established that if a person obtains an indemnity against the consequences of certain acts, the indemnity is not to be construed so as to include the consequences of his own negligence unless those consequences are covered either expressly or by necessary implication. They are covered by necessary implication if there is no other subject-matter on which the indemnity could operate. Like most rules of construction, this one depends upon the presumed intention of the parties. It is thought to be so unlikely that one man would agree to indemnify another man for the consequences of that other's own negligence that he is presumed not to intend to do so unless it is done by express words or by necessary implication. The reason for the rule is illustrated by one of the earliest cases in which it was enforced — Phillips v. Clark (65). In that case the question was whether a shipowner

A who had inserted in a bill of lading the stipulation, 'not accountable for leakage or breakage', was exempted from responsibility for a loss by leakage and breakage if it arose from his own negligence. In the course of the argument, COCKBURN, C.J., said (66): 'I think it can hardly be permitted to him to contend that he inserted the clause for the purpose of protecting himself against negligence . . . Can we in a court of justice put so

B absurd a construction upon language that is susceptible of another and a more rational construction?' CROWDER, J., delivering judgment said (67): 'The simple question is, what did the parties intend by the contract they have entered into: and this we must gather from the words they have used. It could hardly have been contemplated by the plaintiff that the defendant should be utterly absolved from the obligation of taking any care of the goods'. The law therefore presumes that a man will not readily be granted

C an indemnity against a loss caused by his own negligence. Such a loss is due to his own fault. No similar presumption can be made if he is made responsible for the negligence of others over whose acts he has no control. A responsibility of this sort may arise in law in the case of an employer and his workmen or an occupier and persons whom he invites to the premises. Similarly a man may be responsible without negligence on his part for breach of

D statutory duty committed either by himself or by his servants or by someone for whom he was vicariously liable. In none of these cases is there any negligence on his part and there is therefore no reason to presume an intention to exclude them from the indemnity. The indemnity which we have to construe does not contain any express words covering negligence. Its terms are wide enough to cover breaches of statutory duty and acts of independent contractors which may impose a liability on Shell without any fault on the part of themselves or their servants. It is not therefore necessary, in order to give the clause subject-matter, to construe it as covering negligence and so the indemnity does not cover the consequences of a negligent act committed by Shell's servants."

F After having referred to the statement by LORD WRIGHT in Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'Mullan (68) that breach of statutory duty is negligence "in strict legal analysis", DEVLIN, L.J., continued:

"It can also be said, no doubt, that a person who is vicariously liable for the negligent acts of an independent contractor is in strict legal analysis himself negligent. But in the application of this rule of construction what we have to consider is not what negligence means in strict legal analysis but what sort of conduct the parties intended to exclude from the scope of the indemnity. That is why I have looked to the reason for the rule. The sort of conduct which the parties must be taken to have had in mind is that which LORD WRIGHT describes in the same passage of his speech, and by way of contrast with negligence in strict legal analysis, as 'heedless or careless conduct'. There is good ground for presuming an intention not to grant a man an indemnity against his own heedless or careless conduct; there is no ground for such a presumption in the case of conduct which, whatever it may be called in law, is not blameworthy in that sense."

I SLADE, J., the third member of the court, gave a short judgment to the same effect in which he specifically quoted the passage to which I have referred in Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd. v. Regem (69) and said that it was the duty of the court to apply it to an indemnity clause.

Counsel for Trenthams naturally relied strongly on this case, which as far as I can ascertain, is the only authority in the English courts applying these well-known principles to an indemnity as distinct from an exception clause. Counsel further said that unless clear words were used, which he submitted were absent here, an indemnity clause could not be relied on by a proferens seeking to recover for what he called his own culpa or heedless or careless conduct, which he submitted covered breach of contract. Here I have held that Magnet were in breach of contract (70) and were also negligent themselves (71) in the person of Mr. Smith in not by himself or Mr. Bate or a suitably qualified person checking that reasonable steps had been taken to make the site safe for A.M.F. In addition counsel for Trenthams naturally stressed that in the Whessoe case (72) Shell were not wholly to blame, but Whessoe were also partly responsible.

Counsel for Magnet sought to distinguish the present case in a variety of ways. First of all he submitted that the (73) words of condition 14 (b) were wide enough to include Magnet's negligence and breach of contract. He pointed out that the word "solely", present (74) in sub-para. (a), is absent from sub-para. (b). As against this counsel for Trenthams suggested that the effect must be the same by reason of the words "in so far as" in sub-para. (b). Further, counsel for Magnet urged that condition 14 was a sweeping-up clause and that sub-para. (b) significantly lacked the words at the end of sub-para. (a) "unless due to any act or neglect of the employer", etc. I have already said that the phraseology of the condition as a whole leaves much to be desired; I do not think any real assistance is to be derived from comparing the language of the two sub-paragraphs. If a party relying on an indemnity is to escape the effect of the principle laid down in the Whessoe case (72) the language he relies on must be clear. In my judgment the language used in 14 (b) is not clear enough to take Magnet out of the principle.

Counsel for Magnet then argued that I must distinguish between causa causans and causa sine qua non, that in the Whessoe case (72) Whessoe's negligence was only a causa sine qua non and that the causa causans or real or effective cause was the negligence of Shell. Here he equated Magnet with Whessoe and Trenthams with Shell. Moreover, the passages which I have read from the judgments of SELLERS and DEVLIN, L.J.J., in dealing with the principle, did not mention the partial responsibility in negligence of Whessoe. Unless one interpreted the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in this way, counsel submitted there was an insoluble logical conflict between the Whessoe case (72) and a line of authorities holding that a plaintiff can recover as damages for breach of contract the damages, flowing therefrom that he has had to pay a third party for liability in tort. He referred to the well-known line of cases starting with Mowbray v. Merryweather (75), continuing with Scott v. Foley Aikman & Co. (76) and The Kate (77), and most recently exemplified by Sims v. Foster Wheeler, Ltd. (78). In each of these cases the plaintiff succeeded in contract because his liability in tort to a third party was due to a breach of duty owed to that third party and not to the defendant. He further relied for his interpretation of the Whessoe case (72) on what was said by DEVLIN, J., in Compania Naviera Maropan S.A. v. Bowaters Lloyd Pulp and Paper Mills, Ltd. (79).

I am unable to see how I can distinguish the reasoning and decision in the Whessoe case (72) on the lines suggested. What fraction of responsibility greater than twenty per cent. is required before the other party's negligence ceases to be the effective cause? The question has only to be asked to be seen to be

A answerable. If it can be answered, I can see no grounds for holding sixty per cent. responsibility to be the effective cause and forty per cent. only a sine qua non. Further I think that there is a real distinction in principle between the indemnity cases and the line of contract cases cited. In the latter the defendant is under a contractual obligation to provide reasonably safe tackle, or a berth or scaffolding, etc., or warrants that what he has provided is reasonably safe to use. In the indemnity cases the party giving the indemnity merely undertakes to pay the other party money in certain circumstances. If, as a matter of construction, the event that has occurred falls outside those circumstances, no liability to indemnify arises. For these reasons and considering myself bound by the Whessoe case (80), even if not strictly bound by the Canada Steamship case (81), I reject Magnet's claim to be indemnified under condition 14 (b).

C In doing so, however, I base my decision on my earlier finding of Magnet's liability to A.M.F. in tort and express no view whether, had I only held them liable in contract, the claim under the indemnity clause would have failed.

This leads me to the final point. Can Magnet recover, to the extent of their liability to A.M.F., as damages for breach of contract by Trenthams, the terms of the contract relied on being items 1/5/C, 1/6/E, 1/8/B and 2/1/B in the bill of quantities? (82) It is clear on the facts that, albeit wrongly, in discharge of their obligations in contract and tort to A.M.F., Magnet did rely exclusively on Trenthams. Their negligence vis-à-vis A.M.F. is irrelevant as an answer to their claim in contract against Trenthams on the authority of Mowbray v. Merryweather (83) and the later cases cited following that decision (84). I am satisfied that this is not a case in which on the facts it would be proper to hold that Magnet's acts or omissions broke the chain of causation between the breaches of contract by Trenthams and the loss suffered by Magnet in the shape of their liability to A.M.F., although on the appropriate facts this may of course be the right conclusion as envisaged by DEVLIN, J., and the Court of Appeal in Compania Naviera Maropan S.A. v. Bowaters Lloyd Pulp & Paper Mills, Ltd. (85). Having rejected earlier in this judgment the arguments of counsel for Trenthams

F in relation to those items in the bill of quantities based on condition 10 of the contract and the construction of the phraseology of the items themselves and having found as facts that Trenthams were in breach of the provisions of these four items, I can see no answer to this way of putting Magnet's claim. I agree with Magnet's counsel that condition 14 (b) cannot be construed as a kind of exception clause in favour of Trenthams, so as to prevent Magnet from being

G able to recover damages for breach of a contractual obligation by Trenthams if the indemnity provisions in that clause do not, on their true construction, apply to that breach.

Accordingly I hold that Magnet are entitled to recover from Trenthams as damages for breach of contract the sum for which A.M.F. will be entitled, under the earlier part of this judgment, to enter judgment against Magnet in respect of the damage to the timber. In so saying I leave open for decision all questions of costs until after I have heard counsel.

H Before ending I must again express my gratitude to all counsel involved for their very great assistance throughout this long and complex case. If I have not dealt with every argument advanced, I hope that I have not omitted any of real importance. Any omissions have not been due, I believe, to oversight, but in order not further to prolong this judgment.

NOTE.

In Walters v. Whessoe Ltd. and Shell Refining Co., Ltd., the widow and administratrix of John Walters deceased appealed to the Court of Appeal (SELLERS and DEVLIN, L.JJ., and SLADE, J.) from a judgment of WINN, J., at Liverpool Autumn Assizes in 1959, awarding the plaintiff £2,400 damages for financial loss sustained by her husband's death as the result of an accident on Nov. 18, 1956, when working as a labourer in the employment of the first defendants ("Whessoe") on work of erection of a new oil storage tank for the second defendants ("Shell"), and for his pain and suffering and loss of expectation of life. The dispute on appeal was between the two defendants, the plaintiff not being a party to the appeal. Each defendant claimed against the other indemnity or contribution under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, and Shell sought complete indemnity under the contract for the work which Whessoe were undertaking. WINN, J., had apportioned liability as to one-fifth to Whessoe and four-fifths to Shell, and the Court of Appeal found no ground for altering that apportionment. He had held also that the contractual indemnity did not entitle Shell to any relief. The deceased had been killed by a lid of a petrol oil drum flying through the air and striking him on the head. The drum, which was being used as a barrier or protection, had not been cleaned and contained explosive vapour. Electric welding, required by the contract, was being carried out and, in the circumstances prevailing, the electric current for this caused explosion of the vapour, which blew the lid off the drum. Whessoe were negligent in that the earth that was provided for the electric current used in the welding was defective. Negligence was attributable to Shell in having left the drum where it lay overnight uncleared. The contract between Shell and Whessoe contained among other provisions, this—"3. Injury and damage: The contractor shall indemnify and hold Shell and their servants and agents free and harmless against all claim arising out of the operations being undertaken by [Whessoe] in pursuance of this contract or order or incidental thereto in respect of: (a) personal injury, including death . . . sustained by any employee of [Whessoe] . . ." Clause 3 was the provision material for this report since, no breach of statutory duty by Shell being alleged, the Court of Appeal did not find it necessary to deal with the construction of another clause, cl. 6, which might otherwise have been relevant. Shell alleged that cl. 3 gave them an indemnity in respect of loss which had befallen them by reason of their own negligence, including the negligence of their servants. SELLERS, L.J., giving the reasons stated at p. 812, letters E to H, ante, concluded "I would uphold the view that the indemnity under cl. 3 is inadequate to embrace the claim which Shell made in this case where their liability has been brought about by their own failure in respect of the claim". DEVLIN, L.J., giving reasons quoted at p. 812, letter H, to p. 813, letter F, ante, said that subject matter could be given to cl. 3 without construing it so as to cover negligence, for the clause was wide enough to extend to breaches of statutory duty and acts of independent contractors which might impose liability on Shell without any fault on the part of themselves or their servants. The clause contained no language expressly excepting Shell from the consequences of their negligence or that of their servants. Moreover there was, DEVLIN, L.J., said, a possible head of damage based on some ground other than that of negligence on the part of Shell or their servants, as Shell might desire protection in the case of an unsuccessful claim against them based on negligence, as the result of which, but for the indemnity clause, they would be left with a barren judgment for costs against the unsuccessful plaintiff. Accordingly cl. 3 did not cover the consequences of negligence of Shell by their servants. The appeal was dismissed (Nov. 18, 1960). C

The car-owner (the coal merchant) asked H. if he would drive the son about in the evenings, and H. agreed. ### Appeal.

The first defendant, Douglas Oliver Davies, the owner of a motor-car which, while being driven by the second defendant, Samuel Hawkins, had collided with a motor-cycle ridden by the plaintiff, Mervyn George Carberry, then an infant, who attained full age before the hearing of the appeal, appealed against so much of the judgment of LATEY, J., given at Birmingham Assizes on Nov. 15, 1967 as held him liable in damages to the plaintiff for the negligent driving of the car-driver. A

P. J. Cox, Q.C., for the car-owner.

I. J. Black for the plaintiff.

The car-driver did not appeal and was not a party to the appeal.

HARMAN, L.J.: Almost five years ago the plaintiff, then an infant, driving a motor-bicycle, was involved in an accident with a motor-car driven by the defendant car-driver and owned by the defendant car-owner. The judge has held that the car-driver was to a major degree responsible for the accident and has awarded a sum of around £3,000 damages. He gave that judgment not only against the second defendant, the car-driver, but also against the first defendant, the owner of the car, on the footing that the car-driver was driving as agent of the car-owner. B

This case has taken an unconscionable time to come on, like many of these cases do, and recollections may or may not be all that they should be. The infant plaintiff has come of age and has adopted the proceedings, and this should be reflected when the order is drawn up by entitling the action "Mervyn George Carberry (formerly an infant but now of full age) Plaintiff", because he no longer sues by his next friend. That is the correct way of heading the order which will be drawn. C

The car-driver does not appeal. The car-owner does: he says that there was no agency. D

It is not alleged that the judge has erred in his statement of the law but the argument said is that there was no justification for the inferences of fact which he drew and on which his conclusion was based. He said: E

"The question I have to decide is whether or not [the car-driver] was [the car-owner's] agent."

In Hewitt v. Bonvin (1) MACKINNON, L.J., regarded the case as dependent on the question whether the driver was or was not the servant of the owner. DU PARCQ, L.J., dealing with agency summarised the principles in this way (2): F

"The driver of a car may not be the owner's servant, and the owner will be nevertheless liable for his negligent driving if it be proved that at the material time he had authority, express or implied, to drive on the owner's behalf. Such liability depends not on ownership but on the delegation of a task or duty." G

That seems to me to describe the same test or dividing line as that described by SINGLETON and DENNING, L.J.J., in Ormrod v. Crosville Motor Services, Ltd. (Murphie, Third Party) (3). SINGLETON, L.J., said (4):

"... the driver of a motor-car must be doing something for the owner of the car in order to become an agent of the owner." H

DENNING, L.J., said (5):

"If it is being used wholly or partly on the owner's business or for the owner's purposes, the owner is liable for any negligence on the part of the driver. The owner only escapes liability when he lends it or hires it to a third person to be used for purposes in which the owner has no interest or concern..." I

That admittedly is an adequate summing-up of the law. I would only add to it the illuminating judgment of DEVLIN, J., in that same case, Ormrod v. Crosville Motor Services, Ltd. (6), which is reported.

A Having correctly laid the basis of his judgment, the judge went on to findings of fact, and he said this:

B “On the evidence of [the car-owner] and [the car-driver] and looking at the probabilities I have little doubt that [the car-driver] was asked by [the car-owner] to drive John [the car-owner's son] about for him. He wanted John to have reasonable use and enjoyment of the family car during the evenings and John could not drive. [The car-owner] was only prepared to allow the car to be driven either by himself or [the car-driver], and [the car-driver], who was employed by [the car-owner] and was related to him by marriage, agreed to take it on as a favour. Why otherwise should [the car-driver] leave his wife and home on these many evenings? This is not to say, of course, that [the car-driver] did not enjoy the evenings out, no doubt he did, but his real role was that of an unpaid chauffeur.”

C If those inferences (for that is what they are) are justified, there can be no quarrel with the conclusion which the judge reached. Counsel in his very persuasive address on behalf of the car-owner has urged that there was no justification for such findings and that in truth there was a mere permission by the owner to the car-driver to use his car if he liked and that is the highest that the facts of the case ought to be put.

D The facts, very shortly, are that the car-owner was a coal-merchant who had three lorries engaged in delivery of coal in his business: one of them was driven by his employee the defendant car-driver, who was a servant at a wage; but the car-owner also had a Ford motor-car which he regarded as the family car and of which, as the judge found, he wished all the family to have the use so far as practicable. He however was careful about the car and would let no-one but himself drive it except the defendant car-driver, who was his employee and in whom, no doubt, he had confidence: the car-driver drove one of the lorries. Thus it came about that when the car-owner's son, who was then about sixteen, wished to go out in the evenings and to have the car for that purpose, he was allowed by his father to have it if the car-driver drove it; and the accident happened on some such occasion. The car-driver had driven the son out on a jaunt; they picked up the son's girl friend. Where they were going does not quite appear; but they ran into this trouble. The whole case turns, I suppose, and I think this is true (as DIPLOCK, L.J., first pointed out), on how the arrangement was made. Did the defendant car-owner make the arrangement so that his son could have the use of the car, or was it the other way about, that the son made the arrangement and simply asked his father's permission? Who originated the arrangement? The judge has come to the conclusion—and he says that he has little doubt about it—that it was the father's arrangement, and the question is whether we can reject that conclusion. It is very near the line. The judge might well have decided the other way: if he had done so I should not have felt I could contradict him, but as he has seen the witnesses and we have not, and as he arrived without any doubt at the conclusion which I have read, I do not feel that we are at liberty to quarrel with it, and I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

H DIPLOCK, L.J.: I agree. The relevant law as to the liability of an owner of a vehicle for negligence on the part of someone else who is driving it has been well settled since Hewitt v. Bonvin (7) and Ormrod v. Crossville Motor Services, Ltd. (8) (Murphy, Third Party) (8), to which HARMAN, L.J., has referred; and I would only add that for my part I find it most helpfully stated in the judgment of DEVLIN, J. (9) who tried the latter case at first instance. As it seems to me, on the facts of this case, the question really turns on whether the proposal that Mr. Hawkins, the car-driver, should drive the son about originated from the car-owner (the father) or from the son himself. I agree with HARMAN, L.J., that the case is a border-line case; but, that being what the judge had to make up his mind about, it does seem to me that he would be bound to be influenced by the impression that he had formed of the personalities of those three witnesses in the box; and while on the transcript of the shorthand note the words used in answer to questions may perhaps be equivocal, I do not think that this court can possibly say that the judge was wrong in drawing the inference that he did—that the proposal originated from the car-owner, or, as the judge himself put it, “looking at the probabilities I have little doubt that [the car-driver] was asked by [the car-owner] to drive John about for him.”

I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

FENTON ATKINSON, L.J.: I also agree with both judgments which have been delivered, and there is nothing that I can usefully add.

GALLAHER, LTD. v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Lord Denning, M.R., Salmon and Edmund Davies, L.JJ.), March 4, 5, 6, April 30, 1968.]

Customs—Commonwealth preference—Southern Rhodesia—Tobacco—Southern Rhodesia ceasing to be in Commonwealth preference area from midnight Nov. 18/19, 1965—Tobacco grown in Southern Rhodesia and consigned to United Kingdom before Nov. 19, 1965—Whether full duty payable—Import Duties Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2 c. 6), s. 2 (2), (3) (c), s. 12 (1)—Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) Order 1965 (S.I. 1965 No. 1954), art. 1—Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) (No. 2) Order 1965 (S.I. 1965 No. 1987).

In November, 1965, the plaintiffs had large quantities of tobacco which had been grown in Southern Rhodesia. By art. 1 of the Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) Order 1965, Southern Rhodesia was excluded from the Commonwealth preference area as from midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965. The plaintiffs then had over five million pounds of tobacco in transit from Salisbury in Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom. Some of it was on rail at Salisbury, some was on the train from Salisbury to Beira, in Portuguese East Africa, and the rest was in warehouses at Beira awaiting shipment to the United Kingdom for which all arrangements had been made. Through contracts or successive contracts of carriage had not been arranged at that date. By s. 2 (2)* of the Import Duties Act, 1958, in conjunction with s. 12 (1)† of that Act, goods qualified for Commonwealth preference if they were grown in the Commonwealth preference area and consigned from a place in such area to the United Kingdom. By virtue of s. 2 (3) (c)‡ of the Act of 1958 any country not named§, in sub-s. (4) * Section 2 (2) is set out at p. 825, letter G, post.

† Section 12 (1), so far as material is set out at p. 823, letter C, post.

‡ Section 2 (3), so far as material, is set out at p. 826, letter D, post.

§ In the Import Duties Act, 1958, s. 2, as originally enacted, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was named in sub-s. (4), and thus was brought within the Commonwealth preference area by virtue of sub-s. (3) (b). The Federation was constituted by the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland Order in Council, 1953 (S.I. 1953 No. 1199).

A was in the Commonwealth preference area if “ for the time being ” it formed part of Her Majesty’s dominions. By s. 88 (1)* of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952, the duties of customs or excise and the rates thereof chargeable on warehoused goods were to be those enforced at the date of the removal of the goods from the warehouse. On appeal by the plaintiffs from an order that they were not entitled to the benefit of Commonwealth preference in respect of the five million pounds of tobacco, as a consequence of which order their liability to import duty would be increased by some £450,000,

B Held: (i) on the facts the tobacco had been consigned to the United Kingdom before Nov. 19, 1965, within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1958 at a time when Southern Rhodesia was still within the Commonwealth preference area (see p. 823, letter I, p. 828, letter H, and p. 831, letter I, post).

C (ii) (SALMON, L.J., dissenting) the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of Commonwealth preference in respect of the tobacco (see p. 825, letter A, and p. 831, letter I, post), because—

D (a) (per LORD DENNING, M.R.) the tobacco having qualified for Commonwealth preference before Nov. 19, 1965, did not lose that qualification when removed from the warehouse in the United Kingdom, but remained, in effect franked goods, there being nothing in the Act of 1958 to remove the benefit of Commonwealth preference once goods had qualified for it (see p. 824, letters E and G, post); and

E (b) (per EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.) having regard to s. 2 (3) (c) of the Act of 1958, the phrase “ goods of the area ” in s. 2 (2) extended to goods grown in the country which for the time being formed part of the preference area, and the phrase “ consigned . . . from a place in that area ” bore a similar connotation, with the consequence that, as the tobacco was grown in and was consigned from Southern Rhodesia when within the preference area, it had the benefit of Commonwealth preference; and there was nothing in the Orders in Council to deprive the tobacco of any preferential right that it otherwise possessed (see p. 829, letter I, to p. 830, letter A, and p. 830, letter I, post).

F Appeal allowed.

G Appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, Gallaher, Ltd., from a judgment of H and it included the colony of Southern Rhodesia. The reference to the Federation was deleted from sub-s. (4) by the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (Dissolution) Order in Council 1963 (S.I. 1963 No. 2085) s. 75 and Sch. 3, para. 7 (a). Thereafter Southern Rhodesia, being no longer included in a country named in sub-s. (4) of s. 2 of the Act of 1958, seems to have qualified as a Commonwealth preference area by virtue of s. 2 (3) (c) of the Act of 1958, until it was excluded from the scope of s. 2 (3) (c) by the Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) Order 1965 art. 1, which came into operation at the beginning of Nov. 19, 1965, and is the subject of the decision in the present appeal. The terms of s. 2 (3), so far as immediately relevant, are

I “ (3) . . . the Commonwealth preference area shall consist of . . . (b) the countries named as parts of that area in sub-s. (4) of this section; and (c) any country not named (nor included in a country named) in . . . sub-s. (4) which for the time being forms part of Her Majesty’s dominions outside the United Kingdom ”. By the amending order of 1965, the Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) (No. 2) Order 1965 (S.I. 1965 No. 1987), which was directed to s. 2 (9) of the Act of 1958, goods of Southern Rhodesia consigned from Lourenço Marques or Beira were withdrawn from preference, but there was an exception for goods shown to have been shipped in a ship which sailed from either port, or from any port in the Commonwealth preference area, before Nov. 19, 1965.

* Section 88 (1), so far as material, is set out at p. 824, letter B, post.

ROSKILL, J., dated May 31, 1967, in three actions by the plaintiffs seeking declarations that, by virtue of s. 260 (1) of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952, the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of Commonwealth preference on five cases of Rhodesian tobacco shipped from Beira in Portuguese East Africa to the United Kingdom after midnight of the night of Nov. 18/19, 1965. The actions were, by consent, tried concurrently. ROSKILL, J., gave judgment for the defendants, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, holding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the benefit of Commonwealth preference. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

Michael Kerr, Q.C., and M. J. Mustill, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.

R. A. MacCrindle, Q.C., Nigel Bridge and A. B. Hidden for the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

Apr. 30. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: The plaintiffs, Gallaher, Ltd., have for some years held large stocks of tobacco at Salisbury in Rhodesia. Before November, 1965, they used to send consignments of tobacco from warehouse in Salisbury by rail down to Beira in Portuguese East Africa. Thence it was carried by ship to London, or sometimes to Belfast. It was discharged into bonded warehouse at the port and remained in bond until the plaintiffs removed it. On removal they paid duty on it, but they did not pay at the full rate. They were entitled to receive, and did receive, Commonwealth preference. That means that they paid 1s. 6½d. a pound less duty than they would have paid if the tobacco had been from a country outside the Commonwealth. In November, 1965, the men in control of Southern Rhodesia made a unilateral declaration of independence. In consequence, the United Kingdom government thought it right to deprive Southern Rhodesia of Commonwealth preference. On Nov. 16, 1965, Parliament passed the Southern Rhodesia Act 1965. It enabled Her Majesty by Order in Council to modify, extend or suspend any enactment relating to or connected with Southern Rhodesia. On the same day, Her Majesty made an Order in Council (1). It came into operation at midnight of Nov. 18/19, 1965. It provided that:

That meant that the plaintiffs thenceforward had no longer the advantage of Commonwealth preference on the tobacco which they imported into the United Kingdom from Rhodesia. As from midnight of Nov. 18/19, 1965, they had to pay the full duty on any tobacco they consigned to the United Kingdom from Southern Rhodesia.

At midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965, the plaintiffs had 5½ million pounds of tobacco in transit. Some of it was on rail at Salisbury. Some of it was on the train on the way down from Salisbury to Beira. The rest of it was in warehouses at Beira awaiting shipment to the United Kingdom. The question in this case is what duty is payable on those 5½ million pounds of tobacco which was in transit at midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965? Is it subject to full duty? Or are the plaintiffs entitled to Commonwealth preference on it? If they are not entitled to Commonwealth preference, it means that they will have to pay £450,000 more by way of customs duty than they bargained for. So the sum of £450,000 depends on the answer. In addition to the 5½ million pounds in transit, the plaintiffs had another 5½ million pounds of tobacco in Salisbury which had not been put on rail. That is clearly subject to the full duty with no Commonwealth preference. So the plaintiffs have been very badly hit by the steps taken against the men in Rhodesia; but the question is whether they can save the £450,000

(1) The Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) Order 1965. (S.I. 1965 No. 1954).

A on the tobacco in transit. In order to determine this question, it is necessary to distinguish between the time when a consignment qualifies for Commonwealth preference and the time when it is chargeable with duty.

1. The qualifications for Commonwealth preference. Section 2 (2) of the Import Duties Act, 1958, provides that:

B “The goods qualifying for Commonwealth preference shall be any goods of the area referred to in this Act as the Commonwealth preference area which are consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area.”

Section 12 (1) provides that:

“... goods shall be deemed to be goods of a country if they are grown, produced or manufactured in that country.”

C Those sections show clearly that, in order to qualify for Commonwealth preference, the goods have to satisfy two conditions. First, they must have been grown, produced or manufactured in a country in the Commonwealth preference area. Secondly, they must have been consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area. Both those conditions involve looking into the past history of the goods before they left the country of origin.

D In this case, the first condition was clearly satisfied. All the tobacco was undoubtedly grown in Southern Rhodesia whilst that country was still in the Commonwealth preference area. It was grown long before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965. The question is whether the second condition was satisfied. Was this tobacco “consigned to” the United Kingdom from Southern Rhodesia before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965? We had much discussion on the word
E “consigned”. It is a commercial term, not a legal term; and it should be given its commercial meaning. The SHORT OXFORD DICTIONARY gives the commercial meaning of “consign” as

“to deliver or transmit (goods) for sale or custody, usually implying their transit by ship, railway, etc.”

F I would adopt a similar meaning in the Act of 1958. I think that goods are “consigned to the United Kingdom” from a place in the Commonwealth preference area when they are delivered to a carrier in that place for continuous transit to the United Kingdom. It is not necessary that there should be a through contract of carriage. Nor is it necessary that there should be successive contracts of carriage already arranged. There must, however, be an intention
G that the transit should be continuous. The sender from the place in the Commonwealth preference area must intend that they should go direct to the United Kingdom and not be taken into the commerce of any other country; and arrangements must have been planned to that end. The transit will, of course, be continuous, notwithstanding that the goods are taken from rail to ocean-going ship, or transshipped from ocean-going ship to coaster, or held up pending arrival
H of an onward carrier; but it is broken by being taken en route into the commerce of another country.

I Were these goods “consigned to” the United Kingdom before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965? The parties took five different cases of tobacco so as to test the position. It appears that, before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965, all five cases had been packed, marked and documented in Southern Rhodesia as destined for the United Kingdom. All were on rail to Beira, or at Beira awaiting shipment. They were in transit to the United Kingdom and nowhere else. It is true that there were no through contracts of carriage, and no succession of contracts concluded for the carriage. But all arrangements had been made; shipping space had been booked; and the intention of the senders was unmistakably to send through by continuous transit to the United Kingdom. And they were so sent. On those facts, I hold that all five cases had been consigned to the United Kingdom from Southern Rhodesia before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965. The second condition was, therefore, satisfied.

In my opinion, therefore, these consignments were goods which qualified for Commonwealth preference before Southern Rhodesia was expunged from the Commonwealth preference area. A

2. The chargeability with duty. In order to see when these goods became chargeable with duty, we have to look at s. 4 (1) and s. 26 (3) of the Finance Act 1964, which incorporates s. 88 (1) and s. 86 (4) of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952. Section 88 (1) provides that: B

“ . . . the duties of customs or excise and the rates thereof chargeable on warehoused goods shall be those in force . . . at the date of the removal of the goods from the warehouse.”

Section 86 (4) provides that: “ . . . no goods shall be removed from a warehouse until any duty chargeable thereon has been paid.” Those sections show that the duties do not become chargeable until the goods are removed from warehouse. That means that the goods must have reached England, must have been placed in the warehouse, and removed before the duties are chargeable. In this present case, the tobacco, I believe, is still in warehouse. The duties have not yet become chargeable. The question is whether, on their removal, they will be entitled to commonwealth preference? C

3. Resolving the difficulty. It is clear, therefore, that the consignment in this case qualified for Commonwealth preference before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965 (i.e., whilst Southern Rhodesia was still in the Commonwealth preference area); but the duties only became chargeable after Nov. 18/19, 1965 (i.e., after Southern Rhodesia had been expunged from the Commonwealth preference area). Such being the distinction drawn by the Act of 1958, I think that this case can and should be decided on a short point of construction. Once goods have qualified for Commonwealth preference, they are, so to speak, “franked”, that is, made free of the full customs duty. They are “franked” just as a letter is franked when it is stamped “official paid” and put into the postbox. Once franked, they should not be disqualified and unfranked, unless Parliament says so explicitly in clear words. I have never heard of a letter being unfranked after it has been put in the post. Any other view would lead to the most unjust situations. A merchant may have gone to all the expense of consigning goods to England on the footing that they were entitled to Commonwealth preference. He has been told by Parliament that they are goods which qualify for Commonwealth preference. It would be shocking that he should be deprived of this Commonwealth preference by matters arising afterwards. It would be a piece of retroactive legislation, which is never regarded with favour. D

I can find no words in the Act of 1958 which would justify us in giving retroactive effect to this statute. There was much discussion on the words “for the time being” in s. 2 (3) (c); but, after consideration, I do not think that those words help either way. They only refer to the time at which a country comes into, or goes out of, the Commonwealth preference area. They show that Southern Rhodesia went out of the Commonwealth preference area at midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965. They leave untouched the fact that, at that time, these consignments were goods which qualified for Commonwealth preference. The qualification had attached before midnight. E

4. The Order in Council. The draftsman of the Order in Council seems to have interpreted the Act of 1958 differently. He seems to have thought that goods only qualified for preference at the time when they were removed from the bonded warehouse here; with the result that, once Southern Rhodesia was excluded from the Commonwealth preference area, then none of the goods in transit, and none of those which were here in bonded warehouse, would qualify for Commonwealth preference. Being of that frame of mind, the draftsman inserted special provisions so as to give Commonwealth preference to “goods entered for warehousing” before Nov. 19, 1965, and to goods “shipped on a ship F

A which sailed from Lourenço Marques or Beira" before that date (2). I think that that is a mistaken view. The mistaken view of the draftsman cannot influence our construction of the Act of 1958. If he had construed the Act of 1958 rightly, it would have been quite unnecessary for him to put in those special provisions; for the simple reason that all goods grown in Southern Rhodesia qualify for Commonwealth preference as soon as they are consigned from Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom.

B 5. Conclusion. In my opinion, those goods qualified for Commonwealth preference when they were consigned from Southern Rhodesia before midnight on Nov. 18/19, 1965; and there is nothing in the Act of 1958 to disqualify them. On removal from warehouse, the duties must be charged on the basis that the goods qualify for Commonwealth preference. I would allow the appeal accordingly.

C SALMON, L.J.: The duty chargeable on tobacco imported into the United Kingdom is regulated by the Finance Act 1964, s. 4 (1) (a), which provides:

"There shall be charged—(a) on tobacco imported into the United Kingdom duties of customs at the rates shown in Table I in Sch. 5 to this Act . . ."

D That table sets out the rates of duty per pound under three separate columns headed "Full", "Commonwealth" and "Convention". The Commonwealth rate is substantially less than the others. The "Commonwealth" rate applies to tobacco qualifying for Commonwealth preference (s. 4 (3) of the Act of 1964). Section 26 (2) and (3) of the Act of 1964 provide (a) that the test whether or not tobacco qualifies for Commonwealth preference shall be the test laid down in s. 2 (2) to (9) of the Import Duties Act, 1958, and (b) that Part 1 of the Act of 1964 (which includes s. 4 of that Act) shall be construed as one with the Customs and Excise Act, 1952. For the purpose of this appeal, the only relevant section of the Act of 1952 is s. 88 (1), which provides that the rate of duty chargeable on warehoused goods is that in force at the date when the goods are removed from the warehouse.

F The question raised by this appeal is whether the rate of duty chargeable on the plaintiffs' tobacco at the date when it was removed from the warehouse was the full rate or the Commonwealth rate. The true answer to this question depends on whether or not at that date the goods qualified for Commonwealth preference. Southern Rhodesia had by then long ceased to be within the Commonwealth preference area. Section 2 (2) of the Act of 1958 provides:

G "... goods qualifying for Commonwealth preference shall be any goods of the area referred to in this Act as the Commonwealth preference area which are consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area."

H "Goods of the area" are goods grown, produced or manufactured in the area (see s. 12 of the Act of 1958). Accordingly, the question whether duty is to be charged at the full rate or at the Commonwealth rate depends on whether the goods qualify for Commonwealth preference at the date when the duty is chargeable. Certainly you must look to the past in order to ascertain the country in which the goods were grown, produced or manufactured and from which they were consigned. Must that country be in the Commonwealth preference area at the time when the duty is chargeable, or is it enough that that country had been in that area at the time of the growth, production or manufacture and consignment of the goods although it is not in that area at the time when the duty is chargeable? This question is by no means easy of solution.

I Counsel for the plaintiffs has argued that the tobacco acquires its qualification when it is consigned from a place then in the Commonwealth area after having been grown, produced or manufactured in that area. It is, so to speak, then franked with its Commonwealth preference qualification. He contends that it is wholly irrelevant that the place in which it was grown, produced or manufactured and from which it was consigned is no longer in the Commonwealth area at the date when the duty is chargeable. I am afraid that I cannot accept this "franking" argument, attractive as counsel for the plaintiffs made it sound. It leads to strange results. Imagine a town in which there is a municipal theatre. The prices of admission are regulated by bye-laws, which, of course, may be changed from time to time. One bye-law provides that all children under fifteen years of age who qualify for a reduction in the price of their admission to the theatre shall be admitted at half price. Another bye-law provides that all children born in the town or within a radius of five miles from it qualify for a reduction in the price of admission. I cannot think that every little boy and girl born within the specified area is franked from the date of his or her birth with the qualification to be admitted to the theatre at half price until he or she reaches the age of fifteen. If the bye-laws are changed so that the five-mile radius is reduced to three miles, no child seeking admission thereafter would qualify for admission at half price unless born within the three-mile radius. It would be quite irrelevant that, at the time of the child's birth four miles from the city, the old bye-law was in force.

Then there is counsel for the plaintiffs' very skilful argument founded on the words "for the time being". Section 2 (3) of the Act of 1958 provides that the Commonwealth preference area shall consist of

"... (b) the countries named as parts of that area in sub-s. (4) of this section; and (c) any country not named ... in the said sub-s. (4) which for the time being forms part of Her Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom ..."

Subsection (4) names many countries including Australia, Canada and the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, but not Southern Rhodesia, because, at the time when the Act of 1958 was passed, Southern Rhodesia formed part of that Federation. After the Federation was dissolved, Southern Rhodesia remained within the Commonwealth area only by reason of the provisions of sub-s. (3) (c). Counsel for the plaintiffs argues that the words "for the time being" in sub-s. (3) (c) refer to the time when the goods chargeable with duty were grown, produced or manufactured and consigned. I cannot accept that argument. First, the time of growth, production or manufacture and the time of consignment are different. A country might form part of Her Majesty's dominions at one of these times but not at the other. The use of the words "for the time being" to cover them both would be inept. Moreover, the construction for which counsel contends is, in my view, inconsistent with what follows sub-s. (3) (c). The proviso to sub-s. (4) provides that Her Majesty may by Order in Council direct that the name of any country shall be added to that subsection. Then sub-s. (5) provides that

"Her Majesty may by Order in Council direct that any country for the time being named in sub-s. (4) ... shall not form part of the Commonwealth preference area."

Manifestly the words "for the time being" in sub-s. (5) have nothing to do with the time when goods are grown, produced or manufactured and consigned. I think that these words are used in the same sense in sub-s. (3) as that in which they are used in sub-s. (5). In my view, the words "for the time being" mean at any relevant time during which the Act is in force. The relevant time for the purposes of sub-s. (5) is the time when Her Majesty makes a direction under that subsection. In my judgment, the relevant time for the purpose of sub-s. (3) (c) is the time when the duty is chargeable. The question then to be asked in order to decide whether the goods then qualify for Commonwealth preference is "were the goods grown, produced or manufactured in and consigned from a country or countries now in the Commonwealth preference area?"

No doubt this view has harsh consequences for persons engaged in trade between the United Kingdom and any country struck out of or deserting the Commonwealth preference area; it also has happy consequences for persons engaged in trade between the United Kingdom and any country immediately on that

- A country's admission to the Commonwealth preference area. I can find no reason, however, to suppose that these results would be in any way contrary to the intention of Parliament. Parliament no doubt contemplated that a country would not be banished from the Commonwealth preference area unless it was intended for good cause—as in the case of Southern Rhodesia—to damage that country's economy by damaging its trade with the United Kingdom. Parliament would also no doubt wish there to be a strong disincentive against any country deserting the Commonwealth preference area. It would also probably wish to confer the full benefits of Commonwealth preference immediately on any country's admission to that area. When a statutory power is exercised in relation to any place so as to exclude it from, or include it in, the Commonwealth preference area, special provisions may be made to mitigate some of the hardships incurred by the exclusion or to cut down some of the immediate benefits conferred by the inclusion. For example, Southern Rhodesia was excluded from the Commonwealth preference area as from midnight on Nov. 18, 1965, by the Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) Order 1965, (3), as amended (4). If the construction of the Acts of 1958 and 1964 which I favour is correct, and if it was so understood by those responsible for the Orders in Council to which I have referred, then they mitigated some of the hardship caused through Southern Rhodesia's exclusion by providing that it should not affect the rate of customs duty chargeable on any goods entered for warehousing or which had been shipped in a ship which sailed from Lourenço Marques or Beira or any port in the Commonwealth preference area before Nov. 19, 1965. Whichever construction of s. 2 of the Act of 1958, as incorporated in the Act of 1964, is correct, real hardship for persons engaged in trade between the United Kingdom and a country struck out of the Commonwealth preference area is unavoidable. The plaintiffs suffer just as much hardship in respect of their tobacco in store in Rhodesia as they do in respect of their tobacco in transit from that country on Nov. 18, 1965. It is also hard on them, that, no doubt relying on Southern Rhodesia being in the Commonwealth preference area, they invested large sums of money in tobacco plantations and in factories there. It seems to me that people engaged in trade between the United Kingdom and a country in the Commonwealth preference area take the risk, small though it is, that the preference may be withdrawn at any time, just as any importer into the United Kingdom takes the risk that import duty may be increased between the time when he ships the goods and the time when the duty becomes chargeable.
- G According to counsel for the plaintiffs' submission, those responsible for the relevant Orders in Council mistakenly adopted the same construction of the Acts of 1958 and 1964 as the learned judge and I have done. Counsel says that, in such circumstances, it must follow that the provisions in those Orders in Council purporting to mitigate their hardship are merely otiose since goods grown, produced or manufactured in Rhodesia and consigned from one of the appropriate places before Nov. 19, 1965, would be automatically franked with a qualification for Commonwealth preference as from the date of their consignment and would necessarily qualify for such preference when they come to be charged with duty. If my construction of the Acts of 1958 and 1964 is wrong and was adopted by those responsible for the Orders in Council, then I agree that the exempting articles in the Orders in Council are otiose. I would pause here to say that the Orders in Council were, of course, laid before Parliament, if only for a very short time, before coming into operation. Assuming that they are based on the same construction of the 1958 and the 1964 Acts as that which I adopt, then if there is any ambiguity about these statutes, the fact that the Orders in Council were laid before Parliament before coming into operation may, perhaps, lend some slight further support to the conclusion which I have reached.

(3) S.I. 1965 No. 1954.

(4) By the Southern Rhodesia (Withdrawal of Commonwealth Preference) (No. 2) Order 1965 (S.I. 1965 No. 1987).

Even if the learned judge and I are wrong on this difficult point of construction, it does not necessarily follow that those responsible for the Orders in Council have fallen into the same error as we have done. They may, although, I confess, I doubt it, have read the Acts in the same way as counsel for the plaintiffs invited us to read them. Counsel for the commissioners contends that, if that be the case, their intention must have been to withdraw Commonwealth preference from Southern Rhodesian goods even after they were franked in the sense for which counsel for the plaintiffs contends. Accordingly, says counsel for the commissioners, they are saved by the first Order in Council (5). Article 1 of that order reads as follows:

"Southern Rhodesia shall, while this order is in force, be excluded from the . . . Commonwealth preference area, and accordingly while this order is in force—(a) the countries described in s. 2 (2) (c) of [the Act of 1958] . . . shall be taken not to include Southern Rhodesia . . ."

This may mean that, whenever you look at the Act of 1958 for any purpose after Nov. 18, 1965, you read it as if it has no application and never had any application to Southern Rhodesia. Accordingly, since you must look at it at the time when duty is chargeable, i.e., in this case long after Nov. 18, 1965, in order to ascertain whether the tobacco bears the full or the Commonwealth rate of duty, you must take it that Southern Rhodesia is not and never was referred to in the Act of 1958. Therefore, the tobacco bears the full rate of duty. Counsel for the commissioners, I think, concedes that art. 1 is not very elegantly drafted if that is its meaning, but contends, nevertheless, that that is a possible meaning for it to bear. Its meaning, he says, is at any rate ambiguous. Accordingly, in order to discover its true meaning, you must look at the article in the context of the other provisions of the first Order in Council (5) and of the amending Order in Council (6). These provisions would be quite unnecessary unless art. 1 bears the meaning for which the commissioners contend. Accordingly, it does bear that meaning. This argument may be sound if one assumes that those responsible for the first Order in Council understood the Acts of 1958 and 1964 in the sense for which counsel for the plaintiffs contends. I find this a difficult assumption, because, in my judgment, those Acts do not bear that meaning. I therefore, base my decision in favour of the commissioners on what I regard as the true meaning of the Acts of 1958 and 1964 rather than on what seems to me to be a somewhat strained meaning of art. 1 of the first Order in Council.

Since I am in favour of the commissioners on the first point that arises in this appeal, namely, the true construction of the Acts of 1958 and 1964, it is unnecessary for me to express any concluded view on the second point, namely, whether or not the tobacco was consigned to the United Kingdom from Southern Rhodesia. Since this case may, however, go further, I would add that I am broadly in agreement with the learned judge and with the views expressed by LORD DENNING, M.R., on the second point. Had I agreed with LORD DENNING, M.R., on the first point, which unhappily I am unable to do, I would have been in favour of allowing the appeal. As it is, I would dismiss it.

EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: The essence of the submission of counsel for the Commissioners, which prevailed before the learned trial judge, is that, in order to qualify for Commonwealth preference under s. 2 of the Import Duties Act, 1958, the only relevant date is that on which the five cases of tobacco were removed from bond. He submits that the sole question is whether at that date they qualified for Commonwealth preference, and, so far, counsel for the plaintiffs does not contend otherwise. The difference between the contending views arises when one asks the further question: what tests are to be applied in determining whether at that date the goods so qualify? Counsel for the commissioners has urged that a clear working rule is called for, and that one is in fact supplied by the

A Act of 1958. According to him, all the customs officer (having ready to hand a list of the countries which are currently within the Commonwealth preference area) has to do on the day when the goods are sought to be removed, is to ask himself two questions: (i) Adverting to s. 12 (1), "Where were these goods grown, produced or manufactured?" If the answer to that question is that they were grown, produced or manufactured in one of the countries appearing on his list, B he should then proceed to ask himself: (ii) Adverting to s. 2 (2), "From what place were these goods consigned to the United Kingdom?" If the answer to that question is that they were consigned from one of the countries on his current list, the importer has cleared all hurdles and is entitled to preference. As, however the list of countries within the Commonwealth preference area may from time to time be added to (see the proviso to s. 2 (4)), or curtailed (see s. 2 (5)), it follows that, C although the countries where the goods were grown or whence they were consigned were Commonwealth preference countries when those events occurred, they may have ceased so to be by the time the customs officer looks at his list. If so, says counsel for the commissioners, the goods must bear the full import duty.

It may be that, whatever tests one applies, curious results will follow in the odd case; but the tests urged on the court by counsel for the commissioners do not D appear to me to be those best calculated to promote the obvious intention of Parliament in promoting its Commonwealth preference legislation. On the contrary, they could well result in preference being gained in respect of goods grown in a country which at the time of being grown was outside the preference area, and gained simply because at the time the importer seeks to withdraw them from bond that country has meanwhile come within the preference area. Conversely, E as in the present case, goods grown and consigned with a view to Commonwealth preference are to be deprived thereof if, by the time the importer seeks to remove them from bond the country or countries of growth and consignment have become outside the area. I should not be prepared to adopt an interpretation of the statute which led to such odd consequences unless its wording admitted of no other course. Although the matter is by no means free from difficulty, counsel F for the plaintiffs has satisfied me that such other course is open to the court. The key to the problem is to be found in s. 2 (3) (c) of the Act of 1958, with its provision that the Commonwealth preference area shall consist of "any country not named (nor included in a country named) in the said sub-s. (4) which for the time being forms part of Her Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom."

G What is contemplated by the phrase "for the time being"? Neither s. 1 (1) (the charging section) nor s. 2 (1) (the exempting or relieving section) makes any reference to time. The inquiry being whether the goods qualify for Commonwealth preference, ex hypothesi they must already be in the United Kingdom and the question arises only when the importer seeks to withdraw them from bond. To ascertain whether he is then entitled to the preferential rate, he has to show H that they come within s. 2 (2) as being:

"... any goods of the area referred to in this Act as the Commonwealth preference area which are consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area."

I He must, in other words, show that they are "goods of the area" and this, in the light of s. 12 (1), means that he must show that they were goods "grown, produced or manufactured" in a country within the Commonwealth preference area. Furthermore, he must show that they were consigned here from a place in that area. We being concerned with goods both grown in and consigned from Southern Rhodesia, a country which undoubtedly was within s. 2 (3) (c) before the Southern Rhodesia Act 1965, we may (as counsel for the plaintiffs rightly submitted) expand the reference in s. 2 (2) to "goods of the area" as comprising, for present purposes, goods grown, produced or manufactured in a country which for the time being formed part of the preference area, and its reference to goods “ consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area ” as having, mutatis mutandis, a similar connotation. A

Section 2 (2) being so read, “ the time being ” adverted to must surely, in the one case, refer to the time when the goods in question were grown, produced or manufactured, and, in the other, to the time when they were consigned to the United Kingdom. Such a reference seems not only right as a piece of interpretation, but it also serves to advance the object aimed at by the legislature. It focuses attention on the time at which actions material to Commonwealth preference were performed, i.e., were the goods grown in the Commonwealth preference area and were they consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area? If so, Commonwealth trade is promoted and the benefit of Commonwealth preference earned. Accordingly, when the customs officer has to ascertain the duty payable, on request made by the importer for his goods, he must not refer simply to a list which shows what countries at that date fall within the Commonwealth preference area. He must have regard to the anterior history of the dutiable goods and ascertain what was the status or the place or places of growth and consignment when the process of growth or the act of consignment occurred. At one time I was impressed by counsel for the commissioners’ observation that to do this would impose a task of great complexity on the customs officers, but, on further reflection, I do not think that the test which he advocated would be one whit less onerous than many of those with which they are already charged. B C D

Did the two Orders in Council (7) affect the legal position? Counsel for the commissioners submitted that they compel the rejection of preference in the present case, and that importers removing them from bond on or after Nov. 19, 1965, would be entitled to no preference unless they could show (pursuant to art. 2 of the first order) that the goods had been “ entered for warehousing ” before that date or (pursuant to the second order) that they had been shipped before that date from one of the specified ports. This appears to confer on the orders a retrospective operation which, prima facie, they do not possess. If goods en route for the United Kingdom were already assured of their Commonwealth preference on their arrival here, are they deprived of that preference unless before Nov. 19, 1965, they were shipped or entered for warehousing? In my judgment, they are not. I adopt counsel for the plaintiffs’ view that, in applying the first order to s. 2 (3) (c) of the Act of 1958, one should read the latter as supplemented by some such words as “ excluding Southern Rhodesia as from Nov. 19, 1965 ”. Read in this way, it would follow that the present consignments are entitled to preference. It is, however, clear, that, on this reading, art. 2 of the first order and the entire second order become otiose since, if that reading be right, the dates when the goods were shipped or entered for warehousing are irrelevant. It is not unknown, however, for draftsmen to embark on their task with a mistaken view as to the effect of the existing law. I think that that is what has happened here, it being considered that the question of entitlement to preference fell to be determined solely by preference to the status of the country of growth or of consignment at the date when the goods were being withdrawn from bond. For the reasons which I have already indicated, in my judgment, that is not the law. In the result, the Orders in Council did not operate to deprive these particular consignments of any preferential right they would otherwise possess. E F G H

That, however, is not the end of the matter. Counsel for the commissioners contends that, even if he be wrong in his main submission, nevertheless this tobacco must bear the full rate of import duty. His argument proceeds in this way. Even on the test of counsel for the plaintiffs, the goods must have been consigned to the United Kingdom from a place which at the date when they were so consigned was within the Commonwealth preference area. Goods are “ consigned to the United Kingdom ” when there have been completed by or on behalf of the consignor all arrangements necessary to procure a continuum of carriage (or, to I

- A use another phrase of counsel for the plaintiffs, a continuous transit) from the place of consignment to the destination called for or nominated by him without further directions by him or on his behalf and the goods have actually been launched on that continuous transit. Counsel for the commissioners submits that, unless all this had been done by midnight on Nov. 18, 1965, none of these goods grown in and sent from Southern Rhodesia qualified for preference. He
- B does not insist that the arrangements for continuous transit to the United Kingdom must have been completed before the goods started off on their journey from a place within the Commonwealth preference area or even whilst they were still within such an area, but he does insist that such completion shall have been effected before the time-limit expired. If this be the right test to apply, it follows that none of these goods are entitled to preference, for, by midnight on Nov. 18,
- C 1965, although some of them were already at Beira and shipping space had been booked some days previously, final shipping arrangements to the United Kingdom were effected later than Nov. 19, 1965, and this was then done not by the plaintiffs but by the forwarding agents.

In my view, counsel for the commissioners seeks to attach too narrow a meaning to the term "consigned". I prefer the test propounded by the learned

- D judge in the following words:

"First, I think there must be an intention on the part of the consignor to send the goods from the one place to the other. It is not, of course, enough that there should be an intention which he keeps to himself, an intention which is wholly unmanifested by any overt act . . . It is not enough that the consignor at that stage should have sent the goods off to an intermediate

E port with perhaps a half-formed intention that the goods might, if market conditions were suitable, end in the United Kingdom. Nothing of that kind will, I think, suffice. There has always to be a state of facts . . . relating to the goods which, coupled with the intention of the consignor, shows that those goods are in the course of being transmitted from a place in the Commonwealth preference area to the United Kingdom for importation into the United

F Kingdom and not elsewhere."

In the light of that test, let us consider the facts of the present case: Before Nov. 19, 1965, all five cases of tobacco had been packed, marked and documented for the United Kingdom; all five were on rail to Beira en route to the United Kingdom or were at Beira awaiting shipment to the United Kingdom; all the circumstances indicate that they were in transit to the United Kingdom and to

G nowhere else; four out of the five cases had left Salisbury, three of them had left Southern Rhodesia; in all except one case, instructions had been given to the forwarding agents in Beira; and shipping space for the United Kingdom had been booked in relation to the consignment of which all five cases formed part. Had they been "consigned to the United Kingdom" by Nov. 19, 1965? No, says

H counsel for the commissioners, for by that date there had been completed by or on behalf of the consignor no through contract of carriage from Southern Rhodesia to the United Kingdom. But a through bill of lading is not very common, and to insist on such having been arranged is, in my judgment, to attach to the word "consigned" an unduly narrow and legalistic connotation. Applying the test enunciated by the learned judge, I agree with him in holding that, before Nov. 19,

I 1965, all five cases of tobacco in the present case had been "consigned to the United Kingdom" from Salisbury. On the dates when they were so consigned that was "a place within" the Commonwealth preference area, and they were, therefore, entitled to preference.

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal in respect of all five cases and make the declarations sought. Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords.

Customs—Commonwealth preference—Consignment of goods to the United Kingdom—No through bill of lading—Mustard seed grown in Canada and shipped to United Kingdom via Holland—Whether consigned from Commonwealth preference area to United Kingdom—Import Duties Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2 c. 6), s. 2 (2).

Customs—Imported goods—Interest—Deposit by way of security for unpaid duty made by importers in 1964—Notice specifying correct amount of duty payable given by commissioners in 1966—Repayment of security to importers ordered by court—Whether interest on security runs from date of deposit or date of notice—Customs and Excise Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 and 1 Eliz. 2 c. 44), s. 255 (3), s. 260 (2).

Up till the end of 1962, the plaintiffs purchased mustard seed grown in Canada which was shipped direct from Canada to London and thence by coaster to Norwich, thus qualifying for Commonwealth preference. In 1963, being unable to arrange for direct shipment to England, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with Canadian growers for four parcels of mustard seed c.i.f. Antwerp/Rotterdam. Before the mustard seed was shipped, the plaintiffs arranged for the seed to be transhipped into coasters at Rotterdam or Antwerp for transportation to Norwich, and they also arranged for insurance to cover the risk from free alongside Vancouver to London and thence by rail or coasters to Norwich, including, if necessary, transshipment at a continental port. Each of the parcels arrived at Norwich via Rotterdam or Antwerp. The plaintiffs claimed Commonwealth preference on the mustard seed, but the customs claimed that the full rate of duty would be payable since the parcels had not been consigned from a Commonwealth preference area (Canada) to the United Kingdom within the meaning of s. 2 (2)* of the Import Duties Act, 1958. Early in 1964, the plaintiffs deposited £10,000 with the customs under s. 255 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952, as security for having the parcels of mustard seed released to them. On Mar. 15, 1966, the customs gave notice to the plaintiffs under s. 255 (3)† of the Act of 1952 specifying £9,006 14s. 6d. as the correct amount of duty, and returned the balance of £993 5s. 6d. to the plaintiffs, who claimed interest on the £9,006 14s. 6d. from the date of the deposit in 1964. By the proviso to s. 255 (3), no interest was to be paid under s. 260 (2)‡ in respect of any period before any further sum was paid as duty over and above the amount deposited as security; and by s. 260 (2), interest was payable on any amount of duty found by the court to be overpaid from the date of the overpayment.

Held: (i) the parcels of mustard seed qualified for Commonwealth preference because, on the facts, they had been consigned to the United Kingdom from Canada within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1958, since they had come to the United Kingdom by one continuous journey and had not entered the commerce of any other country (see p. 834, letter I, p. 837, letter I, to p. 838, letter A, and p. 840, letters G and I, post).

(ii) interest was payable on the £9,006 14s. 6d. from Mar. 15, 1966, when the customs gave notice to the plaintiffs specifying that sum as the correct amount of duty, because the effect of the proviso to s. 255 (3) of the Act of * Section 2 (2), so far as material, is set out at p. 837, letter B, post.

† Section 255 (3), so far as material, is set out at p. 838, letter H, post.

‡ Section 260 (2), so far as material, is set out at p. 836, letter D, post.

A 1952 on s. 260 (2) of that Act meant that interest was only payable on overpaid duty and no duty had been overpaid until Mar. 15, 1966, there being a distinction between a sum being in payment of duty (which did not happen until the notice was given) and being deposited as security for future payment of duty (see p. 836, letter D, p. 838, letter G, p. 839, letter G, p. 840, letter I, to p. 841, letter A, post).

B Appeal dismissed as to (i), allowed as to (ii).

[Editorial Note. It was conceded before ROSKILL, J., by counsel for the commissioners that such interest as ran on the money repayable would run until the date of repayment; it should be noted that interest was awarded by ROSKILL, J., at six per cent. per annum, not four per cent. per annum.

Appeal.

E This was an appeal by the defendants, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, in proceedings begun by J. & J. Colman, Ltd., by originating summons issued on May 25, 1966, claiming a declaration, and an order for repayment of £9,006 14s. 6d., part of a sum of £10,000 deposited as security for import duty. By his judgment given on July 21, 1967, ROSKILL, J., declared (as asked by the originating summons) that (i) no import duty was payable on any of the goods specified in the defendants' determination dated Mar. 15, 1966, under s. 255 of F the Customs and Excise Act, 1952, in respect of four consignments of brown mustard seed from Vancouver, British Columbia, on the ground that the goods qualified for Commonwealth preference under the provisions of s. 2 of the Import Duties Act, 1958; (ii) the plaintiffs were entitled to repayment of the £9,006 14s. 6d. together with interest at six per cent. per annum on sums deposited as security under s. 255 of the Act of 1952 from the date of the deposit until repayment. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

G R. A. MacCrindle, Q.C., Nigel Bridge and A. B. Hidden for the defendants, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise.

R. J. Parker, Q.C., and Adrian Hamilton for the plaintiffs.

H Apr. 30. The following judgments were read.

LORD DENNING, M.R.: The plaintiffs, J. & J. Colman, Ltd., are the well-known makers of mustard. They get their mustard seed from Canada. This has the great advantage that, coming from Canada, it qualifies for Commonwealth preference; so that the plaintiffs pay less customs duty on it. Up till the end of 1962 all went well. The mustard seed was grown in Canada. It was sold by the Canadian growers to the plaintiffs and shipped direct by ocean-going vessel from Vancouver in British Columbia to London, whence it was shipped by coaster to Norwich. Clearly it qualified for Commonwealth preference. But early in 1963 most of the ships were busily engaged in carrying grain from Canada and had no room for mustard seed; with the result that the plaintiffs could not arrange for direct shipment of their mustard seed from Vancouver to England. So they arranged for it to come via Rotterdam or Antwerp. It was taken by ocean-going vessel from Vancouver to Rotterdam or Antwerp. Then it was transhipped into a coaster for transport to England. The question is whether, on the parcels so transhipped, the plaintiffs are still entitled to Commonwealth preference. The relevant section is s. 2 (2) of the Import Duties Act, 1958, which, in conjunction with s. 12 (1), provides that the goods qualifying for Commonwealth preference shall be any goods grown, produced or manufactured in the Commonwealth preference area which are consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area. The mustard seed was undoubtedly grown in the Commonwealth preference area, so there is no difficulty on that score. The only question is whether it was "consigned to the United Kingdom" from Canada. On this point I will take a typical parcel. A

On Mar. 11, 1963, the Canadian growers agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 2,500 long tons of brown mustard seed. Shipment after harvest. Price 122.00 dollars per long ton, c.i.f. Antwerp/Rotterdam. Payment net cash against documents, including on-board bill of lading. At the time of that contract, it was the intention of the plaintiffs (of which the Canadian growers were aware) that the mustard seed should be transported from Canada to Norwich for use by the plaintiffs in their factory at Norwich. On Sept. 19, 1963, before the goods were shipped, the plaintiffs got a quotation from the owners of coastal vessels for the carriage of mustard seed from Rotterdam to England. On Oct. 31, 1963, the Canadian growers shipped five hundred tons of mustard seed on board an ocean-going vessel at Vancouver under a bill of lading under which they were consigned to Rotterdam to the order of the Canadian growers. The bill of lading contained a note "Freight assessed to Rotterdam only. Goods destined Norwich, England via Rotterdam, Holland". After the goods were loaded, but before the vessel sailed, the plaintiffs insured the goods B

"From free alongside Vancouver to London and thence by rail or coasters to Carrow Works, Norwich. Including, if required, transshipment at continental port." C

After the vessel left Vancouver, but before it arrived at Rotterdam, the plaintiffs made contract with the owners of the coasters for the onward carriage to Norwich. On Jan. 15, 1964, the vessel arrived at Rotterdam. The goods were transhipped into coasters and arrived at Norwich on Jan. 17, 1964. There were three other lots of five hundred tons each, similarly dealt with. On arrival, the plaintiffs claimed Commonwealth preference on the mustard seed; but the customs authorities did not accept it. They would not release the goods until the plaintiffs gave security. They asked £2,500 on each parcel by way of security, that is, £10,000 on the four parcels. The plaintiffs paid that sum early in 1964, and got delivery of the mustard seed. Two years later, on Mar. 15, 1966, the customs authorities gave notice to the plaintiffs specifying the sum of £9,006 14s. 6d. as the correct amount of duty. They retained that sum out of the deposit of £10,000 and returned the balance of £993 5s. 6d. to the plaintiffs on Mar. 15, 1966. D

1. Were the parcels entitled to Commonwealth preference? The mustard seed was from Canada. It qualifies for Commonwealth preference if it was "consigned to the United Kingdom from Canada". What is the meaning of the words "consigned to"? That is the question. I endeavoured to answer it in Gallagher, Ltd. v. Comrs. of Customs and Excise (1). Applying what I there said, I think that goods are "consigned to the United Kingdom from Canada" when they are delivered to a carrier in Canada for continuous transit to the United Kingdom. The sender must intend that they should go direct to the United Kingdom and not be taken into the commerce of any other country; and that intention must be realised. In my opinion, these parcels of mustard E

A seed fulfil that test. The Canadian growers delivered them to the ship at Vancouver, intending that they should go by continuous transit to England. It is true that, at that time, the contract of carriage was only concluded so far as Rotterdam. There was no through contract to England and the onwards contracts from Rotterdam had not at that time been concluded; but that does not matter. The intention was plain. The goods were to be transshipped at Rotterdam into a coaster for transit to England. They were so transshipped; and they reached England in one continuous transit without being taken into the commerce of any other country. They qualify, therefore, for Commonwealth preference.

At one time the customs authorities would have accepted this view. We were shown notices which they issue telling importers what evidence is required to show that the goods were "consigned to" the United Kingdom from a Commonwealth port. According to the notices from 1959 to 1962, all these parcels would have qualified for Commonwealth preference; but in May, 1963, the customs authorities issued a new notice imposing more stringent requirements. The plaintiffs were unaware of these new requirements when these particular parcels were shipped; and so did not comply with them. When they did become aware of them, they tried hastily to amend the bills of lading of two of the parcels so as to comply with the new requirements; but that was too late. The matter has to be tested as at the time the goods were shipped from Canada. So none of the parcels satisfied the new requirements. Nevertheless, although the new notice was not satisfied, I think that the parcels qualify for Commonwealth preference. The customs authorities cannot, by these notices, make the law or alter it. Their notices afford valuable guidance to commercial men, because they show what evidence will satisfy the customs authorities. Parcels which conform to them will pass without question. But the notices are not conclusive. It is open to the owner to dispute the matter before a referee or the court under s. 260 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952. And that is what the plaintiffs have done here.

I am satisfied that these parcels were consigned to the United Kingdom from Canada and qualify for Commonwealth preference. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal on this point.

2. Are the plaintiffs entitled to interest on their money? Early in 1964, the plaintiffs deposited £10,000 with the customs as security. Two years later the customs said that the correct amount due was £9,006 14s. 6d. and returned £993 5s. 6d. They must now return the £9,006 14s. 6d. The plaintiffs say that the customs have had the use of the money all this time and should pay interest on it from the beginning of 1964. The commissioners say that interest is not payable. The right to interest depends on the wording of the statute. The relevant sections are s. 255 and s. 260 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952. They are most confusing. So much so that I will not attempt to analyse them, but will simply state the effect of them:

First: If the customs officer demands a definite sum, say £10,000, as duty, and the importer disputes it—he must pay the sum demanded in order to get the goods. If he appeals to the court and gets the sum reduced or extinguished, he gets back the amount overpaid with interest thereon from the date of the overpayment (see s. 260 (2) of the Act of 1952).

Secondly: If the customs officer cannot say what is the correct sum, he can ask the importer to put down a sum of money as security in order to get the goods. Let us say it is £10,000. The commissioners then look into the matter and decided that, in their opinion, the correct sum is £11,000. They give notice a to the importer specifying £11,000 as the correct sum. They require him to pay the extra £1,000. If he disputes their ruling, he can appeal to the court, but he first must pay the extra £1,000. If he succeeds in getting the £11,000 reduced or extinguished, he gets back the amount which he has overpaid with interest.

But from what date does the interest run? The last words of s. 255 (3) provide that "no interest shall be paid . . . in respect of any period before" the extra £1,000 was paid. That makes it clear that interest does not run from the time when the £10,000 was deposited, but only from the time that the extra £1,000 was paid. A

Thirdly: Take the second case but with this difference. Suppose the commissioners decide not that £11,000 is the correct sum but that £9,000 is correct. B They give a notice to the importer specifying £9,000 as the correct sum. As he has already paid £10,000 as security, they must repay him the £1,000 that he has overpaid. If he accepts their ruling as correct, he cannot recover interest on that £10,000, because there is no provision in the statute for it. If he disputes their ruling, he can appeal to the court. If he succeeds in getting the £9,000 reduced or extinguished, he gets back so much of the £9,000 as he has overpaid, C with interest; but from what date does the interest run? From the date when he lodged the money as security, or from the date when the commissioners gave their notice specifying £9,000 as the correct sum? The Act of 1952 is not clear on this point. Section 255 (3) provides that s. 260 "shall have effect accordingly". Section 260 (2) provides that the "amount overpaid shall be repaid by the commissioners, together with interest thereon from the date of the overpayment . . ." D What is the date of the overpayment? I think that it is the date when the commissioners specified £9,000 as the correct sum. Before that date there was no overpayment, but only a sum deposited as security. After that date, there was an overpayment, because the deposited sum was then appropriated as payment. I am confirmed in this view by the consideration that, in the second and third cases taken above, interest must run from the same date. E It must either be from the date when the £10,000 is deposited or from the date when the commissioners specify what, in their opinion, is the correct sum (£11,000 or £9,000, as the case may be). If in the one case interest is not payable from the date of deposit (but only from the date of overpayment), so also in the other case.

Applying these considerations, I think that interest is payable on the £9,000 14s. 6d. from the date when the customs gave a notice specifying that sum as the correct sum, i.e., from Mar. 15, 1966. I am afraid that the judge was in error in giving interest from the date of the deposit in 1964. I would allow the appeal on this point. F

SALMON, L.J.: All the mustard seed in the four parcels with which this appeal is concerned was grown in and consigned from Canada. Canada is and always has been in the Commonwealth preference area. Each parcel (as everyone well know) was destined for the United Kingdom when it left Vancouver. It had been bought from the Canadian suppliers for use in the plaintiffs' factory in Norwich. The contract with the suppliers was c.i.f. Antwerp/Rotterdam. Before the four parcels left Canada, the plaintiffs arranged for them to be transhipped into coasters at Rotterdam or Antwerp for onward transportation to Norwich. Before, however, the first parcel left Canada, the plaintiffs, in spite of the fact that this was a c.i.f. contract, had arranged for insurance to cover the risk. G

"From free alongside Vancouver to London and thence by rail or coasters to . . . Norwich. Including, if required, transshipment at continental port." H I

Each parcel arrived at Norwich via Rotterdam or Antwerp. It was because of shortage of shipping space in vessels sailing direct from Vancouver to the United Kingdom that these parcels were shipped to Rotterdam or Antwerp and then transferred into coasters for Norwich.

Formerly, mustard seed bought by the plaintiffs in Canada (which was an important source of supply) had been shipped from Vancouver direct to London

A and thence to Norwich. The seed bought by the plaintiffs in Canada had always in the past been accepted by the customs as qualifying for Commonwealth preference. It obviously did so. The customs, however, sought to charge the four parcels with which we are now concerned with the full rate of duty, contending that they had not been consigned from Canada to the United Kingdom. On the brief facts which I have recited, this seems a curious contention and the
 B learned judge rejected it. I agree with him. Section 2 (2) of the Import Duties Act, 1958, provides that “... goods qualifying for Commonwealth preference shall be any goods of the . . . Commonwealth preference area which are consigned to the United Kingdom from a place in that area.”

C The mustard seed was clearly of the Commonwealth area inasmuch as it was grown in Canada (s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1958). Was it, however, consigned for the purposes of the Act from that area to the United Kingdom? I have no hesitation in answering this question in the affirmative. I do not propose to attempt any elaborate definition of the word “consign”. It has been argued on behalf of the commissioners that goods cannot be truly said, for the purpose of the D Act of 1958, to be consigned from a Commonwealth preference area unless before they leave that area either there exists a single contract of transportation to the United Kingdom or a series of such contracts. This argument seems to me to read a great deal too much into the single word “consign”—certainly much more than its dictionary meaning which primarily is “to transmit”. Moreover, the elaborate meaning which the customs seek to attach to the word “consign”
 E seems to me contrary to the manifest intention of the Act of 1958. The Act of 1958 was intended to promote trade between the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth area. For this purpose in the present case, the identity of the the persons who made the transportation arrangements and the precise date or dates on which these arrangements were made are quite irrelevant. It does not matter, for example, whether the Canadian sellers arranged transport as far as
 F Rotterdam or Antwerp and the English buyers arranged onward transport to the United Kingdom, nor whether the arrangements for onward transport were made before or after the goods left Canada. There can be no doubt on the facts of this case that the transactions with which it is concerned clearly constituted trade between the United Kingdom and Canada. It has been argued that it would have been possible for the buyers, once the goods arrived in Antwerp or G Rotterdam, to have arranged for them to be sent somewhere other than to the United Kingdom. No doubt this is theoretically possible; but the same would be true if the whole of the transportation had been arranged before the goods left Canada.

In my view, the question whether or not goods are “consigned” from the Commonwealth preference area to the United Kingdom within the meaning of that word in s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1958 is essentially a question of fact. Suppose a H Canadian grower sold to a continental buyer and consigned the goods to him say in Holland, and then the continental buyer resold the goods to an English manufacturer and consigned the goods to him in the United Kingdom. It would clearly be impossible in such circumstances to hold that the goods were consigned from Canada to the United Kingdom for the purpose of s. 2 (2), or
 I indeed for any other purpose. The transaction certainly would not constitute trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. In the present case, however, no sensible commercial man could entertain any doubt but that these goods were consigned or transmitted from Vancouver to Norwich via Antwerp or Rotterdam, and I can see no good reason why a lawyer should decide the point differently. I can imagine cases in which the point might not be so easy to decide. In such cases, as indeed in the present case, the tests suggested by counsel for the plaintiffs offer a useful guide. Were the goods landed or intended to be landed otherwise than in England? Did the goods enter, or was it ever contemplated that they should enter, the commerce of any country other than England? However one looks at the facts of this case and whatever test one applies, I have no doubt but that the learned judge was quite right in deciding that these four parcels of mustard seed qualified for Commonwealth preference, and I accordingly agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that the appeal should be dismissed on this point. A

I must now deal with a much more difficult point. Early in 1964, the plaintiffs deposited £10,000 in all with the customs as security for having their parcels of mustard seed released to them. Two years later, in March, 1966, the customs notified them that the duty payable was £9,006 14s. 6d. and returned the balance of £993 5s. 6d. Clearly, as counsel for the plaintiffs concedes, no interest is payable on this latter sum, nor do I think that the learned judge intended to hold that it was. Equally clearly, interest is payable on the sum of £9,006 14s. 6d. which, as a result of these proceedings, must now be returned. The real question is does the interest run from early in 1964 or only from March, 1966? The customs have had the use of the money since early in 1964. The plaintiffs gained nothing by this £10,000 being exacted as security rather than as duty. Had the customs chosen to take it as duty, clearly interest would have run from early in 1964. Ordinary justice seems to demand that interest should be payable from then. The right to interest, however, depends entirely on statute—see s. 255 and s. 260 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952. Hard as I have tried, I confess that I have been quite unable to read these statutory provisions so as to give the plaintiffs any right to interest before March, 1966. Clearly, if the customs had returned the sum of £9,006 14s. 6d. to the plaintiffs voluntarily in March, 1966, the plaintiffs could not have claimed any interest. It seems odd that, if interest runs from the date of the deposit of the security, Parliament could have intended the right to interest to depend on whether the customs return an amount deposited as security voluntarily or by order of an arbitrator or the court. Section 255 (3) clearly contemplates that the amount deposited as security may be greater or smaller than the amount later specified in the notice as being the amount of duty payable. The difference has to be “paid or repaid”. If there is any more duty to be paid by the importer (a rare occurrence, I imagine), the customs receive no interest on that sum, yet the importer has had the use of it ever since his goods were released to him by the customs. It is for this reason, I think, that the customs have no obligation to pay interest on any deposit by way of security which they voluntarily return to the importer. B C D E F

In my view, s. 255 regards the deposit or payment of money by way of security as something quite different from payment of duty. The language of the section is significant. Subsection (1) gives the customs power to allow the importer to take his goods G

“upon . . . giving security by deposit of money . . . for the payment of any amount unpaid which may be payable by way of duty.”

This seems to me to contemplate (i) a present deposit of money as security for unpaid duty, and then (ii) a future payment of duty out of that money. Subsection (3) provides that the customs H “shall, when they have determined the amount of duty which . . . is payable, give the importer a notice specifying that amount . . .”

I do not think that the payment of duty is deemed to relate back to the date of the payment of the deposit but to the date of the notice. It is at that date that the amount held as security, or part of it, is appropriated to the payment of duty. This construction would also make some sense of the provision that no interest is payable on any money voluntarily returned by the customs at the time they serve the notice under sub-s. (3) and is only payable on any part of the deposit recovered thereafter by proceedings. Before the notice, no duty is deemed to have been paid. The customs and the importer are theoretically in the same position in respect of interest on money to be paid or repaid. Neither gets I

A any. If the customs do not return any or any sufficient money with the notice and the importer has to recover it by proceedings, he gets his interest, but only from the date of the notice, i.e., the date on which he is deemed to have overpaid the duty. Moreover, the construction which I adopt with considerable reluctance is the only one which seems to me to make any sense of the last part of the proviso to sub-s. (3). This contemplates the case of an importer who has given

B security bringing proceedings to challenge that any duty is payable when the notice served by the customs under sub-s. (3) demands a further sum to be paid as duty over and above the amount deposited as security. The last few lines of the proviso read

“and where any [further] sum so falls to be paid no interest shall be paid under sub-s. (2) of [s. 260] in respect of any period before that sum is paid.”

C It seems unlikely that, even in a modern statute, the draftsmen could have thought it necessary to provide that no interest should be payable by the customs on money before they receive it. However this may be, the words of the proviso are “no interest shall be paid under sub-s. (2) [of s. 260]”.

D The interest under that subsection is the interest on the amount, clearly the whole amount, overpaid. I think that the effect of the last part of the proviso is that it postpones the date from which interest runs from the date of the notice served under sub-s. (3) to the date on which the importer complies with the notice—as he is bound to do. This, again, seems to be sensible. The statutory obligation on the importer to pay the amount (if any) demanded by the notice could and should be complied with within a few days. The loss of interest for these few days would be negligible. If the importer delays in making the payment, the consequent loss of interest is his own fault. If, on the other hand, contrary to my view, interest normally runs from the date of the deposit of the security, the customs could, in every case, by the simple expedient of slightly underestimating the amount required as security and claiming payment in their

E notice of a further sum, however small, postpone the date from which interest runs not for days but perhaps for years. I cannot adopt a construction which leads to so strange a result.

F Accordingly, in my judgment, no interest was payable on the sum of £9,006 14s. 6d. prior to the date of the notice of March, 1966. To this extent only I would allow the appeal.

G EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: Two questions are raised by this appeal: (i) Do the four parcels of mustard seed consigned to the United Kingdom from Vancouver fall within s. 2 (2) of the Import Duties Act, 1958? (ii) If they do, are the plaintiffs, the importers, entitled to interest on the entire sum deposited by them pursuant to s. 255 of the Customs and Excise Act, 1952?

H As to question (i) I can be brief, the relevant facts having already been stated. The essence of the commissioners' case is that these parcels had not been “consigned to the United Kingdom” from Vancouver by Montana, the consignors. It is accepted that they expected all four parcels to be consigned to the United Kingdom, but it is said that all they did was to consign to continental ports; they never gave any instructions affecting the control or destination of the goods

I beyond those ports, and at the time when these goods were despatched from Vancouver through-carriage contracts from Canada to the United Kingdom had not been concluded. It is submitted that the plaintiffs' intention is immaterial, and that the only material consideration is: what was the intention of Montana, the consignors? It is said that the only intention of the latter was to ship from Vancouver to a continental port and that, accordingly, they did not “consign to the United Kingdom” even though they fully anticipated that, at that continental port, there would be prompt transshipment to the United Kingdom. Their anticipation or expectation is, it is submitted, insufficient unless it has led to their having arranged everything commercially necessary to ensure the continuous and complete transit of the goods from Vancouver to the United Kingdom and until, in consequence, the goods have been sent off pursuant to that arrangement. A

As the bill of lading provided that the goods were "consigned to order of Montana Mustard Seed Co., Ltd., Rotterdam", it is said that, when the goods were delivered to the plaintiffs at that port, nothing thereafter remained to be done by the consignors and it was entirely up to the plaintiffs to arrange the onward transmission to the United Kingdom of what had by such delivery become their own property. That, so it is submitted, means that at no time did Montana consign to the United Kingdom. Is that correct? In my judgment, these goods were "consigned to the United Kingdom" from Vancouver within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1958. I do not propose to repeat here the passage in the judgment of ROSKILL, J., in Gallaher, Ltd. v. Comrs. of Customs and Excise (2) as to the meaning of the word "consigned" which I have already indicated seems to me correct. Applying that same test to the facts of the present case, the learned judge added: B C

"When one looks at the totality of the evidence, notwithstanding the form of the contract and the form of the documents, it was always the intention both of Montana as seller, shipper and consignor, and of the plaintiffs as buyer, consignee and importer, that those goods should go from Vancouver to Rotterdam or Antwerp, and never be landed at Rotterdam or Antwerp, but there directly transhipped by coaster to Norwich. It seems to me plain, therefore, that not only did the plaintiffs have the relevant intention, but that Montana who were making the shipping arrangements as c.i.f. sellers to suit the wishes of their c.i.f. buyer, always intended to comply with the plaintiffs' wishes." D E

That all this was indeed the case emerges clearly from the agreed facts. Why, then, is it to be said that these goods were not "consigned to the United Kingdom" from Vancouver? Whence comes the requirement insisted on by the commissioners that the consignors must have themselves completed the through arrangements? It is said that this requirement is inextricably involved in the very word "consigned", but I do not see why this should be so. The wording of the Act of 1958 propounds no inquiry as to by whom, but simply as to "from" and "to" what places they were consigned. Provided that the goods were grown, produced or manufactured in the Commonwealth preference area and launched forth from a place in that area, then, provided also that, when they arrive in the United Kingdom, it can be said that they have come here by one continuous journey, in my judgment, they are entitled to Commonwealth preference no matter how many contracts of carriage made up the journey or by whom they were made. On the other hand, goods which may be said to have entered the commerce or industry of another country between the time they left the preference area and the time they reached the United Kingdom could not be said to have made one continuous journey between the two places, and so would be disentitled to preference. Such, in effect, were the submissions presented to this court by counsel for the plaintiffs. In my judgment, they are well founded. Applying them to the agreed facts, it follows that I concur with the learned trial judge in holding that these four parcels of seed attracted to themselves the preferential provisions of the Act of 1958, and that the plaintiffs were, accordingly, entitled to the declarations which the learned judge made. F G H I

As to question (ii), I had prepared an elaborate judgment which, happily, is now rendered superfluous because of the detailed treatment which the point involved has already received from my lords. In these circumstances, it is sufficient for me to say that I find myself reluctantly obliged to concur in holding, contrary to the finding of the learned judge, that the proper date from which

A interest became payable was Mar. 15, 1966, and not March, 1964, and it is common ground that it falls to be calculated on the sum of £9,006 14s. 6d. instead of £10,000.

PRACTICE DIRECTION.

PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (DIVORCE).

Divorce—Practice—Agreement or arrangement between parties—Reservation of trial to judge considering agreement or arrangement—Judge's direction noted on file—Regard to be had to direction when transfer of cause considered—Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 (c. 72) s. 5.

Where, in a cause proceeding in the divorce registry, an agreement or arrangement is considered by a High Court judge under s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 (1), the associate attending on the judge should ask the judge to indicate whether he reserves the trial of the cause to himself, and should note the file with the judge's direction. If the cause is, or becomes, undefended because of the agreement or arrangement or otherwise, the registrar who subsequently considers whether the cause should be transferred to the county court or retained in the High Court under the Matrimonial Causes Rules 1968 (2), r. 27 (1) or r. 124 (2) should have regard to any directions given by the judge who considered the agreement or arrangement. If the judge gives no direction, he should be deemed to have reserved the trial to himself.

Where, in a cause proceeding in the divorce registry, but treated as proceeding in a divorce county court, an agreement or arrangement is considered by a county court judge, the associate should ask the judge whether he reserves the trial of the cause to himself and note the file with the judge's direction. If an answer is likely to be filed, the judge may prefer not to deal with the agreement or arrangement but to leave it to be considered by a High Court judge after the cause has been transferred to the High Court.

By direction of the President with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor.

WHITE v. WESTON.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Russell and Sachs, L.J.J.), February 8, 9, 12, March 8, 1968.]

County Court—Practice—Service of summons—Service by post—Sending to address originally supplied by defendant at time of accident—Defendant no longer resident there at time of service—Summons did not reach defendant—No service—C.C.R. Ord. 8, r. 8 (3)—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 26.

County Court—Costs—Hearing—Want of service of summons—Order made at hearing set aside—Costs of hearing made costs in cause—Defendant entitled to have order set aside ex debito justitiae without any terms being imposed as to costs of hearing.

In April, 1966, following a car accident which the plaintiff claimed was the defendant's fault, the parties exchanged addresses, the defendant giving an address at Ilford where he lived. In May the defendant moved to Romford. He informed his insurance brokers with whom he had got in touch in connexion with the accident. Correspondence followed between the plaintiff's solicitors and the defendant's insurers, and in October the plaintiff's solicitors wrote that they had commenced proceedings on behalf of the plaintiff against the defendant in West London County Court and enclosed a copy of the particulars of claim. The proceedings had been begun by the solicitors filling in a praecipe for an ordinary summons against a defendant out of the district, and entering the Ilford address as that of the defendant. The summons was sent to the Ilford County Court to effect service and was there stamped with a rubber stamp dated Oct. 28, 1966, and signed by the Ilford bailiff with the words: "Unable to meet defendant. He resides at address given and would get summons by post". The summons was stamped by the Ilford registrar "send summons by post" and was posted by another official to the defendant at the Ilford address on Oct. 28, 1966. The summons was not received by the defendant but was returned to Ilford County Court late in June, 1967, and was sent to West London County Court. Meanwhile that court in the absence of the defendant and without his knowledge had heard the plaintiff's action against him, had found negligence on his part established and had given judgment against him for £134 damages and £86 costs. The defendant, having heard of the judgment by chance applied for it to be set aside, and the county court judge ordered it to be set aside and ordered a new trial but also that the costs of the original hearing should be costs in the cause (i.e., potentially payable by the defendant if costs were given against him at a new trial). On appeal by the defendant,

Held: there had been no service of the summons for the purposes of C.C.R. Ord. 8, r. 8, and s. 26* of the Interpretation Act, 1889, because the summons was posted to an address which at the relevant time was not the defendant's residence or place of business and did not reach him; the defect was so fundamental as to entitle him ex debito justitiae to have the judgment set aside without terms being imposed and accordingly the order that costs of the original hearing should be costs in the cause should be set aside (see p. 845, letter G, p. 846, letters A, C and F, p. 847, letter G, and p. 848, letter E, post).

Appeal allowed.

Appeal.

The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal against so much of an order of His Honour JUDGE BAXTER made in West London County Court on July 26, 1967, on the hearing of the defendant's application that the judgment in the action given on Nov. 25, 1966, be set aside, as ordered that the costs of that hearing be costs in the cause. He sought an order that there should be no order as to the costs of that hearing. The grounds of appeal were as follows: (i) that the judge was wrong in holding that the defendant had been served with the summons in the action at the time of the hearing, and that he was therefore wrong to make an order under which the defendant might be liable to pay costs in respect of proceedings to which he was not a party; and (ii) that, even if the judge were right in holding that the defendant had been served at the time of the trial, he was wrong to make an order under which the defendant might be liable to pay the costs of proceedings which took place in his absence and of which he had no notice and that through no default on his part.

Mar. 8. The following judgments were read.

RUSSELL, L.J.: On Apr. 23, 1966, the plaintiff and the defendant were involved in a car collision. The plaintiff says that it was the defendant's fault. The defendant denies this. They exchanged names and addresses. The defendant gave his address as 46, Northbrook Road, Ilford, Essex, where he then lived. The defendant filled in a claim form for his insurers, the National Motor & Accident Insurance Union, Ltd., via the broker, and the plaintiff got in touch with a Royal Automobile Club solicitor, Mr. Izod. Correspondence about liability followed, between the defendant's insurers and Mr. Izod; we have not seen it, but on one side liability of the defendant was asserted, and on the other denied. On Oct. 17, 1966, the plaintiff's present solicitors wrote to the insurers as follows:

H

"Dear Sirs, Your letter of June 22 addressed to Mr. J. B. Izod has now been passed to us for attention as we are instructed in place of Mr. Izod on behalf of [the plaintiff]. Our instructions are to commence proceedings, which we have accordingly done in the West London County Court, and as a matter of courtesy we enclose herewith a copy of the particulars of claim."

I

It seems from this that the matter had gone to sleep since June. This letter was not answered by the insurers, who took no action on it. In the meantime, in May, 1966, the defendant had changed his job and had moved his residence to Romford. He informed the insurance brokers of his new address in September, 1966. He was not in touch with the plaintiff or her solicitors.

The plaintiff's solicitors, as indicated in their letter, started proceedings in the West London County Court in the normal way by filling in a praecipe for an ordinary summons against a defendant out of the district, filling in as the defendant's address the Ilford address. The claim was for £200. The court prepared and issued the summons and sent it to the Ilford court for that court to effect service. Here mystery begins. The summons bears a rubber stamp dated Oct. 28, 1966, signed by the Ilford bailiff in these terms: "Unable to meet defendant. He resides at address given and would get summons by post". How this can have come about, I cannot imagine, since he had left six months before. Pursuant to C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 8 (3), the Ilford registrar put another rubber stamp on the summons, "Send summons by post", and another Ilford official posted it to the defendant at the Ilford address on Oct. 28, 1966, filling in a form on the summons to that effect. From then on there is something of a mystery about what happened to the summons and two other letters sent to the defendant by the county court at the Ilford address. I have tried to reconstruct the course of events by a study of the various postmarks, rubber stamps and other notations on these envelopes, but have arrived at no sure conclusion. Fortunately this does not matter. What does matter is that the summons (and the other two communications) never reached the defendant, came back to the Ilford County Court some time late in June, 1967, and found their way into the West London County Court file of the case. In the meantime the case was heard at West London County Court on Nov. 25, 1966, and the judge, being satisfied that negligence was established, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £134 damages and costs on scale 4, which ultimately were taxed at £86. Of all this the defendant knew nothing.

Ultimately the defendant got wind of this by meeting the plaintiff at a magistrates' court where he was charged with some offence connected with the incident. The defendant on June 16, 1967, applied to the county court for the judgment to be set aside under C.C.R. Ord. 37, r. 2 (1) on the ground that he had not been served. It would appear that he failed to persuade the judge of his ignorance of the proceedings, and his application was dismissed with costs. Armed with better evidence, the defendant applied again on July 18, 1967, to set aside the November, 1966, judgment. There was a difficulty in renewing an application under the same rule which had already been refused. This time no reference was made to any rule, and the application was to set aside the November judgment on the ground that the summons was sent by post to an address that the defendant had long since vacated. According to the county court judge, this application was made under C.C.R. Ord. 37, r. 1. At this further hearing the county court judge believed the defendant's evidence, and this belief was fortified by the discovery by the judge in the court file of the envelopes already mentioned and the summons. He accordingly on July 26, 1967, ordered that the November order be set aside, and a new trial be had. He made no order as to costs of that application; but he did not merely set aside the November judgment; he ordered that the costs of the November hearing should be costs in the cause.

The question in this appeal is whether the county court judge was right according to established practice to put the defendant at risk of having to pay the plaintiff's costs of the November hearing, of which the defendant had in fact no notice. The defendant says that the county court judge should have done no more than set aside the November judgment in toto, leaving the plaintiff to bear her own costs of that hearing in any event. For the defendant it is said that there was never any service of the proceedings, and that he never heard of them, and that consequently it cannot possibly be right that in any circumstances he should pay any costs of the November hearing. Whether there was service involves consideration of the County Court Rules.

Service of a summons such as this is dealt with by C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 8, in cases in which the plaintiff does not want to take on himself the task of effecting personal service. If the plaintiff completes form (6) on the back of the praecipe requesting postal service (which was not done here) that course is taken unless the registrar otherwise directs; r. 8 (2). Form (6) reads as follows:

"I hereby request that the defendant (blank) be served with the summons in this action by post and I hereby certify that (a) I have reason to believe that the summons, if sent to the defendant at the address stated in the

A praeceipe, will come to his knowledge within seven days after the day on which the summons would be delivered in the ordinary course of post. (b) I understand that if judgment is obtained as a result of postal service and is afterwards set aside on the ground that the service did not give the said defendant adequate notice of the proceedings, I may be ordered to pay the costs of setting aside the judgment."

B Otherwise service is effected under r. 8 (1) which reads, so far as at present material:

C "Subject to the provisions of any Act and the following paragraphs of this rule . . . service of an ordinary summons shall be effected (a) by delivering the summons to the defendant personally; or (b) by a bailiff of the court delivering the summons . . . at the residence of the defendant or, where the defendant is the proprietor of a business, at his place of business."

Such service was not effected here, and r. 8 (3) was operated. That reads:

D "Where the certificate is not given but the registrar for the district in which the summons is to be served is satisfied by a report of the bailiff or otherwise that there is a reasonable probability that the summons, if sent to the defendant by ordinary post, will come to his knowledge in sufficient time for him to appear at the hearing, the said registrar may cause the summons to be served by an officer of the court sending it to the defendant by ordinary post."

E It was submitted that on its true construction, sub-r. (3), together with s. 26 of the Interpretation Act, 1889 (incorporated by C.C.R., Ord. 49, r. 1) showed that service was effected by the posting of the summons on Oct. 28 and effective on Oct. 29. That section reads as follows:

F "Where an Act passed after the commencement of this Act authorises or requires any document to be served by post, whether the expression 'serve', or the expression 'give' or 'send', or any other expression is used, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the service shall be deemed to be effected by properly addressing, prepaying, and posting a letter containing the document, and unless the contrary is proved to have been effected at the time at which the letter would be delivered in the ordinary course of post."

G A summons addressed to an address with which the defendant has had no connexion for five months or more, however, cannot be said to be properly addressed. Rule 8 (3) does not refer to any particular address.

H I observe further that if "delivered" in s. 26 means delivered to the person, it never was at any time. If it means only delivered by the Post Office to the address, it was in fact returned through the dead letter office, and may have been rejected at the address; the various markings on this and other envelopes in the case make their history most obscure; but in any event it was the wrong address.

I The function of service is primarily to bring to the attention of the person to be served the fact that he is being sued, and particular language is in my judgment required if something short of that is to constitute service. C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 6, is an example of the selection of language to achieve in law service, though notice may not in fact reach the defendant. It provides inter alia for an order for substituted service by sending by post to the last known residence of the defendant, and by sub-r. (2) provides that:

"Where any such order has been carried out, the steps taken may be called substituted service, and such service shall have the same effect as service of the document in the manner prescribed otherwise than by this rule."

Moreover, under C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 28 (2), in cases where a summons which has been sent by post under r. 8 (3) is returned to the court office undelivered, the notice to be sent to the plaintiff is stated in terms to be a notice of "non-service".

Nor is C.C.R., Ord. 37, r. 6, without any significance in this connexion. In my judgment, therefore, there was, contrary to the view of the county court judge, no service of the summons in this case. I would refer by way of analogy to R. v. Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, Ex p. Rossi (1), not cited to the county court judge. A

There has in the past been much discussion whether a judgment is a nullity or a mere irregularity, and for the cases on the subject I may perhaps refer to Re Pritchard (decd.) (2) where they were discussed. UPJOHN, L.J., in that case expressly stated (3) to be a nullity proceedings which ought to have been served, but have never come to the notice of the defendant at all, excluding, of course, cases of substituted service, service by filing in default, or cases where service has properly been dispensed with. DANCKWERTS, L.J., adopted that judgment. I do not myself attach importance to the question whether it is proper to label a judgment obtained in circumstances such as this as "irregular" or "a nullity". The defect is in my judgment so fundamental as to entitle the defendant as of right, ex debito justitiae, to have the judgment avoided and set aside. If as a technical matter it is a matter of discretion to set aside the judgment, B

"... in accordance with settled practice, the court can exercise its discretion in one way, namely, by granting the order sought," D to quote UPJOHN, L.J., in Re Pritchard (decd.) (4).

In cases where a defendant has applied to set aside a judgment and is entitled to such an order as of right, the court has exercised its discretion in respect of the defendant's costs of the application if the defendant declines to agree to terms suggested by the court, recognising that the court cannot impose terms on a defendant who does not agree. But here the court, by making an order that the plaintiff's costs of the November, 1966, hearing should be costs in the cause, has in effect imposed a term on the defendant, and has qualified or subtracted from his absolute right to have the judgment set aside. In my view the county court judge misdirected himself in considering that he had any power to visit, even contingently, on the defendant the plaintiff's costs of a hearing that, as against this defendant, should never have taken place at all, and to which he was a stranger. E

Accordingly, in my judgment, that part of the order below that ordered the costs of the November, 1966, hearing be costs in the cause should be set aside. F

SACHS, L.J.: Before turning to the issues raised in the course of this highly technical but by no means uninteresting appeal, it is as well first to remind oneself of the fundamental objective of rules relating to service of process as emphasised by each member of this court in R. v. Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, Ex p. Rossi (1), an authority to which the attention of the learned county court judge was not drawn. DENNING, L.J., stated in relation to s. 3 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933, and the notices which it requires to be given of the hearing of an appeal (5): G

"When construing this section, it is to be remembered that it is a fundamental principle of our law that no one is to be found guilty or made liable by an order of any tribunal unless he has been given fair notice of the proceedings so as to enable him to appear and defend them. The common law has always been very careful to see that the defendant is fully apprised of the proceedings before it makes any order against him." H

MORRIS, L.J., in his judgment first said (6) "It is fundamental in our system of administration of justice that a party should have the right and opportunity to I

A be heard . . . and then cited a well-known passage in BROOM'S LEGAL MAXIMS (10th Edn.), p. 65, on this point, whilst PARKER, L.J., referred (7) to the above principle in precisely the same words as MORRIS, L.J., and then refused to construe the particular section under consideration in a narrow sense. Those passages reflect a number of earlier statements in well-known authorities, including that of LORD GREENE, M.R., who in Craig v. Kanseen (8) said:

B "In my opinion, it is beyond question that the failure to serve process where service of process is required is a failure which goes to the root of our conceptions of the proper procedure in litigation."

It follows that only an explicit and clear provision in a statute, or in rules having statutory force, can operate to deprive a citizen of his right to receive notice of the commencement of the process against him; and to permit service other than personal at an address which is not in fact his abode (to use the word employed, for instance, in r. 19 (b) of the Magistrates Courts Rules, 1952 (9)) nor his residence, nor his business address, would be a provision clearly calculated to deprive him of that right. If ever it was intended to deprive a defendant of that right, this could, of course, be done by using language such as was used when, in consequence of Rossi's case (10) (see Burt v. Kirkcaldy (11)) an amendment was made in the Road Traffic Act, 1962, s. 51 (1) to s. 241 (2) (c) of the Road Traffic Act, 1960, which deals not with service of any process, but only with notice of an intended prosecution. That amendment provided that:

E "... the notice shall be deemed . . . to have been served on any person if it was sent by registered post or recorded delivery addressed to him at his last known address, notwithstanding that the notice was returned as undelivered or was for any other reason not received by him."

The County Court Rules as to service have not been amended since the judgment of this court in Rossi's case (10), nor am I aware of any rules of any court relating to ordinary service on a defendant of a summons or other process that initiates proceedings which have any provision parallel to that in the amendment to s. 241 (2) (c) of the Act of 1960. Indeed, any such amendment would run counter to the principles of natural justice in relation to such service in cases in which there is no reason for the application of rules necessary to meet special circumstances, for example, rules for substituted service.

Turning now to the first issue in the appeal, I have no hesitation, having regard to the above cited principles, in rejecting the strenuously pressed submission that there had in fact been good service of the proceedings in the present case. I can find no warrant in any of the County Court Rules or in s. 26 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, for holding that service in purported pursuance of C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 3, at an address which at the relevant time was not the abode, residence, or place of business of a defendant, is good service should the relevant document not in fact reach him. It would indeed to my mind be contrary to natural justice so to construe r. 8 that such a service at a wrong address, which might even be in a totally different town from that in which the defendant lived or worked, could be good service; and it is not in point whether the use of a wrong address is due to the court proceeding under C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 8 (2) on information inserted in error in the praecipe by a solicitor, who also (as may well happen in some other case) signs a form (6) request for postal service with its acknowledgment as to the potential effect of the defendant not being in fact given adequate notice of the proceedings, or to the court acting (as happened in the present case) under C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 8 (3), on an erroneous rubber stamped report of its bailiff. I would incidentally reject the suggestion that it has become any part of the law that, once a man is told that a claim may be at some future date made against him in one of the courts of this country, he thereupon becomes under an obligation for the indefinite future to notify the potential claimant of each change in his address, either temporary or permanent. A

My above broad view of the County Court Rules could also be supported on a narrower basis by citing in detail the provisions of rules such as C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 28, which relates to "non-service", and by examining the wording of form (36) ("Notice of non-service (general)") which refers specifically to cases where "the summons has been returned to the registrar of the home court"; but I am content to rest my opinion that there has here been no good service on the broader grounds. It is perhaps as well to add that the position where, despite a wholly wrong address having been used, a document sent by ordinary post in purported pursuance of C.C.R., Ord. 8, r. 8 (3), is shown to have reached the defendant fourteen clear days before the return day, is not under consideration in the present case, and could present difficulties (see cases cited (12) in notes to R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 1). B C

Once the county court judge had disabused himself of his suspicions, and had come to the conclusion (which seems to have surprised him) that the summons had been sent by post to the wrong address and had not been received by the defendant, it followed that he was dealing with a case in which the plaintiff had obtained judgment despite the fact that there had been no service of process on the defendant. I agree, for the reasons given by my lord, that the latter was then quite plainly entitled to have the judgment set aside ex debito justitiae; and to my mind also it is in the present case (where no execution was levied) academic to discuss whether technically it is set aside as being a nullity, or on account of irregularity. Once the right to set aside is found to be ex debito justitiae, the reasoning behind the judgments in Anlaby v. Praetorius (13) remains good, and should have been applied in the way that RUSSELL, L.J., has stated. D E

Although in this particular case the distinction between a nullity and an irregularity can have no practical consequences, I should perhaps add that to my mind cases may well arise where that difference could be of importance, and the point may have to be considered when execution has been levied, or bankruptcy proceedings initiated against a defendant who, through no fault of his own, knows nothing of the proceedings owing, for instance, to being for a period overseas. I agree with the order proposed by RUSSELL, L.J. F

Since June, 1959, the taxpayer company had carried on, as agent for a paint company, the marketing of products of a German company, which the paint company had handled since 1956. On or about Apr. 1, 1960, the paint company accepted for itself an offer for the purchase of all the shares of its subsidiary, the taxpayer company. The paint company owned more than three-quarters of the shares of the taxpayer company. The offer required that the taxpayer company should carry on business as theretofore and was subject to conditions, one of which (here referred to as "condition 2") was that within one month of the acceptance of the offer a letter should be produced from the German company that the German company would not consider the purchase of the shares in the subsidiary company as an "important reason" that would entitle it under the terms of its agreement to terminate the taxpayer company's United Kingdom distributing agency. On May 9, 1960, the paint company assigned to the taxpayer company the "right title and benefit . . . in the good will of the business and the beneficial interest in the trade" of marketing the German company's products, so that the taxpayer company should market them in future in its own right, no longer as agent for the paint company. On May 18, 1960, condition 2 was waived by the purchaser. The taxpayer company claimed that there should be deducted from or set-off against its profits or gains as successor to the trade or business of marketing the German company's products certain losses, by virtue of s. 342 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, and s. 17 of the Finance Act, 1954. These losses were those sustained by the paint company in that trade up to May 9, 1960, relief not having been then obtained under those enactments. A basis of the claim was that the paint company remained the beneficial owner of more than three-quarters of the taxpayer company's share capital until May 9, 1960, and indeed up to the time of waiver of condition 2 on May 18, 1960.

Held: on the true construction of the letters embodying the contract the obligation to buy and to sell the paint company's shares in the taxpayer company, though not that contract as a whole, was conditional on the fulfilment of condition 2, which was a condition precedent; and, although according to general principle the beneficial interest in those shares would not have passed to the purchaser until the condition was fulfilled or waived, viz., until May 18, 1960, yet, as the condition was solely for the benefit of the purchaser, who accordingly could waive it at any time, the purchaser would have been entitled to obtain specific performance of the contract for the sale of the shares at any time, and thus the beneficial interest in the shares had passed to the purchaser before May 9, 1960, with the consequence that the claim to set off losses could not be maintained (see p. 858, letter I, to p. 859, letter C, post).

Case Stated.

The taxpayer company, Wood Preservation, Ltd., appealed to the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts against the following assessments to income tax made on them: 1960-61, paint dealers £3,806 less £20 capital allowances; 1961-62, paint manufacturers £4,000 less £1,500 capital allowances; 1962-63, paint manufacturers £4,509 less £1,162 capital allowances; 1963-64, paint manufacturers £2,798 less £1,303 capital allowances; 1963-64, balancing charge £933. The grounds of appeal were that under s. 342 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, and s. 17 of the Finance Act, 1954, certain losses sustained by Silixine Paints, Ltd., a company which at relevant times owned not less than three-quarters of the taxpayer company's share capital, fell to be deducted from or set off against the amount of the profits or gains assessed. The relevant passages from the Case Stated summarising the facts are set out in the judgment.

The taxpayer company contended before the commissioners as follows: (i) that an offer made by The British Ratin Co., Ltd. ("Ratin") to purchase the shares of the taxpayer company, including those beneficially owned by Silixine Paints, Ltd. ("Silixine") which offer was contained in a letter of Mar. 25, 1960, was a conditional offer subject to the express conditions stated in

- A it, and in particular to a condition ("condition 2") and that such offer did not become unconditional until the withdrawal of condition 2 by Ratin, on May 18, 1960; (ii) that at the date of the assignment, May 9, 1960, not less than three-quarters of the taxpayer company's shares remained in the beneficial ownership of Silexine; (iii) that losses incurred by Silexine before the date of the assignment fell to be deducted from or set off against the profits or gains of the taxpayer company as successors to the trade or business formerly carried on by the Silexine, under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 342, and the Finance Act, 1954, s. 17; and (iv) that the appeal should therefore be allowed and the assessments adjusted accordingly. The Crown contended before the commissioners as follows: (i) that on or about Apr. 1, 1960, Silexine, entered into a binding contract to sell to Ratin, the taxpayer company's shares which it beneficially owned; (ii) that at the date of the assignment none of the taxpayer company's shares remained in the beneficial ownership of Silexine; (iii) that losses incurred by Silexine, before the assignment of its trade or business, did not fall to be deducted from or set-off against the profits or gains of the taxpayer company under the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 342, and the Finance Act, 1954, s. 17; and (iv) that the appeal should be dismissed. The commissioners held that a binding contract between Silexine and Ratin was entered into on or about Apr. 1, 1960, whereby the whole of the interest of Silexine in the taxpayer company was transferred to Ratin. Their decision, as set out in the Case Stated, is at p. 854, letters G to I, post. They, therefore, decided that the appeal failed.

E The commissioners determined the appeal as follows: 1960-61, assessment increased to £3,869 (agreed capital allowances £1,999); 1961-62, assessment increased to £4,081 (agreed capital allowances £829); 1962-63, assessment reduced to £2,469 (agreed capital allowances £2,023); 1963-64, assessment confirmed in £2,798 (agreed capital allowances £471); 1963-64, balancing charge discharged. The taxpayer company appealed by way of Case Stated to the High Court.

- F Hubert H. Monroe, Q.C., and E. M. Drake for the taxpayer company.
E. I. Goulding, Q.C., J. R. Phillips and J. P. Warner for the Crown.

G GOFF, J.: I now pass to the case of Wood Preservation, Ltd. v. Prior (Inspector of Taxes). This case also arises under s. 17 of the Finance Act, 1954, but here there is no dispute what the parties agreed, but only as to its effect in law. Silexine Paints, Ltd., were United Kingdom distributing agents of a German company called Desowag, who manufacture wood preservation products, and by an agreement dated July 1, 1959, their subsidiary, the taxpayer company, was substituted for them. By art. 6 (2) that agreement, which was to be governed by German law, was made terminable by Desowag without notice in certain events. That article reads as follows:

- H "The agreement may furthermore be dissolved by either contracting party for important reason without any preliminary notice (extraordinary termination). An important reason shall mean any circumstance which makes it unreasonable to expect a party to continue the agreement until it is terminated by notice in the ordinary way. Important reasons for extraordinary notice of termination of the agreement by Desowag shall be, for instance: (c) If the management of the contractual dealers is not or ceases to be conducted by persons ensuring the requirements for the distribution of the contract products."
- I

The Special Commissioners found that:

"At all material times up to and including Mar. 25, 1960, Silexine owned not less than three-quarters of the share capital of the [taxpayer company]," and that:

"In accounting periods up to and including May 9, 1960, Silexine incurred losses in carrying on its trade, in respect of which relief had not been obtained under the provisions of the Income Tax Act 1952, s. 342. On or about May 9, 1960, Silexine and the [taxpayer company] executed the assignment which provided, inter alia, as follows," and then, after setting out the recitals in the assignment the Case Stated sets out the operative part whereby the parent company, Silexine Paints, Ltd., assigned to the taxpayer company:

"(a) All that the right title and benefit of Silexine of and in the goodwill of the said business. (b) The beneficial interest in the said trade. To hold the same unto the [taxpayer company] absolutely."

The question is whether the taxpayer company is entitled to set off the losses incurred by Silexine Paints, Ltd., against future profits, and it arises because Silexine also parted with its shares in the following circumstances. The Case Stated continued:

"On Mar. 25, 1960, P. L. Burgin (hereinafter referred to as 'Mr. Burgin') the chairman of the British Ratin Co., Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as 'British Ratin') wrote to the directors of the [taxpayer company] in the following terms, inter alia: 'We hereby offer to purchase the whole of the issued share capital of Wood Preservation, Ltd. [the taxpayer company] consisting of 8,875 fully paid ordinary shares of £1 each for the sum of 27s. per share. This offer is made on the following terms and subject to the following conditions:—1. That satisfactory evidence is produced to us to show that prior to completion [the taxpayer company] is or has become the only person entitled to or interested in the rights granted by the German manufacturers of the wood preservative Xylamon for the sale of Xylamon in Great Britain and the Commonwealth.

"2. That within one month from the date of the acceptance of this offer a letter is produced to us signed on behalf of Desowag-Chemie GmbH. confirming that they would not consider the purchase of the whole of the issued share capital of [the taxpayer company] by the British Ratin Co., Ltd. as an 'important reason' entitling them to terminate the agreement made between themselves Silexine Paints, Ltd. and [the taxpayer company] and expressed to come into force as from July 1, 1959, pursuant to art. 6 (2) thereof'."

Paragraph 3 of the letter dealt with the usual type of warranty as to long term commitments and so forth, and provided further that:

"until completion [the taxpayer company] will carry on business in the same manner as heretofore and will not otherwise than in the ordinary course of business enter into any contract," and other matters.

Paragraph 4 of the letter dealt with the resignation of the directors on completion. Paragraph 5 of the letter stated:

"That completion shall take place within seven days from the production of the letter referred to in condition 2."

Paragraph 6 of the letter stated a further condition:

"That this offer is accepted within seven days of today's date by one hundred per cent. of the registered proprietors of the issued share capital of the company."

"We should be obliged if you would communicate the terms of this offer to all the shareholders who are, we believe, the following persons in respect of the number of shares set opposite their names:—T. E. L. Allbeury

A —1,876; Silixine Paints, Ltd.—6,998; Silixine Colours and Chemicals, Ltd.—1. For the sake of simplicity we enclose herewith three spare copies of this offer which can be accepted by completion of the certificate set out at the foot hereof.”

B By agreement between the parties the figure of 27s. per share was subsequently altered to 28s. and the area was confined to the United Kingdom, but nothing turns on that. At the foot of the letter which I have read, was the following statement:

C “We Silixine Paints, Ltd., hereby accept the above written offer dated Mar. 25, 1960, made by The British Ratin Co., Ltd., to purchase from us our fully paid ordinary shares of £1 each in [the taxpayer company] on the terms and subject to the conditions therein set out.”

The Special Commissioners made a finding that:

“This statement was signed over a sixpenny stamp by Mr. Allbeury, a director, for and on behalf of Silixine.

D “Similar letters were extant in respect of the shares owned by Mr. Allbeury and Silixine Colours and Chemicals, Ltd., bearing acceptances signed by or on their behalf respectively.”

The Case Stated continues:

E “On Mar. 31, 1960, S. P. Pyke (hereinafter referred to as ‘Mr. Pyke’) one of the partners of Staddon, Pyke and Barnes of 58, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.2, the solicitors acting for Silixine, wrote to Mr. Burgin in the following terms, inter alia:

“As arranged on the telephone yesterday I enclose herewith qualified acceptances of British Ratin’s offer, signed by the three shareholders of [the taxpayer company].”

They were qualified only in respect of the area and that qualification was accepted by British Ratin Co., Ltd., and is irrelevant for present purposes.

F Subsequently the Case Stated continues:

“On Apr. 27, 1960, Mr. Burgin wrote to W. H. Westphal of British Ratin in the following terms, inter alia: ‘I had a long talk with Pyke again today. He is seeing [the taxpayer company’s] accountants on Friday and will at that time discuss the question of the formal assignment of the Xylamon business from Silixine Paints to [the taxpayer company].’”

G That, of course, is an internal memorandum, but it does refer to talks with Mr. Pyke. The significance of it is that it is within the month allowed for obtaining the letter from Desowag and shows that the parties still contemplated proceeding with their contract. The second paragraph of that letter states:

H “As I told you over the telephone the other day, it is quite vital to the case for taking advantage of the tax losses that that assignment is made before the letter from Desowag for which I have asked is produced.”

On May 10, 1960, Mr. Pyke wrote to Mr. Burgin telling him that Silixine Paints, Ltd., had executed the assignment to the taxpayer company and said:

I “I understand from Mr. Allbeury that he is experiencing a certain amount of difficulty inducing Messrs. Desowag to give the letter, which Silixine Paints will require to obtain under the terms of the agreement for the sale of the shares, and which is a condition precedent to such contract becoming binding. However, I will communicate with you further about this matter in the course of a few days.”

In fact no such letter was forthcoming and on May 18, 1960, Mr. Burgin wrote to Mr. Pyke in the following terms, inter alia:

“I now learn that it will be possible for British Ratin to make satisfactory arrangements direct with Messrs. Desowag. I am, therefore, instructed by British Ratin that they can now withdraw condition 2 set out in their letter of offer of Mar. 25. In these circumstances the contract between the two companies has now become unconditional. No doubt you will let me know on what date it would be convenient for you for completion to take place."

It will be seen that the offer to purchase was accepted on Mar. 31, or possibly Apr. 1, when Mr. Burgin accepted the qualifications, but it was conditional in some sense under para. 2 of the terms and conditions. The "month" described in that paragraph expired before the transfer of the business and Mr. Burgin's letter waiving, or purporting to waive, the condition was after the transfer of the business, as, indeed, was the actual transfer of the shares. It has been suggested that, whatever view one takes of the position during the month, as the letter was not obtained within the specified period, nor was the requirement waived in that time, the whole agreement came to an end at the expiration of a month, in which case clearly at the date of the transfer on May 9, the beneficial ownership of the shares could not have passed from the taxpayer company to the purchasers, or if it had, it would have been revested in it.

There is some authority for that view, in Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co., Field v. The Co. (1) and also Aberfoyle Plantations, Ltd. v. Cheng (2), though the actual point there was not precisely whether the contract automatically came to an end, but whether the condition not having been fulfilled in due time the vendors could enforce the contract against a purchaser who had refuted it. I do not think, however, it is necessary for me to resolve that point, because I am satisfied that the proper inference from Mr. Burgin's letter to Mr. Westphal and the subsequent conduct of the parties was that they agreed during the month to extend the time or that they made a new agreement to continue the conditional arrangements between them, and even if that be the true view that they made such new agreement before May 9, so that the conditional arrangements were subsisting at the material time. It is necessary to consider, however, whether those conditional arrangements were such as to cause Silexine Paints, Ltd., forthwith to cease to be the beneficial owner of the shares in the taxpayer company, or whether they continued as the owners down to and after the transfer of the business, and that depends on the true construction and legal effect of the offer and acceptance.

The commissioners gave their decision in principle in the following terms:

"... 3. The second question which arises is whether or not Silexine retained its interest amounting to not less than three-quarters of the equity of the [taxpayer company] until May 9, 1960, or whether the beneficial interest had passed to the British Ratin Co., Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as 'British Ratin') by virtue of a contract made on or about Apr. 1, 1960, for the sale by Silexine to British Ratin of the whole of its interest. The said contract is said to be contained in letters dated Mar. 25, 1960, Mar. 31, 1960, and Apr. 1, 1960, which passed between Silexine and British Ratin and the question is whether there was a binding contract under which the shares owned by Silexine were transferred to British Ratin or whether the letters merely set out certain proposals which remained executory until at any rate May 9, 1960. In our opinion upon consideration of the evidence adduced and the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the parties and the cases cited [and they then set out the cases] there was a binding contract between Silexine and British Ratin entered into on or about Apr. 1, 1960, whereby the whole of the interest of Silexine in the [taxpayer company] was transferred to British Ratin. The appeal therefore fails."

The taxpayer company now appeal against that decision and counsel on their

A behalf says that the sale under the agreement was subject to a condition precedent and that, therefore, the beneficial ownership did not pass out of the taxpayer company's hand until the condition was waived. He has classified the possible situations under four heads. The first is where the arrangement between the parties, which would otherwise be a contract, is subject to a condition precedent to the making of any agreement at all. I do not think that he suggests that

B the present case falls within that category, but in any case, in my judgment, it clearly could not be so construed, as the terms of the offer imposed obligations on the taxpayer company which would be operative as from the making of the conditional agreement and not merely from the performance of the condition. I refer to the express contract in cl. 3 that they will carry on business in the same manner as heretofore and not enter into particular contracts and so forth, and

C also what I think is necessarily implied in this contract, an obligation on their part to use their best endeavours to obtain the desired letter from Desowag.

The second class of case is where there is a contract under which one party assumes a unilateral obligation to purchase from another in a certain event and there is no obligation on the other to bring that event about. In that class of case there is a contract from the start imposing a unilateral obligation, but no

D bilateral obligation arises and no contract of sale until the condition has been discharged. That type of case covers options and analogous agreements.

His third class is where there is a bilateral contract of sale subject to a condition precedent with an immediate obligation on one of the parties to perform the condition or to use his best endeavours to perform it. There he says there is an immediate obligation, but the bilateral obligations of the contract of sale are

E nonetheless subject to a condition precedent, and there is no sale until the condition is performed.

His fourth class is where there is an immediate contract of sale but on the basis or term that one of the parties, say the vendor, will obtain some particular information or assurance or something of that sort. In such a case the contract of sale is immediate—it is not subject to a condition precedent—but if the

F vendor fails to discharge his obligation he will be liable in damages for the breach, and if the breach goes to the root of the contract then the purchaser may be discharged from further performance, but the contract of sale is nonetheless immediate and not subject to any condition precedent.

I think that that classification is justified by the most careful and detailed analysis which was undertaken by DIPLOCK, L.J., in United Dominions Trust

G (Commercial), Ltd. v. Eagle Aircraft Services, Ltd. (3). Counsel for the taxpayer company concedes that if the case falls within his fourth class then the decision of the Special Commissioners was right. He submits, however, that the present case falls within the second class, and, even if it be in the third class, the sale was conditional, and that, therefore, the property could not pass at the earliest until Mr. Burgin, on behalf of British Ratin Co., Ltd., waived the condition on

H May 18, 1960.

Counsel for the Crown, I think, really denied the existence of any distinction between the third and fourth classes which, in my judgment, I cannot accept as I think there is; but he submitted that the true test was—has the vendor been deprived of the right to dispose of his shares for his own benefit and has that right passed to the purchaser? He says that in the present case the answer to

I both questions is in the affirmative. I am satisfied that this is not a mere option case, but I do not think that that test is the right one, because in the case of an option or a right of pre-emption, the vendor does deprive himself of the right to deal with the property for his own benefit. It is true that he can assign the property subject to the option or right of preemption, but he cannot ignore it and take a better offer. Alternatively, counsel for the Crown says that the answer to the question whether the vendor has ceased to be the beneficial owner depends on the right of the purchaser to specific performance. He says that in this case the purchaser could claim specific performance notwithstanding the condition. He relies in support of that argument on Long v. Bowring (4), where there was an agreement to grant an underlease subject to the lessor's consent, with the provision that, if the landlord should refuse to grant a licence, or in case a licence should not be obtained on or before a certain date, then the grantor would pay to the grantee the sum of £1,000, a sum which was thereby mutually agreed should be the damages assigned and fixed by them for not obtaining such licence. The grantor tried to avail himself of that clause to get out of the contract and he refused to seek the consent of the landlord. Thereupon the grantee brought an action for specific performance and succeeded. It may be that in such a case, i.e., a contract for sale of a leasehold property, or the granting of a lease, subject to the landlord's consent, the property does pass in equity immediately on the making of the contract. I am not satisfied, however, that that is so, and in the case of Long v. Bowring (4) the object of the order for specific performance was to compel the grantor to take the necessary steps to obtain the licence, and if he could do so then there would be an order directing a conveyance and that was, as I understand it, included in the order from the outset, but if he could not get it, then, of course, the order would have to be discharged or varied. The order could not give the plaintiff an unqualified right to a conveyance.

Counsel for the Crown also says that this was a condition exclusively for the benefit of the purchasers which they could waive. Counsel for the taxpayer company counters that by saying that Silexine might also want protection from it, because Desowag might say, "If you assign your shares you will be liable to us in damages", and it has to be remembered that the agreement was governed by German law. I think, however, that that answer is really a fanciful one, since it is quite clear that by the agreement of July 1, 1959, the taxpayer company were substituted for Silexine Paints, Ltd., who, apart from remaining liable for certain debts until they were paid off, fell out of the matter, and I cannot see how Silexine Paints, Ltd., could possibly be exposed to any liability in damages for assigning their shares. Desowag might quite possibly say that that was an important reason within art. 6 (2) of the agreement, and of course British Ratin Co., Ltd., wanted to be sure that they would not, but I cannot see that Silexine Paints, Ltd., would require any protection in the matter at all. I think, however, that that is closely bound up with the remedy of specific performance. The real test where the vendor has entered into a contract for the sale of his shares, which is not absolute and immediate, is whether the property in the shares has passed at any rate in equity to the purchaser.

In the present case, as I construe the agreement, although the whole contract was not subject to a condition precedent, the obligation to buy and sell the shares was. Therefore, as it seems to me, prima facie the property in the shares would not pass to the purchasers until the condition was performed. The two cases on the effect of non-performance of the condition to which I have already referred clearly emphasise the difference between an immediate agreement for sale and an agreement for sale subject to a condition precedent. Thus in Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co. (5) MAUGHAM, J., said:

"courts of equity, in dealing with actions for specific performance relating to land, have been accustomed to give effect to the real intention, rather than to the precise words, fixing the date for completion. The effect is that a clause fixing the date for completion is equivalent to a clause stating that completion shall be on that date or within a reasonable time thereafter. But there is no ground for a similar construction in the case of a condition upon which the validity of the contract as one of sale depends. The distinction is obvious."

(5) [1928] All E.R. Rep. at p. 653; [1929] 1 Ch. at p. 282.

A Again in the Aberfoyle Plantations case (6) LORD JENKINS said, after citing Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co. (7) and Smith v. Butler (8):

B “Before parting with these two authorities, their lordships would observe that the reason for taking the date fixed for completion by a conditional contract of sale as the date by which the condition is to be fulfilled appears to their lordships to be that, until the condition is fulfilled, there is no contract of sale to be completed, and accordingly, that, by fixing a date for completion, the parties must by implication be regarded as having agreed that the contract must have become absolute through performance of the condition by that date at latest.”

C I think that assistance is also derived from Curtis and William (Africa), Ltd. v. E. G. Maas (9), which is a case of a series of purchasers, one of whom required satisfactory evidence of the existence of the steel, not only to satisfy himself but also to satisfy the buyers from him, and the proviso was, provided you give us proof of existence which is satisfactory to our buyers. PEARSON, J., said (10):

D “I think the effect of those words is this, that if there had been an immediate unqualified acceptance on the other side, those words would have formed a condition precedent to the other obligations under the contract. I think the effect of those words would have been, taking it in order, first that there would be an obligation on the plaintiff company to provide proof of existence, and then there would be an implied obligation on the defendant to take the steps for submitting it to his buyers and obtaining their expression of satisfaction. But, unless and until the expression of satisfaction was obtained from the defendant's buyers, then the rest of the contract would not have to be carried out. It would be a condition precedent to the need for fulfilling the rest of the contract.”

F I would refer finally to Parway Estates, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (11). That was a class (4) case because, though the vendor was subject to certain obligations, there was no condition affecting the sale. JENKINS, L.J., giving the decision of the Court of Appeal, alluded clearly to the distinction where he said (12):

G “But, says counsel, this is not an unconditional contract for sale: before the obligations of the parties, on the one hand to sell and on the other hand to buy, become effective, there are in the provisions of this agreement certain obligations imposed on the vendors which they must first perform; and it is said that those obligations are imposed by paras. 4 and 5. Counsel for the taxpayer put these obligations as conditions which have to be fulfilled before there is a contract for sale and purchase which can have the effect of transferring the beneficial interest. I must refer again to those two paragraphs. The first of them reads:

H “‘4. The vendors will on or before the date hereinbefore fixed for completion procure the purchase from the company at the vendors expense of all the assets of the company as detailed in the schedule hereto at a price to be calculated in accordance with the principle as to calculation set out in the said schedule and to be paid by means of an equivalent reduction in the amount of the indebtedness shown to be due from the company to the vendor.’ The other reads:

I “‘5. The vendors will on or before the date hereinbefore fixed for completion procure the discharge by the company of all liabilities due by the company whatsoever.’” —and that is developed in detail by referring to mortgages, debentures and so forth. Counsel says that these are in the nature of conditions with the result I have mentioned. Of course I think it is really reasonably plain that, if one has a contract of sale and purchase which is expressed to be conditional on the happening of some event, the procuring of some consent or something of that sort, the contract for sale and purchase is in abeyance until such time as the condition is fulfilled, though it may well be that there might be a repudiation even before the condition was fulfilled if one of the parties announced they were never going to perform the contract whether the condition was fulfilled or not. But that is not, as I understand it, this case. I cannot see that either of these paragraphs are conditions precedent.

“Counsel referred us to a passage cited in the judgment of the learned judge from the speech of LORD ATKINSON in De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd. v. British South Africa Co. (13) ‘Much reliance was placed by counsel for the company in the argument on the application to the agreement of Dec. 7, 1892, and especially to its first paragraph, of the well-known doctrine of courts of equity, that in equity everything should be taken to be done which ought to be done. That doctrine cannot, in its application to contracts, however, be permitted to turn the conditional into the absolute, the optional into the obligatory, or to make for the parties contracts different from those they have made for themselves. What a party to a contract ought to do, within the true meaning of this doctrine, is what he has contracted to do, and nothing more and nothing less is to be taken, in equity, to be done.’

“Counsel says that there is no room here for the application of the doctrine of conversion or, in other words, the maxim that equity looks on that as done which ought to be done so long as the vendors’ obligations set out in paras. 4 and 5 of the agreement remained unperformed. As I understood it, he admitted that the purchaser might, if so minded, enforce the contract while the vendors were still in default under paras. 4 and 5, but said that the vendors on their side could not enforce it until they performed their part of the bargain, and adduced from the vendors’ inability to enforce it until then that the doctrine of conversion could not apply. I do not altogether follow that argument. It appears to me that for the present purpose the material matter is the position of the purchaser. If the purchaser has a contract for the purchase by himself of shares which he can enforce against the legal owner of those shares I should have thought one is coming near to saying that the vendors have become trustees of the shares for the purchaser on the strength of the purchaser’s right to call for specific performance.”

Later at the conclusion of his judgment JENKINS, L.J., said (14):

“For my part, I prefer to found myself on the ground that there is nothing in this agreement to take the case out of the general rule under which there is no doubt that the equitable interest in the shares became vested in the purchaser when the agreement of Jan. 12, 1956, was signed.”

It appears to me to follow quite clearly from that authority that ordinarily, where the mutual obligation of sale and purchase is subject to a condition precedent, the property does not pass so long as the condition remains unperformed, but in the present case I have to consider whether it makes any difference that this was a condition, as I find, solely for the benefit of the purchaser and which he could therefore waive. In a sense therefore he had a contract of which he could obtain specific performance by, at any time, waiving the condition, but on the other hand he had expressly provided that he would buy the

A shares subject to the condition of the letter which he needed being produced to him. Counsel for the taxpayer company says, "Well, he could have waived, and if he did waive it the property would then pass to him", but unless and until he waived it, it would not. That, I think, is not an entirely easy matter to decide, but on the whole I have come to the conclusion that, as the matter of waiving the condition rested entirely with the purchaser, he could at any time

B require specific performance of the contract, and therefore to use the words of JENKINS, L.J. (15):

"... one is coming near to saying that the vendors have become trustees of the shares for the purchaser on the strength of the purchaser's right to call for specific performance."

C On the whole therefore I have come to the conclusion that under this contract the beneficial interest had sufficiently passed to the purchaser and that the conclusion of the Special Commissioners was right.

RICHARDS v. PHILLIPS.

E [COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Harman, Russell and Widgery, L.JJ.), April 26, 1968.]

Auction—Bid—Dispute—When auctioneer may properly act on the footing that there is a "dispute respecting a bid"—What constitutes a bid—Necessity for bid to be communicated to auctioneer—National Conditions of Sale (17th Edn.), condition 2 (3).

F The owners of the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, put the property up for sale by auction by the defendant firm of auctioneers. The special conditions of sale incorporated the National Conditions of Sale (17th Edn.), by condition 2 (3) of which "if any dispute arises respecting a bid" the property

G might at the vendor's option either be put up again at the last undisputed bid or be withdrawn. By condition 2 (4) the highest bidder was to be the purchaser. The reserve price was £25,800. The bidding opened at £10,000. The plaintiff bid £15,000 orally and the auctioneer bid £20,000 on behalf of the vendors. At about the same time as the auctioneer's bid of £20,000, another bidder, D., made a motion to bid £20,000. The plaintiff and the

H auctioneer, on behalf of the vendors, made alternate bids culminating in a bid of £26,000 by the plaintiff. D. also signalled a bid of £26,000 at about the same time, but the auctioneer did not see this. D. heard none of the plaintiff's bids, but the auctioneer heard all the plaintiff's bids and was throughout unaware of D.'s bids. When D. realised that the accepted bid was not his, he protested. The auctioneer's clerk corroborated D.'s bid. Acting under

I condition 2 (3) the auctioneer put up the property again for sale. The plaintiff and D. bid one another up to £37,500 at which figure the property was again knocked down to the plaintiff. The auctioneer signed the memorandum of contract at that figure. The plaintiff issued a writ claiming damages of £11,500, against the auctioneers, this amount being the difference between £37,500 and £26,000.

Held: on the facts there was a "dispute respecting the bid" within the meaning of condition 2 (3); and the auctioneer had acted properly within condition 2 (3) by putting the property up for sale again (see p. 862, letters F, H and I, post).

Decision of PENNYCUICK, J. ([1967] 3 All E.R. 876) affirmed.

[As to an auctioneer's liabilities in relation to the purchaser, see 2 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 87, paras. 178, 180; and for cases on the subject, see 3 DIGEST (Repl.) 45-46, 315-327.]

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Raymond Keith Richards, against the judgment of PENNYCUICK, J., given on Oct. 19, 1967, and reported [1967] 3 All E.R. 876 dismissing his action, which had been begun by writ issued on May 25, 1965, against three defendants, viz., the two defendant vendors, Acton Francis Phillips and Wilfred Oakley, and the defendant auctioneers, Chesterton & Sons. The plaintiff claimed against the defendant vendors specific performance of an agreement to sell to the plaintiff the property known as the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, London, for the sum of £26,000 and further or in the alternative damages. These claims were not pursued to decision at the trial. The plaintiff claimed alternatively against the defendant auctioneers damages for failure to sign a sufficient memorandum of a sale to the plaintiff by the defendant vendors of the Lyric Theatre at £26,000 pursuant to an auction of the property on Apr. 28, 1965, conducted by a representative of the defendant firm. This latter claim was tried by PENNYCUICK, J., who dismissed it. By notice dated Jan. 23, 1968, the plaintiff gave notice of appeal from the order of Oct. 19, 1967, seeking that it be set aside and claiming, apart from relief by specific performance, the sum of £11,500 against the defendant auctioneers. The grounds of the appeal were that the trial judge misdirected himself in holding that condition 2 (3) of the National Conditions of Sale (17th Edn.) was applicable and that the defendants were entitled to put up the property again for auction; and that if condition 2 (3) did not apply, the plaintiff was the highest bidder for the property at £26,000, and by condition 2 (4) was the purchaser, and the defendant auctioneers were in breach of contract to the plaintiff in failing to ensure that he was able to enforce the contract for the purchase of the property at £26,000. By a respondent's notice dated Apr. 10, 1968, the defendant auctioneers gave notice that they would contend that the order of Oct. 19, 1967, should be affirmed on the ground that the judge had misdirected himself in holding that Mr. Drummy failed to make an effective bid of £26,000, but should have held that both Mr. Drummy and the plaintiff made effective bids of £26,000, and accordingly should have held that the plaintiff was not the highest bidder for the property under condition 2 (4). The facts are set out in the judgment of HARMAN, L.J.

H. E. Francis, Q.C., and G. T. Hesketh for the plaintiff.

Charles Sparrow, Q.C., and G. M. Godfrey for the defendant auctioneers.

HARMAN, L.J.: This dispute, serious enough, between the parties is a comedy of errors of a remarkable kind. The proprietors of the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, who were the first two defendants, and are respondents to this appeal, were in 1965 wishful of selling that desirable property and put it into the hands of well-known auctioneers and estate agents, Chesterton & Sons, to be offered for sale by auction. This was done in April, 1965. Before the sale the plaintiff communicated with the auctioneer, whose name was Bussey, that he intended to bid; but apparently the auctioneer had no other information of any prospective bidder.

The room at the London auction rooms where this was put up was a fairly large room with windows opening on to the street, where a certain amount of noise came in, and had, I gather, a fairly high rostrum for the auctioneer. There were chairs below him and to his left for his partner, who was acting as his clerk, and two junior employees in the firm the duty of one of whom was to get the memorandum signed when a bid was accepted; and in front of him there were two sets of chairs, with an aisle down the middle. Immediately in front of him

A on the left there were five representatives of the Hammersmith Borough Council, headed by a man named Drummy, who was apparently himself an auctioneer. Further back on the same side—that is to say to the auctioneer's left as he looked down the hall—was the plaintiff.

The property was put up. £10,000 was the opening bid. The plaintiff bid £15,000. The auctioneer, bidding for the reserve price, which was £25,800, bid B £20,000. Thereafter the bidding seems to have gone up by thousands until it got to £25,000. It appears that when £21,000 was bid Mr. Drummy roused himself from his lethargy sufficiently to make some kind of motion with his sales card. The auctioneer never saw it. People sitting immediately in front of Mr. Drummy on the floor did see it and they assumed that he had made a bid, because the auctioneer said "I am bid £21,000". The auctioneer had heard a C bid from the plaintiff and had not taken any notice of Mr. Drummy. Mr. Drummy, on the other hand, had heard nothing of what the plaintiff said, nor did the auctioneer's clerk or his two assistants. So here was a thorough comedy of errors going on all round.

Things went on like this, the bidding going up by thousands; Mr. Drummy sank into lethargy again and took no more part in it until £25,000 was reached, D whereupon the auctioneer went very near to his reserve by bidding £25,500. The plaintiff thereupon bid £26,000. At the same time Mr. Drummy raised his card. "£26,000 I am bid", says the auctioneer; and nobody moved a muscle; but the position in fact, as we now know, was that both Mr. Drummy and the plaintiff thought that it was his bid of £26,000 which had been accepted, so neither of them made any move. In fact the twitchings of Mr. Drummy fell E unnoticed by the auctioneer, although they were perceptible to the auctioneer's assistants sitting on the floor. The auctioneer thereupon said: "Going, going: gone—£26,000, to the gentleman at the back of the hall". This apparently did move Mr. Drummy a little bit. When the assistant went down with the sheet of particulars, Mr. Drummy got up and said "Oh, but I was the person who made the £26,000 bid, not the other man"; whereupon all was confusion.

F Then the auctioneer, in the exercise, as he thought, of his proper discretion, decided at once, in the ensuing uproar, to put the property up for sale again. Whereupon there was a ding-dong battle right up to £37,500 between the plaintiff and Mr. Drummy, and the plaintiff bought at the latter price. He refused to sign a memorandum, because it was under protest, he maintaining all the time that he had made a good bid and that the property had been knocked down to him at G £26,000 and he ought not to have to pay the extra £11,500. The upshot is that he sues the auctioneers for damages, being unable to have any enforceable contract against the vendors at £26,000 because there was no memorandum to substantiate the sale at that figure. He has agreed to buy at £37,500, and that is out of the case; but this appeal is about whether the plaintiff has a remedy against the auctioneers, Messrs. Chesterton & Sons (in which firm the auctioneer Mr. Bussey is a partner) H for the difference between the £26,000 and the £37,500.

The conduct of this auction does not throw any credit at all on either of the auctioneers involved in it. However that may be, one has to abide by the lamentable show that they made of themselves. The National Conditions of Sale (17th Edn.) governed this matter so far as relevant. Condition 2 of those conditions provides for sale by auction and, so far as is relevant, reads:

I " (1) . . . the sale of the property and of each lot is subject to a reserved price and to a right for the vendor or any one person on his behalf to bid up to that price."

The right to bid up to the reserve price was a duty assigned to the auctioneer; and that he did.

" (2) The vendor may divide the property into lots, re-arrange, consolidate and sub-divide lots and withdraw the property or any lot (not actually sold) without declaring the reserved price."

The vendor acts in all these matters through the auctioneer as his agent.

"(3) No person shall at any bid advance less than the amount fixed for that purpose by the auctioneer, no bid shall be retracted, but the auctioneer may refuse any bid; and, if any dispute arises respecting a bid, the auctioneer may determine the dispute, or the property may, at the vendor's option, either be put up again at the last undisputed bid or be withdrawn. (4) Subject [as aforesaid] the highest bidder shall be the purchaser . . ."

The case made for the auctioneers is that there was a "dispute" within the condition 2 (3)—a dispute "respecting a bid" which had arisen. They contend that there were two people, the plaintiff and Mr. Drummy, each of whom said that he had made a bid, and that, therefore, there was a dispute about a bid. Therefore (so the auctioneers contend) it was at the auctioneer's option either to determine that dispute, as he was entitled to do, or to take the alternative course, of putting up the property again at the price then reached, which is what he did. In either event, so it is contended, he acted within his powers and his conduct cannot be impeached.

The answer made is that there never was any bid in fact except the bid of the plaintiff: Mr. Drummy's motions, being unobserved by the auctioneer, were quite ineffective as bids. The trial judge found that Mr. Drummy's motions were properly unobserved. Therefore, so the plaintiff contends, there never was a bid by Mr. Drummy and the property was knocked down to him; the auctioneer was not entitled to take it back into the market, the matter was closed and he, the plaintiff, was entitled at £26,000. The auctioneer had only to ask the simplest question of Mr. Drummy to find that in fact Mr. Drummy never made an effective bid at all and there was not any genuine dispute.

I cannot take that view. It seems to me that there was a "dispute". Mr. Drummy, however lethargic and however mum, did think that he had made a bid; he did think that he had bid £26,000. He is corroborated in that by the auctioneer's clerk and his two assistants. He is also corroborated in his statement, incredible as that might otherwise sound, that he did not hear any of the plaintiff's calls. That being so, I consider the judge (1) was amply justified in coming to the conclusion which he reached, that this was a dispute concerning a bid within the meaning of the phrase and that the auctioneer rightly determined it by putting the property up for sale again.

I would dismiss the appeal.

RUSSELL, L.J.: I agree.

I am clearly of opinion that this was a case in which a "dispute" arose "respecting a bid" within the terms of condition 2 (3) of the National Conditions of Sale (17th Edn.) and that the auctioneer was well entitled to put the property up again. I think that the point was rightly decided by PENNYCUICK, J., (2) and for the right reasons. I say nothing on the other points, which we have not had debated before us.

This brevity will not, I hope, be considered disrespectful to the arguments of both counsel for the plaintiff, particularly at this hour on this day.

WIDGERY, L.J.: I, with equal brevity, content myself with saying that I agree with each of the judgments which have been delivered, and wish to add nothing.

R. v. CUMMERSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION (Widgery and Fenton Atkinson, L.J.J., and Roskill, J.), April 4, 5, 1968.]

Insurance—Motor insurance—Third party risks—Certificate of insurance—False statement for purpose of obtaining insurance certificate—Withholding material information for the like purpose—Whether guilty mind an element of the offence—Road Traffic Act, 1960 (8 & 9 Eliz. 2 c. 16), s. 235 (2).

B

The offence, enacted by s. 235 (2)* of the Road Traffic Act, 1960, of making a false statement for the purpose of obtaining the issue of a certificate of insurance is an absolute offence, which does not predicate consciousness of the falsity of the statement on the part of its maker (see p. 866, letter E, and p. 867, letter C, post); but the offence, also enacted in s. 235 (2), of withholding material information for the same purpose may, it seems, predicate a conscious withholding on the part of the offender (see p. 867, letter F, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by Eunice Eileen Audrey Cummerston against her conviction at Southampton City Quarter Sessions, before the assistant recorder (N. R. BLACKER, Esq.) and a jury on Sept. 14, 1967, of two offences under s. 235 of the Road Traffic Act, 1960. The offences were first (count 2) making a false statement in a proposed form for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of insurance on a motor vehicle, and second (count 3) withholding material information for the same purpose. She was fined £10 on count 2 and £15 on count 3. Her conviction on count 3 was quashed as the offence charged was merely repetition of that charged on count 2 (see p. 865, letter C, post). The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

F

The cases noted below† were cited during argument in addition to the one referred to in the judgment of the court.

WIDGERY, L.J., delivered the following judgment of the court: The appellant was convicted at the Southampton City Quarter Sessions in September, 1967, of two offences under s. 235 of the Road Traffic Act, 1960. On count 2 of the indictment she was convicted of making a false statement for the purpose of obtaining an insurance on a motor vehicle, and on the third count she was convicted of withholding material information for the same purpose. She was fined £10 on count 2 and £15 on count 3, making a fine of £25 in total.

H

On Mar. 25, 1967, the appellant's husband, Mr. Cummerston, bought a car at a motor auction. Mr. Cummerston had not distinguished himself in the past by his respect for laws affecting drivers, and it seems that he was minded to drive it away without insurance. It is to the credit of the appellant that she dissuaded him, and the car was left over the week-end on the premises where it was bought so that insurance could be effected. It was the Easter week-end, so nothing could be done on Monday, Mar. 27; but on Mar. 28 the appellant on behalf of her husband went to the office of an insurance company with a view to arranging insurance. She saw the manager of the company, Mr. McCully, and he explained to her that no insurance could be effected until a proposal form had been signed by her husband. He produced the proposal form, and for her assistance he went through it with her filling in the answers to the relevant questions to assist her. One question was: "How long have you"—and in this connexion "you" means Mr. Cummmerson—"held a British driving licence?" It is not clear from the evidence precisely how the conversation went; it is not clear whether Mr. McCully used those very words or whether he said to the appellant, "For how long has your husband been driving?" Her answer was that he had been driving every since she had known him, a period of twenty-five years, and she says that she added the qualifying words, "on and off"; but Mr. McCully did not hear those words, if they were used. In fact, Mr. Cummmerson had never had a full licence, he had had a long series of provisional licences. In consequence of the conversation Mr. McCully wrote in on the proposal form in answer to this question, "ten years". He said that he thought that was a substantial period and one which reasonably reflected the sense of the appellant's answer. Later in the form was the question "Have you a provisional licence or a full licence?"; and again there was a dispute as to precisely what was said in the course of the interview. Mr. McCully's recollection was that he said, "I presume your husband has a full licence?", and that the appellant did not demur. She thought that he said "I presume your husband has a licence?" Whatever may in fact have passed between them, Mr. McCully entered on the proposal form the word "Full", and consequently the answer as it stood was clearly an answer that Mr. Cummmerson had a full licence, whereas in truth on that day he had no licence at all, and obtained a further provisional licence the following day.

Having completed the proposal form in this way, Mr. McCully gave it to the appellant, so that she could take it home and get her husband to sign it. They were very anxious to get the car moved that day and there was therefore some urgency about it. She took it home, went to bed, her husband came in late, and for one reason or another never signed the form, and the appellant found herself the next day urgently requiring to get the car moved and no insurance effected. She therefore decided to sign the form on her husband's behalf and did so. The form was duly presented, a certificate of insurance was obtained and the car was driven away.

Now the counts in this indictment were most inelegantly framed. Count 2 charged her with "making a false statement or withholding material information for the purpose of obtaining the issue of a certificate of insurance under Part 6 of the Road Traffic Act, 1960, contrary to s. 235 of the said Act, and the particulars of that offence are that you, Eunice Eileen Audrey Cummmerson, on a day between Mar. 27 and 29, 1967, in the city of Southampton in the county of Hants, made a false statement for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of insurance under Part 6 of the Road Traffic Act, 1960."

Count 3 was in similar cumbersome language and alleged the making of a false statement or the withholding of information, but this time particularised the matter as withholding information. As an ineffective means of conveying information these two counts can scarcely be beaten.

In the result this court has found it very difficult to decide precisely on what the prosecution was relying. Was it relying on the false statement made orally before Mr. McCully or the false statement contained in the proposal form? Was it relying on the false statement with regard to the full licence or the false statement with regard to his previous driving record? Oddly enough, no point was taken on this below. The assistant recorder himself was clearly confused about it, although he directed the jury that it did not matter, and, indeed, no point has been taken in this court on this aspect of the case. Nevertheless this court would not

A regard the verdict of the jury as safe or satisfactory except in so far as it was supported by facts which the appellant clearly accepted and admitted in the course of her evidence. The court would not support any conviction which depended on a verdict of the jury in the face of a denial by the appellant, having regard to the way in which the indictment was framed, and to the general conduct of the matter.

B Now what is clear is that she signed the form. It is clear, therefore, that she made the written statement comprised in the form. It is abundantly clear that Mr. Cummerston did not have a full licence and, consequently, that the statement that he had a full licence was a false statement. In so far as these charges can be supported on those simple facts the court would be prepared to support them, but it would not, for the reasons I have given, go further.

C In addition to that, it is to be observed that count 3, which charges withholding material information, is no more than a repetition of count 2 in different terms. The jury ought to have been instructed that if they convicted on count 2 no verdict would be required from them on count 3, yet in fact they were allowed to convict on both counts. This court, being satisfied that that was clearly wrong, will quash the conviction on count 3, the reason for that order being that the jury should not have been required to return a verdict thereon.

Accordingly, we now turn to the relatively simple problem of deciding whether the conviction on count 2 should stand, on the footing that the appellant made a false statement in writing saying that her husband had a full licence when he had never had any such thing. In the court below there was really no defence to this charge, because counsel on both sides accepted that the offence of making a

E false statement under s. 235 of the Act of 1960 was an absolute offence, and that it mattered not whether the appellant knew of the falsity of the statement when she made it. The single judge, however, thought that this was a matter which required consideration, and he gave leave to appeal in order that this court should consider whether it be right that an offence of making a false statement under s. 235 is an absolute offence as everybody in the court below accepted.

F Counsel for the appellant in this court, inspired no doubt by the judge's observations, has submitted that the assistant recorder was wrong and that this is not an absolute offence. If that is right, then the conviction will, of course, be quashed.

It is necessary to look carefully at s. 235 of the Act of 1960 and to look, not only at sub-s. (2) with which we are directly concerned, but also at sub-s. (1), and at s. 236 as well. Subsection (1) of s. 235 provides that:

G "A person shall be guilty of an offence who knowingly makes a false statement for the purpose—(a) of obtaining the grant of a licence under any part of this Act . . .".

That refers inter alia to a driving licence, and the insertion of the word "knowingly" is to be noted. Subsection (2) provides:

H "A person shall be guilty of an offence who makes a false statement or withholds any material information for the purpose of obtaining the issue (a) of a certificate of insurance or certificate of security under Part 6 of this Act . . .".

The omission of the word "knowingly" is to be noted. Section 236 provides:

I "If a person issues any such document as is referred to in paras. (a) or (b) of sub-s. (2) of the last foregoing section . . . and the document . . . so issued is to his knowledge false in a material particular he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine . . .".

So in this instance, which is the offence of the issue of a certificate of insurance, falsity creates no offence unless it is done knowingly.

Counsel for the appellant has referred us to a number of authorities. I need not refer to them in detail, because they really all stem from the well-known and universally accepted dictum of WRIGHT, J., in Sherras v. de Rutzen (1). A That judgment recognises that, although there is a presumption in law that a criminal offence involves an element of mens rea, yet in the case of a statutory offence that may not be so; and in deciding whether a statutory offence is an absolute offence or not one must construe the statute in accordance with ordinary principles looking at the language used and looking at the subject matter with which the statute is dealing. B

Approaching the matter on that basis, counsel for the appellant recognises that the omission of the word "knowingly" in s. 235 (2) is a significant matter.
In the opinion of this court, its significance is apparent and its omission cannot have been accidental. It is quite clear that Parliament when using the word "knowingly" in s. 235 (1) and again in s. 236 could not have omitted the word from s. 235 (2) accidentally. Accordingly it seems to us that the omission of the C word "knowingly" is a strong pointer towards construing this offence as an absolute offence. Counsel for the appellant, however, says that the phrase "makes a false statement . . . for the purpose of obtaining the issue—(a) of a certificate of insurance . . ." is helpful to him. He submits that the true meaning of those words is not merely that the statement shall be made for the purpose of obtaining the issue of a certificate of insurance but that the statement shall be made D
"falsely" for that purpose; and on that argument he asks us to say that the words, construed as a whole, indicate not only that the statement must be intended to lead to the grant of a certificate of insurance but also that it shall have been consciously made falsely for that purpose.

The court does not accept that submission, and is of the opinion that on the true construction of s. 235 (2) all that is necessary is that the statement should E be for the purpose of obtaining the issue of a certificate of insurance and that it need not have been made with conscious falsity in order to satisfy the terms of the subsection.

When one looks at the subject matter of s. 235 to which we are enjoined to look by the dictum of WRIGHT, J. (2), it seems to us that there are good grounds for thinking that on this subject matter Parliament intended the offence to be an F absolute one. The pre-occupation of Parliament with the necessity for drivers to be properly insured is clear, and the sort of statement which is contemplated in s. 235 (2) is the sort of statement which the owner of a motor-car can normally make from his own knowledge, if he takes a little trouble to be precise and accurate about it. The sort of question which he is normally asked is, what is his age, how long has he driven, has he committed a previous offence; these are questions G to which anybody can give an accurate answer, if he takes a little trouble. It seems to us, therefore, to be wholly consistent with the general intention of Parliament in the Road Traffic Act, 1960, that in regard to statements made with a view to the obtaining of a certificate of insurance a very high duty should be placed on the maker of the statement to use care to get the statement accurate.
Accordingly, we think that the subject matter of s. 235 (2) does point to Parliament H intending the offence to be an absolute one.

The contrast of sub-s. (1) is clear, because in sub-s. (1) the public consequences of a false statement are far less important. It matters less to the public that a man obtains a driving licence by making a false statement, but it is of critical importance to members of the public using the road that he should not obtain a certificate of insurance by means of a false statement and thus drive uninsured. I

Finally, counsel for the appellant says that the true explanation of the omission of the word "knowingly" in sub-s. (2) is to shift the onus of proof. Without referring to authority, it can be said that there are cases in which this conclusion has been reached on the construction of a statute which omits the word "knowingly", and it is therefore a submission which must be carefully considered. One

(1) [1895-99] All E.R. Rep. 1167 at p. 1169; [1895] 1 Q.B. 918 at p. 921.

(2) [1895-99] All E.R. Rep. at p. 1169; [1895] 1 Q.B. at p. 921.

- A asks oneself: why should the onus of proof be shifted when one compares sub-s. (1) with sub-s. (2)? Of course, if the statements are based on knowledge peculiarly within the mind of the person making the statement, it would be understandable that that would justify a shifting of the onus of proof to him. The sort of statement made in an application for a driving licence, however, is no less within the specific and peculiar knowledge of the applicant than is the sort of statement B made when seeking to obtain a certificate of insurance.

- We can see no logical reason whatever which would justify Parliament in thinking that the onus of proof should be different when comparing sub-s. (1) with sub-s. (2). Unless there is some logical reason for supposing that the onus of proof should be different, we are not disposed to regard the omission of the word "knowingly" as merely indicative of shifting of the onus of proof. Accordingly, having considered the matter with care, this court concludes that both counsel and the assistant recorder in the court below were quite right when they treated this as an absolute offence, and it matters not that the question of the appellant's knowledge of the falsity of the statement was not investigated. There is, therefore, no ground for regarding the appellant's conviction on count 2 as being unsafe or unsatisfactory. The appeal is accordingly dismissed so far as it relates to count 2, D and the conviction and penalty on that count will stand.

- A further point was made by counsel for the appellant with which I ought to deal. He pointed out that under s. 235 (2) an offence was committed by a person who either made a false statement or withheld material information. He submits that the word "withhold" in its natural meaning implies a conscious withholding of information which is in fact in the mind of the withholder. If that is so, he E seeks to argue that it would be strange if within the confines of this single subsection one had an absolute offence of making a false statement and a qualified offence of withholding material information. In view of the conclusion which we have already reached on count 3 it is unnecessary to reach a final conclusion on whether a withholding of material information implies a conscious withholding and, therefore, implies a duty on the prosecution to prove knowledge on the part F of the accused of the information withheld. Although it is unnecessary for us finally to decide this question, we think it right to say that we are impressed by the argument of counsel for the appellant, and we think that his submission may well be right. Even if it be right, however, there is no reason to suppose that Parliament did not intend to distinguish in this regard between a false statement and a withholding of information. It is one thing to make a false statement in G black and white consciously applying one's mind to the statement which one is making and making it falsely, and quite a different thing to fail to disclose information which one may never have had or perhaps may have had but may have momentarily forgotten. We see nothing illogical in a distinction between an absolute and a qualified offence in regard to false statements and withholding respectively, and if it be the case, as counsel submits, that withholding implies H conscious withholding, this would still not affect the conclusion which we have reached on count 2.

Appeal allowed in part. Conviction on count 3 quashed. Appeal dismissed as to conviction on count 2.

HAKLUYTT v. HAKLUYTT.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Willmer and Edmund Davies, L.J.J.), May 3, 1968.]

Divorce—Judicial separation—Maintenance of wife—Lump sum payment—Additional to annual sum—Factors to be regarded—Commutation of part of husband's pension as retired naval officer, thereby decreasing his income and increasing his capital—Wife's house in need of repair—Generous order for annual maintenance—Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 (c. 72), s. 20 (1).

Fifteen years after her marriage a wife, who had herself committed adultery, and whose husband had left her about eleven years after the marriage, obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery with a named woman. The two children of the marriage, boys aged about fifteen and ten, remained living with the wife in the former matrimonial home, a house owned by the wife subject to a mortgage, worth about £5,500 but in need of repairs, the cost of which would be about £500. Due partly to the mortgage repayments made by the husband during cohabitation, the mortgage debt had been reduced to £1,250, the wife's interest in the house being thus worth about £4,250. The court found that this was worth about £250 per annum to the wife, who had no income. About two years previously the husband had purchased on mortgage another house for about £4,500; this was vested in the joint names of himself and the woman named; and he lived there with her. At this time, he being then forty-one, the husband retired from the Royal Navy, in which he was a regular officer; he received a pension of £825 per annum (of which his widow would be entitled on his death to a pension of one-third of the amount that he would receive if he lived to the age of sixty) and a terminal grant of £2,475, which he used to repay some of the money borrowed to buy the house vested jointly in him and the woman named (leaving about £3,600 outstanding on mortgage), to repay debts to his bank and to solicitors, to buy a car and to repair and furnish the house. He obtained employment, earning £2,024 per annum. The husband commuted half his naval pension, thereby reducing it to £413 per annum, for a capital sum of about £5,500, which he wished to use to pay off his mortgage and effect alterations and improvements to the house vested in him jointly with the woman named. In proceedings for maintenance of his wife and children the husband undertook to pay his elder son's school fees, which were about £130 per annum. The younger son was not at a fee-paying school. The husband having been ordered to pay £115 per annum less tax as maintenance for each of the two sons, and £800 per annum less tax together with a lump sum of £1,750 by way of maintenance for the wife, appealed on the question of the wife's maintenance.

Held: as the husband had deliberately and voluntarily commuted part of his pension in order to raise capital, this was one of the exceptional cases in which a lump sum payment by way of maintenance could properly be ordered under s. 20 (1) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965; but as the £800 per annum, ordered was generous annual maintenance, a sum of £500, which would meet the cost of repairing the wife's house, would be awarded as lump sum maintenance in lieu of the £1,750 (see p. 872, letter H, p. 872, letter I, to p. 873, letter A, and p. 873, letters E and G, post).

Principle stated by WILLMER, L.J., in Davis v. Davis ([1967] 1 All E.R. at p. 126) applied.

Appeal allowed.

B Interlocutory Appeal.

This was an appeal by the husband, John Philip Dabbs Hakluytt, against so much of the order of FAULKS, J., made on Jan. 26, 1968, as ordered him to pay his wife, Diana Lilian Hakluytt, maintenance at the rate of £800 per annum, less tax, plus a lump sum of £1,750. The facts are set out in the judgment of WILLMER, L.J.

- C K. Bruce Campbell, Q.C., and G. Rodway for the husband.
M. B. Smith for the wife.

WILLMER, L.J.: This is an appeal from an award of maintenance made by FAULKS, J., on Jan. 26, 1968, in matrimonial proceedings, whereby he himself allowed an appeal from Mr. District Registrar BAILEY COX at Portsmouth.

- D The order which the judge made was one providing for (a) maintenance for the wife at the rate of £800 per annum, less tax, (b) £115 per annum, less tax, in respect of each of two children of the marriage, on an undertaking by the husband to be responsible for the elder child's school fees (said to amount to about £130 per annum) and (c) a lump sum payment of £1,750 for the wife. The registrar had made an order for £2,500 by way of lump sum payment, and the effect of
- E the judge's order was thus to reduce that to the figure I have stated.

I think it would probably be useful if I state straight away the conclusion at which I have arrived, and proceed thereafter to express to the best of my ability the reasons which have guided me to that conclusion. My conclusion is that the appeal should be allowed, and the lump sum payment reduced to £500, but that the award of annual maintenance, both in respect of the wife and the

F children, should remain undisturbed.

This is a case in which there has been no divorce between the parties; but the wife, in 1967, obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of adultery committed by the husband with a named woman. The parties were married in 1952, when the husband was twenty-seven years of age and the wife thirty-three years of age. That was sixteen years ago, so that the husband is

G now forty-three and the wife forty-nine. There are two children of the marriage, both boys, the elder being about fifteen and the younger about ten.

The husband throughout the years of cohabitation was a serving officer in the Royal Navy, reaching the rank of Lieutenant Commander. The parties established their matrimonial home in Gosport, in a house owned by the wife. It was a house purchased with the assistance of mortgages, and during the

- H period of cohabitation the husband was making the mortgage payments. I will return in due course to a consideration of the value of the house and the value of the equity having regard to the present state of the mortgages. In the meantime, I continue with the history of the matter. The parties separated in 1963, when the husband left the wife. Thereafter he met the woman named (who, as we have been informed today, was the wife of a brother-officer), and
- I during 1964 he and the woman named commenced an adulterous association, which is still continuing. In 1966 the husband, having left the matrimonial home, purchased a house of his own at Botley. He did this with the aid of borrowed money. The price was said to be £4,500, of which he borrowed £3,600 odd from a building society. £400 was left on mortgage by the vendor; and the remainder, amounting to nearly £600, was borrowed by the husband from the woman named. He and the woman named then went into occupation of this house, and so far as I know they are still living together there, although, of course, unmarried.

In November, 1966, the husband retired from the Royal Navy, being a man then of forty-one years of age. He obtained a pension from the Royal Navy worth £825 per annum. I would pause there to remark that as part of the rights acquired under the pension scheme his widow, in the event of his death, will be entitled to a pension at the rate of one-third of that to which the husband would be entitled if he lived to the age of sixty. That was the general effect of the regulation which was cited to us. The husband also obtained from the Royal Navy what is described as a terminal grant, that is to say a capital sum, amounting to £2,475. He used that money partly for repaying the £400 which he borrowed from the vendor and the sum which he borrowed from the woman named, partly in making a payment to his bank, partly in paying certain costs for which he was liable, partly in buying a secondhand motor car, partly in paying his own solicitors on account of various proceedings in which he was involved; and the balance was used for the purpose of repairing and furnishing the house which he had bought. Having left the Royal Navy, the husband very quickly obtained a job in which he works either directly or indirectly for the Admiralty, so that he can no doubt use his naval experience. That job brings him in a present salary at the rate of £2,024 a year: it is not an established position, so that it does not of itself carry any pension rights.

The two children of the marriage reside with the wife in her house, which had been the matrimonial home. The elder son goes to a grammar school, in respect of which the husband has undertaken to pay the fees: the younger son, at present at any rate, goes to a state school, which presumably involves no payment of fees.

The parties are thus each left in possession of their own houses. The position with regard to the wife's house is that it is said to be worth about £5,500. Thanks largely to payments made by the husband in the past, the mortgage debts have been reduced to about £1,250, so that the wife's equity in her house is worth somewhere in the neighbourhood of £4,250: that is worth to the wife something like £250 a year. That is a matter to be taken into consideration, because if she did not own the house she would have to use some sum approximating to that figure in renting other accommodation. The husband has still got outstanding the mortgage of £3,600 odd which he took out with the building society. That leaves him with a much smaller equity of redemption than the wife has got: moreover, he has seen fit to transfer to the woman with whom he lives a half-share in the house. That does involve that the woman named must bear a half-share in the liabilities attaching thereto.

What has complicated the case and given rise to the claim for a lump sum payment is the fact that the husband thought it right to commute half his Royal Navy pension for a capital sum. He thereby acquired a capital sum of £5,500 odd: but in return for that his pension was reduced by half, from £825 a year to £413 a year. He therefore has so much less income out of which to make provision for the annual maintenance of his wife. The object of the husband in indulging in this transaction, as I understand it, was to pay off, if he could, the mortgage on his own house, and also to carry out certain alterations and improvements to the house, for which planning permission has already been obtained. It is to be remarked that if that programme is carried out, half the benefit of it will, of course, enure to the woman named with whom he lives and to whom the property belongs in part.

It is in those circumstances that the question has arisen what is the proper way of providing for the wife's maintenance; and the further question has arisen whether it is a proper case in which to order a lump sum payment, in accordance with what is now s. 20 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965. That is a relatively new power which has been conferred on the court, and first appeared in the Matrimonial Causes Act 1963 (1). So far as we have been

A informed, this is only the second case in which the propriety or otherwise of ordering a lump sum payment has had to be considered by this court. The only previous case was that to which we have been referred, namely, Davis v. Davis (2). That was a case of an entirely different character from the present case. It was a case of a wife who was completely without means of her own, and with no home of her own other than a rented flat in respect of which she had no security of tenure; but it was also a case of an immensely wealthy husband, who was possessed of capital amounting to not less than £400,000 and an income which was variously stated as being something between £27,000 and £40,000 a year. It was clearly a case, therefore, in which the husband was called upon to make very generous provision for his wife. A generous annual maintenance order was made; but the court thought it proper, in the circumstances of that case, to award a lump sum payment in favour of the wife in addition to the generous annual payment. The avowed object of that lump sum payment was to enable the wife to purchase a house of her own and set herself up in an establishment commensurate with the standard of life to which she had been accustomed while living with her husband. There was some disagreement what the appropriate lump sum should be. The registrar started by awarding D £10,000. The judge on appeal thought that £15,000 was the appropriate figure; but this court raised that figure still further to £25,000. I do not think that we need concern ourselves in this case with any consideration of figures such as that; but when the case came to this court we had to consider on what sort of principle lump sum payments ought to be made. That was, of course, the first case in which the matter had been raised in this court. I am reported as saying (3):

E “As a practical matter, it is clear that an order for a lump sum payment can only properly be made against a husband possessed of sufficient capital assets to justify it. It is not to be expected, therefore, that the question is likely to arise except in relatively rare cases”.

I do not feel at all repentant about that: I think that is right. It can only be in relatively rare cases that the question is likely to arise.

F It is said, however, that this is just such an exceptional case, although, it is readily conceded, on grounds quite different from those which appealed to the court in Davis v. Davis (2). What is said is that this husband has deliberately elected to sacrifice something of the order of £400 a year of his annual income in order to raise a sum of capital which has in fact been raised, namely, £5,500 odd. In so far as he voluntarily reduced his income he voluntarily reduced the sources out of which he could be expected to pay annual maintenance to the wife. It is clear that he should not be allowed to take advantage of that voluntary act on his part in order to reduce the over-all maintenance which he ought to pay to his wife; but what is further said is that in this case, owing to the fact that the wife has been living in relative poverty since the separation took place, the house in which she is living has got into a bad state of repair and needs a good deal of repair and renovation. Thanks to the discovery on the court file of what would appear to be the judge's notes, it would seem that his figure of £1,750 was arrived at on the basis that £1,250 would be required for the purpose of enabling the wife to pay off the outstanding mortgages on her house, and the round figure of £500 was suggested as being an appropriate amount to put the house into a proper state of repair. If that were done, the wife would then have, all to herself, a house in good repair and totally free from encumbrances.

I It is said, however, on behalf of the husband that this is not an exceptional case such as was contemplated in Davis v. Davis (2). It is pointed out that we are dealing here with people who, by comparison with the parties in that case, are in relatively humble circumstances: the capital sum which the husband has made available to himself, and which (as I have said) he wants to use to pay off his own mortgage and renovate his own house, is of a relatively small amount, and not such as to justify the making of a lump sum payment in pursuance of s. 20 of the Act of 1965. Furthermore, it is said on behalf of the husband that, even without the lump sum payment which the judge thought right to order, this wife has in fact been very generously treated from the point of view of annual maintenance. Approaching the case on the basis that the husband had not commuted half his pension so as to raise capital, but had continued to receive his full pension in addition to his salary, we should then be dealing with a man whose total income was of the order of £2,850. In addition to that, something, I suppose, ought to be added—but something relatively small—in respect of the annual value of his share of the equity of redemption in his own house. The wife has no income of her own; but, as I have already said, the annual value of her interest in her own house is probably of the order of £250 a year, which would bring the joint income to somewhere between £3,100 and £3,200. In those circumstances, although, as this court, and indeed every other court, has consistently said over the years, there is no such thing as a “one-third rule”, it would not have been unreasonable to expect—leaving aside any question of lump sum payment—that the wife should have something of the order of £1,000 a year or a little more. She is already receiving, or notionally receiving, £250 a year, the value of the house she lives in; and in those circumstances, especially bearing in mind that the husband, in addition to supporting his wife, has got to find £360 a year to support and educate his children, there is some justification for saying that the award of £800 a year to the wife would be a generous award. If so, it is said, there ought not to be any lump sum payment in addition, and certainly not a lump sum payment of the order of £1,750. A B C D E

I think that the argument on behalf of the wife is well-founded in so far as reliance is placed on the fact of the husband having deliberately and voluntarily sacrificed part of his income in order to raise capital. I accept the argument that to that extent this case is an exceptional case, in which the question of payment of a lump sum at least arises for consideration; but I also accept the argument for the husband that this wife, quite apart from the question of lump sum payment, has been not ungenerously treated in the order made by the court. I accept the argument that in the circumstances of this case there is no call for capital expenditure in order to pay off the relatively small outstanding mortgages: they do not involve the wife in any very considerable annual expenditure in order to pay the instalments; but it does remain the fact, as sworn to by the wife and not contradicted by the husband—no doubt he is in no position to contradict it—that the wife's house is in bad repair and needs some money spent on it. I recognise that it is something of a guess—but apparently a guess that the judge below was disposed to make—that £500 would be a reasonable sum to allow for that. If, in the event, that sum proves to be insufficient to do the repairs that ought to be done, I can only say that the wife has only herself to blame. It was open to her to furnish the court with particulars of what repairs are required and what the approximate cost might be; but, in all the circumstances of the case, I think that the wife does succeed in making good her claim to a lump sum payment to the extent of £500, which should put her in a position to do whatever repairs are necessary to bring the house up to the standard which she is entitled, in her position, to expect. I do not think, however, that there is any justification for making a lump sum payment going beyond that necessary capital expenditure. I have considered whether, in return for the £500 capital which is to be made available to the wife—which she will, of course, receive free of tax—any adjustment should be made in relation to the annual income which she is to receive; but I have come to the conclusion that any such adjustment would be so relatively trifling that it would not really be appropriate for this court to interfere with the order made by the judge below. F G H I

For those reasons, therefore, I would, as I said at the beginning, allow this

A appeal, reduce the lump sum payment from £1,750 to £500, and leave the order in relation to annual maintenance and the maintenance of the children undisturbed.

EDMUND DAVIES, L.J.: In Davis v. Davis (4) WILLMER, L.J., said:

B “As a practical matter, it is clear that an order for a lump sum payment can only properly be made against a husband possessed of sufficient capital assets to justify it. It is not to be expected, therefore, that the question is likely to arise except in relatively rare cases.”

C Counsel for the husband in the present case has urged that there is nothing in these circumstances that could possibly be described as “relatively rare”, and that, were this court now to approve of the award of a lump sum, of whatever amount, the doors would be opened to making lump sum orders a common feature in the general run of such cases as the present. In my judgment those observations are not well-founded. On the contrary, there is, as counsel for the wife observed, at least one quite unusual feature in the case now under consideration. I refer to the fact that the husband, by his own voluntary act of commuting his service pension, not only gained the capital sum of £5,517 but, in consequence, suffered a reduction of that pension from £825 to £413 per annum. The latter figure, when added to his present salary of £2,024, brings his annual income up to some £2,437. It was, I repeat, by his own act that his annual pension was halved, and, that act having operated to vest in him the capital sum already mentioned, to my way of thinking it is but justice that his wife should share to some degree in that capital sum, in the same way as the sum awarded, or to be awarded, to her by way of maintenance would have reached a higher figure, in all probability, had there been no such reduction in his pension.

E Having had the advantage of counsel's submissions, the doubt that has remained in my mind is not whether this is a proper case for the ordering of a lump sum payment under s. 20 (1) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, but rather what that lump sum payment should be. In all the circumstances, F and for the reasons already stated by WILLMER, L.J., I have come to the conclusion that £1,750 was substantially too much; but how far it should be reduced is a question not free from difficulty, and that largely because the evidence presented on behalf of the wife is, unfortunately, exiguous in certain respects. On the whole, I have, like WILLMER, L.J., come to the conclusion that the proper lump sum to be awarded here is about £500. I would accordingly allow G this appeal and vary the judge's order by substituting that sum for the £1,750 awarded the wife. I come to that conclusion the more readily because of my conviction that the order that the wife is to receive £800 per annum maintenance is one which might well be described as being not ungenerous.

H Appeal allowed. Order below varied by substituting £500 for lump sum award of £1,750.

MARLTON (an infant) AND ANOTHER v. LEE-LEVITEN AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Lord Denning, M.R., Diplock and Sachs, L.JJ.), May 14, 15, 1968.]

Practice—Want of prosecution—Dismissal of action—Delay—Inordinate delay without excuse—Personal injury to infant plaintiff—No defence on liability—Defendants paid £500 into court—No prejudice to defendants—Action not to be dismissed.

At the end of August, 1961, the infant plaintiff, then ten years of age, received injuries in France as a passenger in a motor car driven by the second defendant. In September, 1963, a writ was issued on behalf of the infant plaintiff; in November, 1963, a defence was delivered. There was no real issue as to liability. In December, 1963, an order was made that the action should be set down within twenty-one days. The action was not set down. Medical reports were obtained and exchanged by the parties. At the end of April, 1966, the defendants had paid £500 into court. The plaintiff's solicitors, acting after advice from counsel, did not set down the action then for trial, but waited to see what effect the accident might have on the infant plaintiff when she started working in September, 1966. The action, however, was not set down after that time. In March, 1968, after a report of the decision in Allen v. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd.*, was published, the defendants applied that the action should be dismissed for want of prosecution. It was conceded that the delay was inordinate, if the facts as to time stood alone†.

Held: (i) (SACHS, L.J., not concurring) the delay was inexcusable (see p. 876, letters B and E, and p. 877, letter H, post; cf. p. 878, letters B and E, post).

(ii) the defendants had not, however, been prejudiced; and in the circumstances (having regard to the payment into court, and the fact that the action was almost sure to succeed, and to the plaintiff's infancy) the action would not be dismissed (see p. 876, letters D and I, and p. 878, letters F and I, post).

Interlocutory Appeal.

This was an appeal by the infant plaintiff to set aside an order made by MILMO, J., dated Apr. 5, 1968, that the plaintiff's action be dismissed for want of prosecution and for the payment out of court of a sum of £500 to the defendants' solicitors without further authority. The order of Apr. 5, 1968, was made on the allowance of an appeal by the defendants from an order of Mr. District Registrar LAWTON made on Mar. 27, 1968, giving the infant plaintiff leave to set the action down for trial out of time, and dismissing the defendants' application to dismiss the infant plaintiff's action for want of prosecution. The grounds of appeal stated in the notice of appeal dated Apr. 17, 1968, included (i) that the

A next friend and advisers of the infant plaintiff were not guilty of such delay as justified the dismissal of the action after the cause of action, which accrued on Aug. 31, 1961, had become barred by the Limitation Acts; (ii) that the delay was excusable in that it arose from a desire to determine the true extent of the injuries of the infant plaintiff and the consequences thereof; and (iii) that the delay was not such as to prejudice the defendants, as there was no real issue as to their liability to compensate the infant plaintiff. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD DENNING, M.R.

R. B. Gibson, Q.C., Quintin Edwards and Shelagh Morgan for the plaintiff.

John D. Stocker, Q.C., and J. R. Pickering for the defendants.

C LORD DENNING, M.R.: As long ago as Aug. 31, 1961, the first defendant, a Mrs. Lee-Leviten, was driving a motor car in France on a road towards Nice. She had a carload of children with her. It appears that a car came towards her on its wrong side of the road. She pulled to one side and the car hit a tree. Many of the occupants were injured and they brought claims against the first defendant and the second defendant, her husband, who was the owner of the car. Some of those claims were settled, but one of them, the claim of a child, D Ann Marlton, ten years of age, was not settled. On Sept. 16, 1963, the infant plaintiff, by her mother as her next friend, issued a writ claiming damages for negligence against the defendants, Mrs. Lee-Leviten and her husband. The statement of claim was in the ordinary form. The claim was that the infant plaintiff had suffered injuries; that she had a cut to her upper lip and to her left knee, that her teeth were damaged, and there was also a suggestion that E she might have had a fracture of one of the vertebrae which caused her pain. The statement of claim was delivered on Sept. 23, 1963: and the defence was delivered on Nov. 6, 1963. On Dec. 9, 1963, there was an order for directions, saying that the action was to be set down within twenty-one days. The plaintiffs never did set it down. Medical examinations were held and medical reports were exchanged between the parties. The plaintiffs obtained the report of a consultant, Mr. Burwell, in June, 1963, but never got any other report from the consultant for nearly five years. Meanwhile, the defendants obtained the reports of a consultant, Mr. Lamont, over a longer period. They made a payment into court on Dec. 21, 1965, of £250. In January of 1966 the defendants received another report of their medical adviser. Soon afterwards, on Apr. 1, 1966, they increased the payment into court by £250, making a total of £500 paid into court F on Apr. 1, 1966. At that time at least one would have thought that the plaintiffs' advisers would have had a further medical report to see whether or not that sum should be accepted; but they did not do so. They did not take out the sum. Nor did they set the action down for trial. Their legal executive gives this explanation:

H "I considered it advisable to delay the trial of this matter in order that the infant plaintiff could give an accurate account of how she was affected by the injuries she sustained, as in my opinion until she commenced work it was impossible for anyone to attempt to assess whether she would have any trouble from her shoulder . . . After discussions with the mother of the infant plaintiff and counsel, I decided that in all the circumstances it would not be in the best interests of the infant plaintiff to set this action down I for trial until after she had commenced work and I had had an opportunity to see how work was affecting her."

The infant plaintiff started work in September, 1966, but still they did not set down the action for trial. Still they did not get a report from the consultant. They waited until February, 1968, before they asked Dr. Burwell to give another report (five years after his previous report); but before he gave it, the defendants took out a summons to dismiss the case for want of prosecution. The judge has dismissed it. Now there is an appeal to this court.

There are two questions: First: were the plaintiff's solicitors guilty of prolonged and inexcusable delay? Secondly: have the defendants been seriously prejudiced by the delay?

As to the first point: This was a simple and uncomplicated case. The injuries were not serious. There was no reason to wait to see whether there were hidden troubles which might reveal themselves. The worst complaint was bedwetting, but the infant plaintiff got over it two or three years ago. The plaintiff's advisers were gravely at fault. They could and should have got on with the case years before. Their delay was both prolonged and inexcusable.

The second question is whether the defendants have been seriously prejudiced by the delay. On the issue of liability, I do not think that there was any prejudice. Here a car ran off the road and hit a tree. It would be very difficult for the defendants to show (and I think the burden would be on them to show) that there was no negligence at all on the part of the driver. In any event, I think that they can contest it now as well as they could have done six years ago. Then as to damages. I do not see that they have been prejudiced. They have available the reports of their consultant—far more complete—than those of the plaintiff. In addition, I am much influenced by the fact that the defendants have already paid into court £500. They must have been able to assess the damages at that time. In addition, the plaintiff is a child. In all the circumstances, I do not think it would be right to dismiss the case for want of prosecution; but it should be set down forthwith. We are told that it can come on at the Leeds Assizes in two or three weeks. That is what ought to be done. I would allow the appeal accordingly.

DIPLOCK, L.J.: I agree. The delay between the start of this case by writ in September, 1963, and this month of May, 1968, in a simple running down action, is quite inexcusable. It seems to me that there are two relevant periods in that time. The first was between the order for directions of Dec. 9, 1963, and the notice to proceed given in November, 1965. It would be understandable perhaps since the infant plaintiff had some symptoms which had not cleared up, to wait some time for a further medical report; but in point of fact, as LORD DENNING, M.R., has pointed out, no attempt was made to get any medical report even from a general practitioner between a period before the writ was issued and Nov. 20, 1965.

The other period of delay, which seems to me to be inexcusable, is the period of delay between the payment into court and the present day or rather the month of March, 1968. Again, at that time, which was April, 1966, it was known that the infant plaintiff's symptoms of enuresis according to the medical report obtained two years' later had already disappeared. It was also known that the infant plaintiff would be starting work in the autumn of 1966, and their legal executive in his affidavit said he thought that it would be wise to see how the infant plaintiff settled down to work. It may be that it was excusable to wait to see that; but, having seen that well before the end of 1966, not a step was taken in this action or by way of getting any medical report until February, 1968, when a further report was asked for.

In my view if the defendants could have established that they had suffered any prejudice by that delay, it would have certainly entitled them to have the action struck out for want of prosecution. I agree, however, with LORD DENNING, M.R., that in the particular circumstances of this case the action is in fact really no more difficult to try in 1968 than it would have been had the action proceeded with proper despatch. Furthermore, the payment into court, quite apart from protecting the infant plaintiff, gave the defendants fairly obvious notice that the action was not one that the plaintiff intended to abandon. Plaintiffs do not normally abandon actions leaving £500 in court. I do not say that there may not be such delay after a payment into court as to entitle a defendant who has made it to have an action dismissed for want of prosecution

A and possibly payment out again, but I think that he has to show a great deal of prejudice; the defendants have not done so in this case and I agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that this appeal should be allowed. The question of costs, will, of course, have to be considered afterwards.

B SACHS, L.J.: This is one of the stream of cases which has followed from this court's decision in Allen v. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd. (1) on Jan. 11, 1968. So far as has been ascertained today, the first report giving in full the reasons of the members of the court was on Feb. 27, in the ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS. This application was launched on Mar. 7, and it is to be noted that a month before the application, that is to say, on Feb. 8, there had been a request by the plaintiff's solicitors to their doctor to make a further examination. Had this been completed in the ensuing three or four weeks, it would obviously have led them to take appropriate action. In fact, unfortunately the examination only took place on Mar. 5, two days before the summons.

C In such cases as the present, the court, of course, must always watch anxiously to see that nothing is done contrary to the justice of the case, and that anxiety is reinforced in this particular case by some special factors. First of all, D the plaintiff is an infant who was ten years old at the time of the accident and of whom no-one could say that she was in any way to blame for the course of the proceedings. Secondly, it is an action in which it would probably be a meiosis to say that the chances of success were ninety-five per cent. (they might well have been ninety-nine per cent.) and the plaintiff's solicitors would be well justified in assuming that there was no real contest as to liability, especially as E it is undisputed that the settlements with regard to three other youngsters injured by the accident were on a basis of full liability. Thirdly—and this is an important factor—£500 had been paid into court, and, as has been pointed out, it would be strange if any plaintiff simply abandoned an action when there was £500 there to be taken out.

F From those special factors (to which I will later refer further) I turn to the principles applied in Allen v. Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons, Ltd. (1) and thus look at the judgment of SALMON, L.J. (2). There he set out what has to be considered in this class of case. He said that before such an application can succeed the defendant must show, first, that there has been inordinate delay: and that has been conceded by counsel for the plaintiffs—if the facts in relation to time stood alone. Secondly, that that inordinate delay is inexcusable. Here, however, the infant G plaintiff's legal advisers, in her interests and bona fide—for that is not contested—took the view that it would be wrong in all the circumstances to bring the case to trial before April, 1966, having regard to the state of affairs existing when the second payment into court was made that month. How right they were not to proceed earlier is shown by that very payment. As regards what happened afterwards, it does not appear to be contested that, having regard to the situation H as a whole and to the fact that the solicitor consulted counsel, it was wrong to let the matter go on for some period after April, 1966, without taking out the payment in and with a view to seeing what would be the final upshot of the injuries in so far as neurosis was concerned. In that behalf one notes in the report tendered to them by the defendants that immediately before the second payment in some of the sequelae were, in the opinion of the defendants' doctor, I due to psychogenis overlay. How long such an overlay will take to clear up is a matter of medical opinion, and medical opinion, in the experience that has come from trying many cases, is not always right. It may be inaccurate by quite a large measure.

In those circumstances, it seems to me, and I think it so seems to the other members of the court, that to continue without bringing the matter to finality for some time after April, 1966, was reasonable. Indeed, the only question seems to be as to whether it was unreasonable so to continue in relation to a period of, when one works it out, not much more than a year and possibly less than a year before the date on which this summons was taken out. It may well be that many of those concerned with similar cases would have taken out the £500 or brought the action to trial shortly after the second payment in: and I am prepared to agree that in the latter part of the period before Mar. 7, 1968, it was wrong not to bring the action to trial in all the circumstances. I am not prepared to agree, however, that it was inexcusable in the sense that no reasonable solicitor acting in the interests of his client would have taken the course, which in fact was taken: for one should remember firstly that in fact it was an undefended case with regard to liability, secondly, that there would be no detriment to the defendants in letting the matter go on, and, thirdly, that this was an infant whose money would have to remain in court anyway.

(1) [1968] 1 All E.R. 543.

(2) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 561.

It seems to me that one may well remember in some such cases the approach which (in another context and in words which I have paraphrased) was adumbrated by LORD MACNAGHTEN in a wholly different class of case: Bullfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries (1891), Ltd. v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co. (3). It may be asked why the court should be made to listen to conjecture on a matter which can become an accomplished fact. Why should the court be asked to guess when it can calculate? Why, with the light before it, should the court be made to grope in the dark? In matters of neurosis there is something to be said for that point of view when children are concerned, although obviously such an approach cannot be carried to extremes, and often does not apply at all where adults (who tend to recover when damages have been assessed) are concerned. In these circumstances, it does not seem to me that, even if the delay was wrong, it was really inexcusable.

As regards the third point made by SALMON, L.J. (4) as a condition precedent to an application of this kind succeeding, one comes to the question of serious prejudice with regard to the defence. On this point I have nothing to add to what has fallen from LORD DENNING, M.R., save to mention that it has been expressly disclaimed by counsel for the defendants that his solicitors were in any way misled.

Finally, one comes to the last factor which SALMON, L.J., mentioned. It is this: he said (4):

“If the defendant establishes the three factors to which I have referred, the court, in exercising its discretion, must take into consideration the position of the plaintiff himself and strike a balance.”

That means, in other words, that one must look at the justice of the case as a whole. Here we have those special factors already mentioned: an infant plaintiff; chances of success at least ninety-five per cent.; a solicitor shaping his course bona fide with the help and advice of counsel; and in addition a set of circumstances such that, to my mind, at any rate, if the solicitor is sued for negligence, the chances of success would be far from strong—having regard, inter alia, to the fact that his conduct might well have to be judged in the light of what was the state of practice and procedure before Jan. 11, 1968. The courts should be slow to open themselves to any charge of in effect applying some retrospective legislation against solicitors.

In all those circumstances, it seems to me that this is clearly not a case in which the judge's order can be upheld. To my mind, the defendants, having sought to take advantage of the decision of this court in Allen's case (5) and having failed before the registrar, should not have appealed and should not have

ABBOTT LABORATORIES, LTD. v. CARMODY (Inspector of Taxes).

C [CHANCERY DIVISION (Goff, J.), March 15, 1968.]

Income Tax—Allowance—Industrial building or structure—New factory comprising distinct blocks of buildings—Blocks connected by internal roads, etc.—Administrative block excluded from initial allowances, being regarded as an office if taken alone—All buildings viewed collectively found not to be a single industrial building or structure—Question of fact for commissioners—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2 c. 10), s. 271 (3), (4).

D The taxpayers erected a modern factory on a site of fifty-three acres, surrounded by a ring fence, for the purposes of their business as manufacturers of pharmaceutical products. The factory buildings included a chemical block, which was situated at some distance from the other buildings because of the smell and risk of fire, a pharmaceutical block, a maintenance block and an administration block. The maintenance block was connected to the other blocks by pipes and roadways, the chemical and pharmaceutical blocks were similarly connected, internal roads connected all the blocks, a boiler room served all the blocks, and the administration block was twenty-five yards from the pharmaceutical block and was connected to it by a covered passage-way open on one side to the weather. The administration block housed the accounts department, the managing director's office, the advertising and printing department, the scientific directors and the marketing organisation and personnel; considered in isolation it was in use as an office and thus would be excluded by s. 271 (3)* of the Income Tax Act, 1952, from being an industrial building or structure which might qualify for initial allowances under s. 265. The whole factory area was assessed as a single unit for rating and was formerly so assessed for Sch. A tax. Less than one-tenth of the cost of constructing the whole factory unit had been incurred in constructing the administration block, which accordingly would qualify for inclusion under s. 271 (4) as part of the whole, if the whole were to be regarded as an industrial building or structure. Allowance pursuant to s. 265 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, was refused in respect of the cost of the administration block. On appeal against this refusal, the appeal was argued† on the basis that the collection of buildings were capable in law of being, as a whole, an industrial building or structure within s. 271. The question was then remitted to the Special Commissioners (on the footing that if the lay-out of the buildings was not in law incapable of being an "industrial building or structure" within s. 271) whether the whole premises were such an industrial building or structure. The commissioners then found that they were not, because the administration block was not sufficiently physically integrated with the other structural units within the lay-out.

I Held: the question whether (on the legal basis remitted to the commissioners) the premises as a whole were an industrial building or structure for the purposes of s. 271 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, was a question of fact and degree, and, as the commissioners' decision was one which could reasonably have been reached, it should stand; accordingly the taxpayers were not entitled to capital allowances for the cost of construction of the administration block (see p. 884, letter D, p. 884, letter I, to p. 885, letter A, p. 885, letter G, post).

[Editorial Note. It appears that the practice of the Inland Revenue is that individual buildings, though forming in some respects a single factory, should be considered separately and cannot in law be regarded as a single unit. This view is contrary to the hypothesis on which the matter was remitted to the commissioners in the present appeal. GOFF, J., ruled that the point of construction was not open to determination in the present appeal, but he expressly intimated that it would be open to determination in a future case (see p. 884, letter B, post).]

Case Stated.

The taxpayers appealed to the Special Commissioners of Income Tax against an assessment to income tax made on them under Sch. D to the Income Tax Act, 1952, for 1962-63 in the sum of £400,000. The grounds of appeal were*, so far as material, that in charging the profits or gains of the taxpayers' trade or business capital allowances under the provisions of Part 10 of the Act of 1952 in respect of their factory site in Queenborough, Kent, did not fall to be reduced by excluding expenditure on the construction of one block of the building within the factory area, viz., an administration block. The taxpayers appealed by way of Case Stated to the High Court; the relevant passages from the Case Stated are set out at p. 881, letter G, et seq., post.

GOFF, J.: The appellant taxpayers, Abbott Laboratories, Ltd., bought a site at Queenborough in Kent in 1959 which was a substantial piece of land, fifty-three acres in extent, and thereon erected a modern factory for the purposes of their business as manufacturers of pharmaceutical products. Various parts of the whole were erected in blocks some of which, partly because of the extent of the intervening blocks and one, the chemical block, by reason of its nature, were situated at substantial distances from each other. There were, however, properly made-up roads connecting the various blocks, all were served by a

* The case was remitted for the reason stated at p. 883, letter F, post.

A common heating system, which involved physical connexion by pipes, and the administrative block, with which this case is directly concerned, is physically connected with the pharmaceutical block by a covered passage way. At the time of the hearing before the Special Commissioners one side of that was open to the air, though it appears from the photographs that it has since been closed in. The whole was contained within a ring fence and was assessed as one unit for rating purposes and, whilst Sch. A tax was in force, for the purpose of that tax also.

The problem arose because in assessing the taxpayers to income tax the Crown declined to make an allowance under s. 265 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, so far as concerned the administrative block. Now that block, as its name implies, was used in part as offices for various purposes and it cost some £92,000 to erect. The whole project involved an expenditure of nearly £1¼ million. Section 271 of the Income Tax Act, 1952 provides by sub-s. (3) that:

“Notwithstanding anything in sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of this section, but subject to the provisions of sub-s. (4) of this section, ‘industrial building or structure’ does not include any building or structure in use as, or as part of, a dwelling-house, retail shop, showroom, hotel or office or for any purpose ancillary to the purposes of a dwelling-house, retail shop, showroom, hotel or office . . .”

Subsection (4) enacts that:

“Where part of the whole of a building or structure is, and part thereof is not, an industrial building or structure, and the capital expenditure which has been incurred on the construction of the second mentioned part is not more than one-tenth of the total capital expenditure which has been incurred on the construction of the whole building or structure, the whole building or structure and every part thereof shall be treated as an industrial building or structure.”

It is obvious, of one looks at the total of the buildings which make up this factory including, of course, the administrative block itself, that the cost of that block is sufficiently low to bring the provisions of sub-s. (4) into operation and to entitle the taxpayers to their allowance in respect of that block as well as the rest, but if one looks at it separately then it does not qualify for an allowance. In that state of affairs the taxpayers appealed in 1966 to the Special Commissioners of Income Tax who dismissed the appeal and the taxpayers then appealed further to this court by way of Case Stated. That Case, to which I must now refer, stated in para. 1 (b):

“that in charging the profits or gains of the trade or business of the [taxpayers], capital allowances under the provisions of Part 10, Income Tax Act, 1952 [and the sections to which I have referred are in that part] in respect of the factory site of the [taxpayers] in Queenborough in the county of Kent did not fall to be restricted by reference to one building block in use as an administration office, as hereinafter appeareth.”

After stating the names of the witnesses who had been called and referring to the documents, including a plan and photographs which have been produced to me, the commissioners found certain facts which they set out in para. 3 and which, so far as material, are as follows. They refer to the purchase of the site and state that the taxpayers had erected a modern factory.

“The factory buildings comprised, inter alia, a chemical block, a pharmaceutical block, a maintenance block and an administrative block, the whole factory site being surrounded by a fence. The chemical block was situated at some distance from the other buildings because of the smell and the risk of fire.”

The pharmaceutical block was divided into five parts.

"The administration block housed the accounts department, the managing director's office, the advertising and printing department, the scientific directors and the marketing organisation and personnel. The total area of the block extended to 13,780 square feet..."

The Case Stated then included an estimate of that part of the building which was used by personnel connected with production, and after which it continued:

"The [taxpayers] admitted [and so the findings state] that if the administration block was considered in isolation it was used as an office within the meaning of s. 271 (3), Income Tax Act, 1952."

Then the Case Stated continued:

"The maintenance block was connected to the other blocks by pipes and roadways and the chemical and pharmaceutical blocks were similarly connected. There was a boiler house which serves all the blocks on the site. The administration block was at a distance of twenty-five yards from the pharmaceutical block and connected thereto by a covered passage way which was open on one side to the weather. Internal service roads connected all the blocks on the site and it was admitted on behalf of the [Crown] that the cost of these and of the fence around the factory unit was a proper subject matter for capital allowances."

Then the Case Stated finds that assessments for rating and for Sch. A tax were each made on the whole factory and land in one sum (1). The Case Stated then set out the respective cost which I have already mentioned (2) and continued:

"4. It was contended on behalf of the [taxpayers]:

"(i) that the whole of the [taxpayers'] factory at Queenborough including the administration block hereinbefore referred to was a unitary assemblage of buildings or structures and constituted one building or structure for the purposes of ch. 1 of Part 10 of the Income Tax Act 1952; (ii) that by virtue of s. 1 (i) of the Interpretation Act, 1889, and since no contrary intention appears the words 'industrial building or structure' in ch. 1 of Part 10 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, should be regarded as including the plural [it appears from the argument that that is not a separate point in itself but merely something in aid of the first submission]; (iii) that an allowance under Part 10, Income Tax Act, 1952, ought to be made to the [taxpayers] in charging the profits or gains relevant to the assessment under appeal by reference to the total expenditure on the said factory and that no deduction fell to be made in respect of the administration block."

"5. It was contended on behalf of the [Crown]:

"(i) that the administration block situated on the [taxpayers'] factory site at Queenborough was a separate building or structure within the meaning of s. 265, Income Tax Act, 1952;

"(ii) that in charging to income tax the profits or gains of the [taxpayers'] trade or business relative to the assessment under appeal no allowance fell to be made... in respect of the cost of the said administration block by reason of the provisions of s. 271 (3), Income Tax Act, 1952."

In para. 6 of the Case Stated the commissioners stated that they gave their decision "in principle in writing in the following terms", and, after a paragraph which I need not read, they continued:

"The factory of the [taxpayers], which occupies a site of some fifty-three acres, was designed as a whole to suit the requirements of the [taxpayers']

(1) The date Dec. 1, 1961, was agreed as the date when occupation commenced, and the assessments ran from that date.

(2) The inclusive cost of the entire factory, roadways and boundary fence, but not the cost of the land, plant or machinery, was £1,222,625; and the cost of the administration block was £92,255. The taxpayers received a government grant of £100,000 in connexion with the erection of the factory.

A trade as a manufacturer of pharmaceutical products and was erected in 1960-61 at a cost of £1,222,625, of which amount £92,255 can be attributed to the erection of the administrative block. Section 271 (3), Income Tax Act, 1952, provides that the expression 'building or structure' as used in Part 10 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, does not include any building or structure in use as an office and prima facie the administrative block of the [taxpayers'] factory would not appear to qualify for any allowance. It is said, however, that had the factory been constructed vertically, the whole of the cost including that of the administrative block would have qualified for an allowance, by reason of the provisions of s. 271 (4), the cost of the administrative block being admittedly less than one-tenth of the whole, and that upon a true construction of s. 265 (1) read in conjunction with s. 271 (4) the mere circumstance that this particular factory had been constructed horizontally for reasons of safety and convenience should not lead to a contrary result.

B "We are unable to take this view. In our opinion the provisions of s. 265 (1), which refer to 'a building or structure' and, by inference, the plural 'buildings or structures' are not apt to apply to an extensive factory site, so that it falls to be treated as one unit for the purposes of an allowance under Part 10, Income Tax Act, 1952. Nor do we think that the provisions of s. 271 (4), which prima facie appear to be merely concessionary compel us to take that view."

D When the case had proceeded before me for some time—and I think it had got as far as the Crown's case—it appeared that it would not be satisfactory to proceed to a decision on the case as it stood because the use of the expression "not apt to apply to an extensive factory site" indicated that the commissioners were or might have been proceeding on the basis that as a matter of law an extensive site with a number of blocks on it could not be "a building or structure" within the meaning of this part of the Income Tax Act, 1952. Therefore after some discussion I made an order remitting the case to the commissioners which embodied a formula agreed between the parties. By that order, which was made on Nov. 21, 1966, the Case was remitted to the commissioners for them to decide on the footing that the lay-out of buildings in the case was not in law incapable of being an industrial building or structure within Part 10 of the Act of 1952, whether the whole of the premises were an industrial building or structure and if so or if not for what reasons. For the purposes of making such a decision the commissioners were to hear further argument if so desired by the parties. The commissioners duly heard further argument and they have submitted a report in the form of a Supplemental Case in which they state that they have had before them my order and that they had met in accordance with the order and at the request of the parties had heard further argument. They say:

H "3. On consideration of the said order of the High Court of Justice and the arguments addressed to us and the case cited to us, viz., Phillips (Inspector of Taxes) v. Whieldon Sanitary Potteries, Ltd. (3), we find that, on the footing that the lay-out of buildings in the instant Case is not in law incapable of being 'an industrial building or structure' within Part 10 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, the whole premises are not an industrial building or structure.

I "4. Our reasons for this decision are that, even though the said lay-out of buildings was planned and built as a whole to suit the requirements of the [taxpayers'] trade and was in use for the purposes of that trade, the administrative block was not sufficiently physically integrated with the other structural units within the lay-out. These various units including the administrative block appear to us to be separate entities, though sharing the facilities provided by a common boiler house and connected by made up roads and pathways, and not to constitute one building or structure. We find support for this view by analogy with the case of Phillips (Inspector of Taxes) v. Whieldon Sanitary Potteries, Ltd. (4).”

During the hearing it emerged that the Crown, as a matter of practice in cases of this sort, regard the buildings separately and they desired to submit as a matter of law on the construction of the sections canvassed in this case, that the matter has to be dealt with in that way, which, as I gather, means that premises consisting of individual blocks, though forming in some respects a single factory or other form of industrial premises, cannot in law be regarded as a single unit, contrary to the hypothesis on which my order of remitter was made. After some discussion I ruled that that was a new point and that notice that it would be raised not having been given it was not open to the Crown to take that point in this case, but of course that ruling is without prejudice to anything which may be submitted or argued in any other case with comparable facts.

I have, therefore, to decide this case on the basis on which it was argued and on which the order of remitter was framed, that this collection of buildings is capable of being a building or structure within s. 271 of the Act of 1952. It seems to me that I have not got a question of construction or law as to the meaning of the Act of 1952 but a question of fact and in this respect what was said by DONOVAN, J., in the case which I have already mentioned of Phillips (Inspector of Taxes) v. Whieldon Sanitary Potteries, Ltd. (4) is material. Reviewing certain earlier cases where a chimney stack had been rebuilt and the question was whether that was a repair of the building which it served or was a capital expenditure on a new chimney, DONOVAN, J., referred to and quoted, as I gather with approval, what ROWLATT, J., had said in one of those cases, O’Grady (Inspector of Taxes) v. Bullcroft Main Collieries, Ltd. (5), to this effect (6): “The critical matter is . . . what is the entirety? I think it is very largely a question of degree.” Then in his own language deciding the point before him, which admittedly was on a different provision of the Income Tax Acts, he said this (7):

“These examples illustrate what I think is the truth, that there is no one line of approach to the problem which is exclusively correct. In some cases it will be right to regard the premises as the entire factory, and in others as some part of the factory. Whichever alternative is the right one to adopt will depend on the facts of the particular case. ROWLATT, J., took the view in the O’Grady case (8) that he must regard the chimney itself as the premises, or, as he described it, the ‘entirety’ and I would respectfully agree with him. The Court of Session took the view in the case of Samuel Jones & Co. (Devon-dale), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (9) that the whole factory must be regarded as the premises. The difference thus exhibited is not a difference of law, but of the right conclusion of fact to be drawn in particular instances.”

Whilst, as I have said, that was on a different provision it seems to me that the principle there laid down is applicable to this case.

That in passing disposes of one objection taken by counsel for the taxpayers, where the commissioners said that they derive support for their view by analogy with Phillips (Inspector of Taxes) v. Whieldon Sanitary Potteries, Ltd. (4). Counsel submitted that that showed that they had misdirected themselves but I do not accept that view. Having reached the conclusion that it is a question of fact and degree, I am bound by the findings of the commissioners unless it

A appears that they have misdirected themselves in law or reached a conclusion which no reasonable tribunal could reach in the circumstances. That is clearly stated in the oft cited passage in the speech of LORD RADCLIFFE in Edwards v. (Inspector of Taxes) v. Bairstow (10).

B In addition to the point of law of which I have already disposed, counsel for the taxpayers said that it appeared that the commissioners had misdirected themselves in law because, after stating that the administrative block was not sufficiently physically integrated with the other structural units within the whole, they went on to say: "These various units including the administrative block appear to us to be separate entities." Counsel submits that that is a misapprehension and says that they did not appreciate what they had to decide and that they seemed to be regarding the matter as concluded if they saw the administrative block as a separate entity, and they seemed to think that it followed from that that the whole could not be regarded as a separate building or structure. I do not think that that is a tenable view having regard to the fact that they were dealing with an order which expressly required them to assume that the whole was capable of being an industrial building or structure within the meaning of the Act and they expressly stated that they were dealing with the matter on that footing in para. 3 of the Supplemental Case. I think the fair reading of the reference to "separate entities" was that it was a factor which they took into account in answering the question of fact which was before them.

C In the result I cannot see that the commissioners have misdirected themselves in law, and I therefore turn to the other aspect of the matter. Here it is not a question of what conclusion I myself would reach if I were trying the matter de novo, but whether I can say that this was an unreasonable conclusion which enables me to go behind the commissioners' finding of fact, and in my judgment I cannot reach that conclusion. Counsel for the taxpayers asked rhetorically, "What is the criteria by which one can see what is sufficient?" The answer to that appears to be what I have already referred to, that it is a question of degree and it was for the commissioners to weigh that question which they did.

D Counsel has stressed that there were main roads expressly designed to effect linkage between the several blocks, but that does not necessarily make all the units one building or structure, though obviously it promotes the convenience of the taxpayers in using their factory. Nor, again in my judgment, does the common heating system necessarily lead to the conclusion that all the blocks were one building or structure. As I have said, the question is not for me to determine the answer de novo but to review the commissioners' findings, as it has been said, with due respect for the tribunal and to ask myself, is this a conclusion which no reasonable tribunal could reach? I do that, and I answer my own question by saying it is one which a reasonable tribunal could reach and the tribunal, charged with the duty of deciding it, has reached that conclusion and it must therefore stand and for these reasons I dismiss the appeal.

R., Ltd., an English company that were in fact acting as agents for the plaintiffs, a Persian company, negotiated the purchase of twelve air compressor units from the defendants, an English company, disclosing the fact that R., Ltd. were acting for clients but not identifying the clients. The sale was a sale by description, describing the machines as "new and unused". One such machine was in fact inspected by a representative of the Persian company in London. It was made known to R., Ltd. that the machines were required for re-sale in Persia. The goods were in due course invoiced to R., Ltd. The Persian company sued the defendants for damages for alleged breach of contract on the ground that the machines did not accord with description and were not fit for the purpose for which they were supplied, viz., re-sale in Persia. On appeal from a decision on a preliminary issue in the action,

Held: (i) the rule that an undisclosed (or unnamed) principal could sue on a contract made for him by his agent, unless the contract otherwise provided expressly or impliedly, applied to a foreign principal, and, though the fact that the principal was a foreigner was a factor to be taken into consideration in determining whether the contract in the circumstances excluded enforcement by or against the foreign principal, there was no business usage rendering the contract in the present case unenforceable at the instance of the Persian company; accordingly, as there was nothing to confine the contract on its true construction to R., Ltd., the Persian company had the ordinary right of undisclosed principals to sue on it (see p. 889, letters B and G, p. 892, letters A and H, p. 894, letters H and I, and p. 895, letter E, post).

Dictum of BLACKBURN, J. in Elbinger Act. für Fabrication von Eisenbahn Materiel v. Claye (1873), L.R. 8 Q.B. at p. 317) over-ruled.

(ii) the particular purpose of re-sale of the goods in Persia as new and unused machines had not been made known to the defendants in such a way as to show that the buyers relied on the defendants' skill and judgment and there was no presumption in the circumstances of the present case of such reliance, but the true inference was that the Persian company relied on their own skill and judgment in this respect; accordingly no warranty of fitness for re-sale in Persia was implied in the contract by virtue of s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (see p. 890, letters E and F, p. 893, letter H, p. 894, letters C and E, and p. 896, letter A, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of DONALDSON, J., given on Dec. 19, 1967, and reported [1968] 1 All E.R. 585, holding on the trial of a preliminary issue (i) that privity of contract existed between the plaintiffs, Teheran-Europe Co., Ltd., a company incorporated in Persia (being foreign undisclosed principals in the purchase of goods) and the defendants, S. T. Belton (Tractors), Ltd., the English suppliers of the goods, and that the plaintiffs were accordingly entitled to sue in respect of the contract; (ii) that there was an implied term of the contract in accordance with s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, that the goods should be merchantable, should accord with the contract description and should be fit for the purpose of re-sale in Persia as "new and unused" machines. The relevant grounds of appeal stated in the notice of appeal dated Jan. 1, 1968, were as follows. A. (as to the agency issue) that the judge was wrong in holding (i) that privity of contract existed between the plaintiffs and the defendants; (ii) that, when a contract was made by an agent for an undisclosed foreign principal, the principal might intervene; and (iii) that there was no longer a usage of trade that a foreign principal did not authorise an English agent to establish privity of contract between him and the third party. B. (on the contractual term issue) that (i) the judge was wrong in proceeding on the basis that, where a buyer made known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods were required and if the goods were of a description which it was in the course of a seller's business to supply, there was a presumption that the buyer relied on the seller's skill or judgment; (ii) if there was such a presumption, it did not apply where the buyer or his agent was a dealer in the goods; and (iii) that the evidence indicated that the plaintiffs bought the goods by relying on their own skill and judgment.

H The cases noted below* were cited during the argument in addition to those referred to in the judgments.

I E. W. Eveleigh, Q.C., and P. H. Otton for the defendants.

May 15. LORD DENNING, M.R.: The plaintiffs, Teheran-Europe Co., Ltd., are a company incorporated in Persia which carries on business in Teheran. They import machinery into Persia and re-sell it there. They buy machinery in England through an intermediary called Richards Marketing, Ltd., which is an English company carrying on business in London. In 1957, the managing director of the plaintiffs came over to England. He was interested in machines called air compressors. Some of these machines were being offered for sale by the defendants, a company called S. T. Belton (Tractors), Ltd., of Boston, Lincolnshire. The defendants had acquired several of these compressors as surplus government stores. Eventually, a contract was made for the purchase of twelve of these air compressors at £340 each. Six of them were delivered. The plaintiffs complained that they were not up to contract and brought an action against the defendants for breach of contract. In that action (1) two preliminary issues have been raised for determination. A

The first issue is whether the following contention raised by the defence is correct: it says that:

"The plaintiffs were at all material times an undisclosed foreign principal in respect of the agreement now sued upon, and there has at no time been any privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to sue the defendants in respect of their alleged cause of action herein (if any, which is denied)." C

In order to understand this issue I must set out the material words of the agreement. On Aug. 10, 1957, Richards Marketing, Ltd. wrote to the defendants that: D

"We have been in communication with our clients and have been instructed to put forward an offer to purchase twelve units at £300 each delivered London packers. . . . We shall be obliged to have your acceptance to this."

On Aug. 17, 1957, the defendants replied to Richards Marketing, Ltd. that: E

"We have been going into your offer very carefully. Our best offer is twelve units delivered free to your packers (London) for the sum of £340 each."

On Aug. 19, 1957, Richards Marketing, Ltd. wrote to the defendants

"We now have pleasure in confirming our acceptance as follows [then a number of details] twelve air compressors, new and unused: . . . delivered London packers at £340 each. We shall require delivery of these, if convenient to you, two at a time within intervals of approximately two/three weeks commencing Sept. 9 . . . Our clients are asking for a liberal supply of descriptive literature for advertising purposes in Iran . . . Yours faithfully, Richards Marketing, Ltd." F

It is to be noted that in those letters Richards Marketing, Ltd. referred to the plaintiffs as "our clients", but did not name them. The defendants did not know who they were. The words "our clients" are ambiguous: they might denote that a Persian company were principals to the contract, or alternatively were customers to whom Richards Marketing, Ltd. would re-sell. In these circumstances I think that it was correct for the defendants in the issue to describe the plaintiffs as "undisclosed foreign principals". Their identity was not disclosed. Their existence as principals was not disclosed. G

The plaintiffs, however, were principals to the contract, albeit undisclosed. They employed Richards Marketing, Ltd. as their agents, paying them a commission. The judge said (2):

"... I have no doubt whatsoever that as between the plaintiffs and Richards, Richards acted throughout as the plaintiffs' agents and not as principals." I

I think also that it was correct for the defendants in the issue to state that there was "at no time privity of contract", strictly so called, between them and the plaintiffs. The defendants did not look to the plaintiffs of whom they knew nothing. They looked to Richards Marketing, Ltd. who were the only people they knew. Richards Marketing, Ltd. could, I think, sue and be sued on the

(1) [1968] 1 All E.R. 585.

(2) [1968] 1 All E.R. at p. 589, letter C.

A contract in their own name. They signed the contract in their own name without qualification. They did not add the words "as agent for" or "for and on behalf of" or any of the phrases which exclude personal liability.

Nevertheless, I do not think that on this issue the contention of the defendants is well-founded. It is a well-established rule of English law that an undisclosed principal can sue and be sued on a contract, even though his name and even his

B existence is undisclosed, save in those cases when the terms of the contract expressly or impliedly confine it to the parties to it. This rule is an anomaly, but is justified by business convenience. It has been held so for many years. The only question in the case is whether this rule (that an undisclosed principal can sue and be sued) extends to a case where the principal is a foreigner. In my opinion, the rule applies to a foreign principal just as to an English principal.

C I know that nearly one hundred years ago BLACKBURN, J., used words which have led people to suppose the contrary. In Elbinger Act. für Fabrication von Eisenbahn Materiel v. Claye (3), in 1873, he said (3):

"...yet where a foreigner has instructed English merchants to act for him, I take it that the usage of trade, established for many years, has been that it is understood that the foreign constituent has not authorised the merchants to pledge his credit to the contract, to establish privity between him and the home supplier. On the other hand, the home supplier, knowing that to be the usage, unless there is something in the bargain showing the intention to be otherwise, does not trust the foreigner, and so does not make the foreigner responsible to him, and does not make himself responsible to the foreigner."

E I do not think that that usage of one hundred years ago applies today. Overseas business is conducted very differently now from what it was then. In this case, as in nearly every other case, the foreign buyers opened a bankers' commercial credit, so that the goods were paid for before they left England. On Aug. 22, 1957, the defendants wrote to Richards Marketing, Ltd.:

F "As these compressors are for export we must ask for cash payment before delivery as it is customary for us to have irrevocable credit on the equipment which we export."

In the light of modern usage I think that an undisclosed foreign principal can sue and be sued on a contract, just as an undisclosed English principal can, save, of course, when the contract on its true construction limits it to the English intermediary and excludes a foreign principal. The fact that the principal is a foreigner is an element to be thrown into the scale on construction, but that is all. In the present case there is nothing in the contract to confine it to Richards Marketing, Ltd. I am quite clear that the plaintiffs can sue in their own name on the contract. I agree with the judge on this issue.

H The second issue is this: "what are or were the precise terms of the contract sued upon by the plaintiffs?" This issue resolved itself into a discussion whether there was an implied term that the machines "should be reasonably fit for the purpose of re-sale in Persia as new and unused machines". It was said that this term was to be implied under s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

I Now, as I read this contract, it was a contract for the sale of goods by description. These were air compressors, described as new and unused—described in the catalogue and in the correspondence. There was clearly an implied term that they should comply with the description as set out in s. 13 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

So far as s. 14 (1) is concerned, it is quite clear that the buyers made known to the sellers that they were required for re-sale in Persia. In the letter of Aug. 10, 1967, Richards Marketing, Ltd. wrote to the defendants:

"We have now received provisional estimates for packing these units singly suitable for shipment to Khorranshahr, and cross-country transit."

Khorranshahr, as far as I understand it, is in Persia. Then in the letter of Aug. 19, 1957, they wrote: "Our clients are asking for a liberal supply of descriptive literature for advertising purposes in Iran." So that it is quite clear that the plaintiffs made known to the defendants that they required them for re-sale in Persia. A

The section of the Act of 1893, however, contains a further requirement before a condition is implied. The particular purpose might be made known to the seller so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment. The judge held that, once the purpose was made known, there was an inference that the buyer relied on the seller's skill and judgment. He quoted (4) some of the speeches in the case of Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (5). That case has, however, in the last few days, been considered by the House of Lords in Henry Kendall and Sons (a firm) v. William Lillico & Sons, Ltd. (6). Lord REID said (7): B

"I do not think that this case [Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (5)] is any authority for the view, which has sometimes been expressed that, if the seller knows the purpose for which the buyer wants the goods, it will be presumed that the buyer relied on his skill and judgment." C

So the observations in Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (5) have received a knock-out blow. We can revert once more to the Act of 1893. The particular purpose must be made known "so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment". That means that the buyer makes the particular purpose known to the seller in such a way that the seller knows that he is being relied on. That cannot be said here. The defendants here did not know they were being relied on for re-sale in Persia. They knew nothing of conditions in Persia. The plaintiffs knew all about those conditions. The plaintiffs saw the machine here. They read its description. They relied on their own skill and judgment to see that it was suitable for re-sale in Persia and not on the defendants. At all events, they did not make the purpose known to the defendants in such circumstances as to show him that they relied on the defendants' skill and judgment. So I do not think that there was an implied term that they should be fit for the purpose of being re-sold in Persia. So on this point I differ from the judge and I would allow the appeal accordingly. I say nothing as to how the knowledge might affect the measure of damages; that is a matter which is not before us. I would therefore affirm the judge (8) on the first issue and reverse him on the second. D

DIPLOCK, L.J.: I will deal first with the agency issue. In determining who is entitled to sue or liable to be sued on a contract, a useful starting point, where the contract is in writing, is to look at the contract. In doing so a number of elementary principles should be borne in mind. The first is that a person may enter into a contract through an agent whom he has actually authorised to enter into the contract on his behalf or whom he has led the other party to believe that he has so authorised. We are concerned here, however, only with actual authority. Where an agent has such actual authority and enters into a contract with another party intending to do so on behalf of his principal, it matters not whether he discloses to the other party the identity of his principal, or even that he is contracting on behalf of a principal at all, if the other party is willing or leads the agent to believe that he is willing to treat as a party to the contract anyone on whose behalf the agent may have been authorised to contract. In the case of an ordinary commercial contract such willingness of the other party may be assumed by the agent unless either the other party manifests his unwillingness, or there are other circumstances which should lead the agent to realise that the other party was not so willing. E

(8) [1968] 1 All E.R. 585.

A Whether the agent was actually authorised to enter into a particular contract on behalf of a particular principal depends on what passed between the agent and the principal. In the present case the judge has found as a fact that the plaintiffs did authorise Richards Marketing, Ltd. to enter on the plaintiffs' behalf into the contract on which they now sue; and that is no longer contested.

B Whether the agent did make a contract on behalf of his principal with the other party depends on the intention of the agent and what passed between him and the other party. The judge has found as a fact (9) that Richards Marketing, Ltd. did intend to enter on behalf of the plaintiffs into the contract with the defendants on which the plaintiffs now sue. Richards Marketing, Ltd. did not disclose the identity of the plaintiffs as their principal. The issue is whether the defendants were willing or led Richards Marketing, Ltd. to believe that they were

C willing to treat as a party to the contract anyone on whose behalf Richards Marketing, Ltd. were in fact authorised to contract.

One looks, therefore, at the contract. It is contained in correspondence. The important letters are three: an offer by Richards Marketing, Ltd. of Aug. 10; a counter-offer by the defendants of Aug. 17; and an acceptance of the counter-offer by Richards Marketing, Ltd. of Aug. 19, 1957. The relevant passages in

D the letters are as follows. In the letter of Aug. 10:

“Dear Sirs, Dorman/Air Pumps Mobile Compressors . . . We have been in communication with our clients and have been instructed to put forward an offer to purchase twelve units at £300 each delivered London packers exclusive of any form of packing and to proceed immediately with shipment of the first two units. We shall be obliged to have your acceptance to this

E giving us an approximate date for the earliest delivery.”

On the construction of the letters, that offer appears to me to be an offer made on behalf of a principal whose identity is not disclosed; or, at least, it made it clear that Richards Marketing, Ltd. might be acting on behalf of an unidentified principal. The relevant passage in the letter of Aug. 17 is this:

F “Dear Sirs, Dorman/Air Pumps Mobile Compressors. Many thanks for your letter of Aug. 10. We are sorry for the delay in replying to your letter but we have been going into your offer very carefully. Our best offer is twelve units delivered free to your packers (London) for the sum of £340 each. Delivery could be arranged at the rate of two per week.”

That letter disclosed no unwillingness on the part of the defendants to contract with Richards Marketing, Ltd. on behalf of the unnamed client on whose behalf they had put forward the offer. What it was was a counter-offer to sell at a higher price, namely, £340. The relevant passage in the letter of acceptance of that counter-offer of Aug. 19, is as follows:

G

H “Dear Sirs, Thank you for your letter dated Aug. 17, and we note it is not possible for you to entertain a reduction beyond that originally envisaged. However, we now have pleasure in confirming our acceptance as follows:—Twelve—Dorman diesel 4 cyl. 4DWD engines coupled to Air Pumps V twin type T.S. 20 complete 156 C.f.m. at 100-lbs. p.s.i. Compressor new and unused on bedplate with removable 5/6 tons 900 × 16 pneumatic tyred trailer, internal expanding brakes, hand brake, timken roller bearings, semi-elliptic road springs, mudguards, etc. equal to new, delivered London packers

I at £340 each.”

I have read the description at length because the contract terms are relevant to the second issue. The relevant passage in the other part of the letter is this:

“Our clients are asking for a liberal supply of descriptive literature for advertising purposes in Iran and we shall be obliged to say forty copies of illustrated matter.”

The reference to "our clients" is clearly a reference to the clients referred to in the letter of Aug. 10, who are said in that letter to have instructed Richard Marketing, Ltd. to put forward an offer to purchase the goods. That letter is an acceptance of the counter-offer. There is thus nothing in the contract itself which manifests the unwillingness of the defendants to enter into the contract with the principals of Richards Marketing, Ltd. whoever they might be. What is relied on, however, is the circumstance that the principal was a foreigner. It is said that that should have led Richards Marketing, Ltd. to realise that the defendants were not willing to enter into a contract with the plaintiffs because the plaintiffs were foreigners.

Reliance for this is placed on the observations of BLACKBURN, J., in Elbinger Act. für Fabrication von Eisenbahn Materiel v. Claye (10) of which the relevant part is as follows:

"I quite agree that a man may, as agent, make a contract upon such terms as not only to bind himself but also so as to bind the principal; in other words, so that the principal shall be party to the contract, and may then either sue or be sued... But although such a contract may be where the principals are English; yet where a foreigner has instructed English merchants to act for him, I take it that the usage of trade, established for many years, has been that it is understood that the foreign constituent has not authorised the merchants to pledge his credit to the contract, to establish privity between him and the home supplier. On the other hand, the home supplier, knowing that to be the usage, unless there is something in the bargain showing the intention to be otherwise, does not trust the foreigner, and so does not make the foreigner responsible to him, and does not make himself responsible to the foreigner."

BLACKBURN, J., was really dealing with two usages which he considered (for the suggestion came from him, not from counsel) were current in 1873: the first a usage existing between English merchants and foreign principals, viz., that foreign principals did not authorise English merchants to enter into contracts on their behalf. The second usage, which was a consequence of the knowledge by English merchants of the first, is a usage between English merchants that unless an English merchant states the contrary, he is not willing to enter into a contract with a foreigner through an English agent.

I agree entirely with DONALDSON, J. (11) that commercial usages are far from immutable. For my part I find it difficult to see how even in 1873 there can have been the first usage. For the authority conferred on the English merchant must have depended on the terms of the contract of agency made between him and his foreign principal of which the proper law may be other than English law. Conflict of laws was not, however, in the forefront of the judicial mind in 1873. Anyway I am confident that there is no such usage today. The reason for the second usage has accordingly vanished, and I have no doubt that it too has disappeared. I agree with DONALDSON, J. (12), that the fact that the principal is a foreigner is one of the circumstances to be taken into account in determining whether or not the other party to the contract was willing, or led the agent to believe that he was willing, to treat as a party to the contract the agent's principal, and, if he was so willing, whether the mutual intention of the other party and the agent was that the agent should be personally entitled to sue and liable to be sued on the contract as well as his principal. It is, however, only one of many circumstances, and as respects the creation of privity of contract between the other party and the principal its weight may be minimal, particularly in a case such as the present where the terms of payment are cash before delivery and no credit is extended by the other party to the principal. It may have considerably more weight in determining whether the mutual intention of the other party and the agent was that the agent should be personally liable to be sued as well

A as the principal, particularly if credit has been extended by the other party; but we are not concerned with that issue here.

I agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that there is nothing in the contract or in the circumstances which leads to the conclusion that the defendants were not willing to enter into the contract with the plaintiffs as the actual principals of Richards Marketing, Ltd., or that being so willing, they nevertheless did not

B do so. On the agency issue I would dismiss this appeal.

The contractual terms issue arises in a highly artificial form. The task of the court in construing any contract is to look at the words used in the contract and at what has passed between the contracting parties before it was made, and to determine what it was that the party alleged to be in breach, by the words of the contract and his conduct, induced the other party to believe he was accept-

C ing a legally enforceable obligation to do or to refrain from doing. Nevertheless the fact that the law about contracts for the sale of goods has been codified so as to specify what, in the absence of express words to the contrary in the contract itself, one contracting party would reasonably be induced to believe the other contracting party was accepting a legally enforceable obligation to do or refrain from doing, by his use of particular kinds of expressions in the contract and by particular matters passing between them, has resulted in these expressions and these matters being set out in separate sections or subsections of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, as if they gave rise to separate and unrelated obligations. This is, of course, not the case. For instance, the description of the goods which is dealt with by s. 13 may well be by reference to the particular purpose for which the buyer requires them, which is dealt with by s. 14 (1).

E The habit persists, however, and has been adopted in this case of pleading the obligations of which the party sued is alleged to be in breach as if they arose from separate and distinct undertakings; and in this particular case there have been alleged as separate and distinct undertakings, first, that the goods should comply with the description as to being new and unused; and, secondly, that they should be reasonably fit for the purpose of being re-sold in Persia as new

F and unused machines. The second undertaking differs from the first only if the goods, although in fact new and unused, would not be reasonably fit for re-sale as such in Persia, and this could only be so if there were some peculiarity about the market for machines of this description in Persia which does not exist in England. I will assume that the issue intended to be decided as the contractual terms issue was whether or not the defendants undertook that if there was such a

G peculiarity about the market for machines of this description in Persia, the machines supplied would not only be new and unused but would also satisfy the peculiarity.

There is not a word in the contract to suggest that the defendants undertook anything of the sort. The plaintiffs' case is based solely on the fact that Richards Marketing, Ltd., their agents, informed the defendants that their principals required the machines for re-sale in Persia. It is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that s. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, makes this fact of itself sufficient to give rise to the undertaking that the machines would be fit for that purpose in addition to being new and unused; and reliance is placed on the speech of LORD BUCKMASTER in Manchester Liners, Ltd. v. Rea, Ltd. (13), where he said:

I "If goods are ordered for a special purpose, and that purpose is disclosed to the vendor so that in accepting the contract he undertakes to supply goods which are suitable for the object required, such a contract is, in my opinion, sufficient to establish that the buyer has shown that he relies on the seller's skill and judgment."

The plaintiffs, I am sorry to say, also relied on some observations of my own in the case of Mash & Murrell, Ltd. v. Joseph I. Emmanuel, Ltd. (14), which, though I think that they were correct in the context of that case, where the description of the goods was generic, were expressed with incautious wideness. A

(13) [1922] All E.R. Rep. at p. 607; [1922] 2 A.C. at p. 79.

Of course, in many cases, particularly where the description by which the goods are bought is a wide one, as it was in Mash & Murrell, Ltd. v. Joseph I. Emmanuel, Ltd. (15) the communication by the buyer to the seller of the purpose for which he requires the goods is sufficient to show to the buyer that he relies on the seller's skill or judgment, for there is no other reason why the buyer should make known his purpose to the seller. Where a foreign merchant, however, buys by description goods, not for his own use, but for re-sale in his own country, of which he has no reason to suppose the English seller has any special knowledge, it flies in the face of common sense to suppose that he relies on anything but his own knowledge of the market in his own country and his own commercial judgment as to what is saleable there. To hold the contrary would mean that whenever anyone known by the seller to be a foreign merchant bought from a seller in England goods for sale in his own country there would rise automatically an undertaking on the part of the seller, unless he expressly disclaimed it, that the goods would be suitable for sale in the market of which the foreign buyer knew everything and he, the seller, knew nothing. With great respect, that would be nonsense. It only piles nonsense on nonsense in the present case to add that the plaintiffs, to the knowledge of the sellers, actually insisted on themselves inspecting a machine of the description which they subsequently ordered before authorising Richards Marketing, Ltd. to enter into the contract. B

I agree with LORD DENNING, M.R., that the appeal on the contractual issue should be allowed. C

SACHS, L.J.: As regards the agency issue, once counsel for the defendants had conceded that he could not challenge the findings of the trial judge (16) that the plaintiffs at the material time were principals of Richards Marketing, Ltd. ("Richards") and that the latter had authority to enter into contracts such as that now under consideration, the issue for decision became simplified and compact. Were the terms of the contractual documents passing between Richards and the defendants such as to exclude the plaintiffs from being able to sue the defendants or to be sued by them on the contract that was made? Otherwise the plaintiffs are entitled to sue the defendants by virtue of the general rule, stated by LORD DENNING, M.R., that normally a principal can always step in and enforce the contract if his name was unmentioned or even if his existence was undisclosed at the time the contract was made. (In so far as any question arises whether in this case the plaintiffs were what is termed unnamed, or, on the other hand, undisclosed principals, for my part I take the view that the letter of Aug. 10, which has been read out by DIPLOCK, L.J., makes them in this case unnamed rather than undisclosed principals.) D

In approaching the question whether on these particular documents such an exclusion was effected it is convenient and correct to subdivide the issue by seeking answers to two sub-questions: first, would the requisite privity of contract have been excluded if Richards' principals had been a firm carrying on business in England? Secondly, should the answer turn out to be that there was no exclusion, then does it make any difference that Richards' principals in fact carried on business in Persia? E

The first is one of the construction of particular documents. It raises no special point of law, and I agree with my lords that the answer to that question is that there was no exclusion on the face of those documents. F

On the second I agree that in determining whether the exclusion can be established the courts ought to take into account, as part of the totality of the circumstances, the fact that the principal was a foreign one, but that no presumption of exclusion can be founded on that fact alone. The presumption which G

A at one time existed no longer exists, because, as DONALDSON, J., said (17), the usages of the law merchant are not immutable. In determining the intention of the parties on this point the modern approach was aptly stated by PRITCHARD, J., in J. S. Holt & Moseley (London), Ltd. v. Sir Charles Cunningham & Partners (18) where he said:

B “The intention of the parties can only be ascertained from the facts as proved in evidence, and the nationality and whereabouts of the principal is no more and no less than one of the facts to which such weight will be given as in any particular case the court thinks proper.”

As the years go by many factors change in relation to estimating the intention of the parties. For instance, the system of credits is constantly changing, as my lords have already stated: and as reciprocity in the enforcement of judgments between nationals of this country and nationals of the other country develops and becomes more effective, the weight of the fact that the principal is foreign has diminished and no doubt will continue to diminish further as new factors, such as the scope of Government inspired guarantees, evolve. In any given case it may, as DONALDSON, J., said (19), already be minimal; but it is not always necessarily minimal. For instance, the weight may vary according to the country in which the principal carries on his business. There may be differences between cases where the country is one with little civilisation or no really effective legal system, and cases concerning countries such as those which are members of the E.E.C. Suffice it to say that in the present case the weight to my mind to be attached to the principals being from Persia was minimal. It did not in any shape or sense out-weigh the other factors which have been mentioned by my lords; and for that reason I agree that the appeal on that issue should be dismissed.

E As regards the contractual issue I agree also that the appeal succeeds, but I found my agreement on a relatively narrow ground relating to the particular facts of the case. I would make it clear that I see no reason why a buyer may not be able to establish on the same set of facts that he has concurrent rights under the provisions of s. 14 (1) and s. 14 (2), and for that matter s. 13 (2), of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Many laborious years of pleading Sale of Goods Act cases would lead me to the conclusion that it is right to set out each of the facts relating to the particular subsection on which one relies and to make it clear that one is relying on that subsection. To take an instance in relation to s. 14 (1) and (2), artificial silk sold as such under a contract made when the seller knows it is required to be made into dresses may attract warranties under both subsections, with different results as regards damages according to whether one or the other or both are found to be broken.

For my part I see no reason why the contract for the goods now under consideration could not in law attract warranties under both subsections merely because of their description, and I doubt very much whether the terms of that section bring the compressors, as was suggested at one stage in the argument in this court, into the territory of the Chanter v. Hopkins (20) inspired proviso to s. 14 (1), which relates to patents and trade names. Indeed I observe from the tenor of the judgment of the trial judge that no attempt appears to have been made in the courts below to assert that the compressors fell within that proviso.

I Nevertheless before a buyer can establish that he is entitled to rely on s. 14 (1) one has to examine closely the “particular purpose” on which his case is founded to see if the vendor’s skill and judgment can reasonably be said to have been relied on. Thus the buyer who asks for lawn seed saying it is for his own lawn cannot, if the seed is fit for normal lawns but not for his particular lawn, rely on s. 14 (1) merely because his own lawn has some peculiar characteristic known only to him, unless he has made known that characteristic to the seller in circumstances which would bring into force the subsection. In this particular case the defendants could not be expected to know the special characteristics or, as DIPLOCK, L.J., put it, peculiarities, of the Persian market for mobile air compressors. Nor were they told about them. So that to my mind, too, they cannot be held to have given a warranty under s. 14 (1). Indeed, the evidence, when taken as a whole, shows that the plaintiffs must have relied on their own skill and judgment. A

I would wish to reserve my views as to other points raised in the course of argument in connexion with this subsection; and, not least, I would be anxious not to say anything which might cast any doubt on a line of reasoning to which LORD REID referred at another stage in his opinion in Henry Kendall & Sons (a firm) v. William Lillico & Sons, Ltd. (21) I refer to that part where he cited Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills, Ltd. (22) in reference to the relations which will in general be inferred from the fact that the buyer goes to a shop in confidence that the tradesman has selected his stock with skill and judgment, and to the fact that the main inducement to go to a good retail shop is the expectation that the tradesman will have rightly bought goods of reliable make. LORD REID approved of that line of reasoning when he said (23): C

“A shopkeeper’s goodwill consists largely in the reputation of being reliable—the better the shop the easier it is to draw this inference.”

It is for that reason that I say nothing about whether presumptions may arise when a particular purpose is made known to a vendor, but have confined my judgment to the point with which I have specifically dealt. I would for the above reasons allow the appeal as regards the contractual issue. E

LORD PEARSON: John Arthur Buckland, who died in 1931, had by his will left a share of his residuary estate in trust primarily for his daughter Mrs. Rita Buckland Thompson. The will provided that the trustees were to invest the share, and to pay the income to her during her life, and after her death to hold the share on certain trusts in favour of her children and subject to those trusts (which failed because she had no child) to "hold such share and the income thereof in trust for such person or persons for such purposes and in such manner in all respects as such daughter shall by will or codicil appoint". The trustees set aside and appropriated certain assets of the estate to answer Mrs. Thompson's share or interest in the estate, and duly held them on the trusts of the will. Mrs. Thompson who died in 1965, had by her will provided inter alia as follows:

"If my husband the said Cecil Wolsey Curtis Thompson shall be living one month after my death I devise and bequeath to him the whole of my real and personal estate including all property over which I have a power of appointment under the will of my late father the late John Arthur Buckland."

Cecil Wolsey Curtis Thompson was living one month after the death of his wife and is still living. Accordingly the assets which have been mentioned passed to him under the appointment contained in her will.

She died domiciled in New South Wales. At the time of her death the assets comprised certain items of property of comparatively small value situate in New South Wales and shareholdings valued at $288,167.43 situate outside New South Wales (being partly in Victoria and partly in Australian Capital Territory).

The appellants, who are the executors and trustees of the will of Mrs. Thompson, admit liability for death duty in respect of the items of property situate in New South Wales. The question at issue in this appeal relates to the shareholdings situate outside New South Wales. The respondent contends that they do, and the appellants contend that they do not, form part of the estate of Mrs. Thompson for the purpose of the assessment and payment of death duty thereon.

In para. 20 of the Stated Case, which came before the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, the questions to be decided were:

"1. Whether the said sum of $288,167.43 was for the purposes of the assessment and payment of death duty properly included in the final balance of the dutiable estate of Rita Buckland Thompson?

"2. If the answer to question 1 is in the negative whether any part, and if so, what part of the said sum of $288,167.43 was properly so included?

"3. How should the costs of this Stated Case be borne and paid?"

The Court of Appeal deciding in favour of the respondent's contention, answered the first question "Yes" and the third question "By the appellants". On the view which they took on the first question, the second question did not arise.

The principal factors to be taken into account in this appeal stand out clearly. Mrs. Thompson died domiciled in New South Wales. The assets with which this appeal is concerned were situate outside New South Wales at the time of her death. She had in respect of those assets a general power of appointment under the will of her father. She exercised the power in favour of her husband by her own will.

The relevant statutory provisions are contained in the Stamp Duties Act, 1920-65, of New South Wales, and are as follows:

"100. . . . 'Disposition of property' means— . . . (b) the creation of any trust; . . .

" 'General power of appointment' includes any power or authority which enables the donee or other holder thereof, or would enable him if he were of full capacity, to appoint or dispose of any property, or to charge any sum of

A money upon any property, as he thinks fit for his own benefit, whether exercisable by instrument inter vivos or by will or otherwise, but does not include any power exercisable by any person in a fiduciary capacity for the benefit of others only arising under a disposition not made by himself, or exercisable as tenant for life under Part IV of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1898, or as mortgagee."

B "101. In the case of every person who dies after the passing of this Act, whether in New South Wales or elsewhere, and wherever the deceased was domiciled, duty hereinafter called death duty, at the rate mentioned in the Third Schedule to this Act shall be assessed and paid—(a) upon the final balance of the estate of the deceased, as determined in accordance with this Act . . ."

C "102. For the purposes of the assessment and payment of death duty but subject as hereinafter provided, the estate of a deceased person shall be deemed to include and consist of the following classes of property—

D "(1) (a) All property of the deceased which is situate in New South Wales at his death. And in addition where the deceased was domiciled in New South Wales all personal property of the deceased situate outside New South Wales at his death; . . .

E "(2) (a) All property which the deceased has disposed of, whether before or after the passing of this Act, by will or by a settlement containing any trust in respect of that property to take effect after his death, including a will or settlement made in the exercise of any general power of appointment, whether exercisable by the deceased alone or jointly with another person; provided that the property deemed to be included in the estate of the deceased shall be the property which at the time of his death is subject to such trust . . . (j) Any property over or in respect of which the deceased had at the time of his death a general power of appointment . . .

F "(2A) All personal property situate outside New South Wales at the death of the deceased when—(a) the deceased dies after the commencement of the Stamp Duties (Amendment) Act, 1939; and (b) the deceased was, at the time of his death domiciled in New South Wales; and (c) such personal property would, if it had been situate in New South Wales, be deemed to be included in the estate of the deceased by virtue of the operation of para. (2) of this section."

G The general scheme of s. 102 is plain. Paragraph (1) applies to the actual property of the deceased, i.e., property actually belonging to him at the time of his death. Under this paragraph the dutiable estate includes all such property situate in New South Wales at the time of his death, and also includes such property then situate outside New South Wales if it is personal property and he was then domiciled in New South Wales. Paragraph (2) applies to various categories of what may conveniently be called "notional" property of the deceased, including in certain cases property disposed of by him. This para. (2) has been interpreted consistently with the language of para. (2A) (c) as applying only to property situate in New South Wales at the time of the death (Johnson v. Comr. of Stamp Duties (1)). Then para. (2A) brings into the dutiable estate "notional" property of the deceased situate outside New South Wales at the time of his death, if he was then domiciled in New South Wales.

I The respondent claims that the assets with which this appeal is concerned should be included in the dutiable estate under either or both of the sub-paras. (a) and (j) in s. 102 (2) as applied by s. 102 (2A) to property situate outside New South Wales at the death of the deceased. If the respondent has a valid claim under sub-para. (a), it will not be necessary to consider his claim under sub-para. (j).

The first point argued in this appeal is one of construction. Does s. 102 (2) (a)

on its true construction apply to this case? The appellants contend that it does not. The contention was not put forward in the Court of Appeal, but was allowed to be put forward in the argument of the present appeal, because it had been set out in the appellants' case, and it is matter simply of law and no evidence could have affected it, and it is within the scope of the first question to be decided as set out in para. 20 of the stated case (2). A

The appellants' contention is that in the sub-paragraph (s. 102 (2) (a)) the words "containing any trust in respect of that property to take effect after his death" qualify the word "will" as well as the word "settlement"; that therefore the words "such trust" in the proviso refer to a trust contained in the will or the settlement, as the case may be; that therefore the sub-paragraph has no application to a disposition by will unless the property disposed of was at the time of the death subject to a trust to take effect after the death; and that in the present case Mrs. Thompson's exercise of her power of appointment in favour of her husband by her will either did not create any trust or created only a trust coming into operation one month after the death, so that the property was not "subject to such trust" at the time of the death, as required by the proviso. B

There may be some difficulty or uncertainty affecting the last step in the argument, but there is no need to come to a decision on that point, because the argument fails at an earlier stage for several reasons. First, according to the proper grammatical construction of the sub-paragraph the words "containing any trust in respect of that property to take effect after his death", are to be read with and qualify only the words "by a settlement". If the intention had been to make the qualification apply to a will as well as a settlement, the appropriate wording would have been "by a will or settlement containing...". C
Secondly, it is unnecessary to refer to anything in a will taking effect after the death because everything in a will must take effect after the death. Thirdly, in Rabett v. Comr. of Stamp Duties (3) their lordships' board held that the true interpretation of the sub-paragraph was to construe the qualifying words as applying only to the settlement. The sub-paragraph in the form in which they were considering it is set out in their judgment (4), and it has not been changed subsequently. Fourthly, however, counsel for the respondent referred to an earlier version of the provision as it was in s. 49 (2) of Act No. 27 of 1898: D

"Duties to be levied, collected and paid according to the duties mentioned in the said third schedule shall also be charged and chargeable upon and in respect of—

"(A) all estate, whether real or personal— E

"(a) which any person, dying after the twenty-second day of May, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, has disposed of, whether before or after that date, by will or by settlement containing any trust in respect of that estate to take effect after his death, under any authority enabling that person to dispose of the same by will or deed, as the case may be;" F

In that early version of the provision there was no proviso. In the absence of a proviso there would be no reason at all for reading the qualification as applying to anything except the settlement. The addition of the proviso cannot reasonably be considered to have altered the construction of the main provision: it refers to "such trust", which is the trust contained in a settlement. G

The other point argued on behalf of the appellants was that the sub-paragraph (s. 102 (2) (a)) as applied by para. (2A), in so far as it purports to cover a disposition of property situate outside New South Wales by the exercise of a general power of appointment, is invalid on the ground that there is no relevant territorial nexus with New South Wales. H

A In the words of the Supreme Court in Johnson's case (5), quoted by their lordships in their judgment (6):

B “The legislature of New South Wales is a subordinate legislature. Its powers are to be found in the Constitution Act, 1902, (7), s. 5 of which, so far as material, provides that: ‘The legislature shall subject to the provisions of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act have power to make laws for the peace, welfare, and good government of New South Wales in all cases whatsoever’. Legislation on any subject-matter which has no relevant territorial connexion whatever with New South Wales falls outside the power of the legislature of New South Wales (see A.-G. v. Australian Agricultural Co. (8) and Comr. of Stamp Duties (New South Wales) v. Millar (9)).”

C For the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a relevant territorial connexion the scope of possible relevancy is wide. In Broken Hill South, Ltd. v. Comr. of Taxation (New South Wales) (10) in the High Court of Australia, Dixon, J., said (11):

D “The power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of a State does not enable the State Parliament to impose by reference to some act, matter or thing occurring outside the State a liability upon a person unconnected with the State whether by domicile, residence or otherwise. But it is within the competence of the State legislature to make any fact, circumstance, occurrence or thing in or connected with the territory the occasion of the imposition upon any person concerned therein of a liability to taxation or of any other liability. It is also within the competence of the legislature to base the imposition of liability on no more than the relation of the person to the territory. The relation may consist in presence within the territory, residence, domicile, carrying on business there, or even remoter connexions. If a connexion exists, it is for the legislature to decide how far it should go in the exercise of its powers.”

F Nevertheless it appears from decided cases that there is no “relevant territorial connexion” if the connexion with the territory of New South Wales is too slight. There is an element of degree involved.

G In Comr. of Stamp Duties (New South Wales) v. Millar (9) it was held by the majority of the High Court of Australia that provisions purporting to authorise the inclusion in the dutiable estate of a person, dying resident and domiciled out of New South Wales, of shares held by him in a company incorporated out of and having no share register within that State, but which carried on the business of mining within the State, were in excess of the power of the legislature of New South Wales.

H In Johnson's case (12) the provision under consideration was s. 102 (2) (g), as applied by para. (2A) to property outside New South Wales. Sub-paragraph (g) provides for inclusion in the dutiable estate of any property in which the deceased or any other person had an estate or interest limited to cease on the death of the deceased or at any time determined by reference to the death of the deceased . . . to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by cesser of the limited interest . . . to or for the benefit of a person entitled to an estate or interest in the property in remainder or reversion expectant on the determination of the limited interest. If para. (2A) is to apply, the domicile of the deceased must have been in New South Wales. But all other relevant persons and things (for instance the reversioners or remaindermen, the property concerned, the creation of the trust and the law governing its creation and execution) might be outside New South Wales. Also there would not, or might not be any relevant disposition by the deceased. In the judgment of your lordships' board there is this passage (13):

"The case is not that of a deceased dying possessed of personal estate, or a case of a deceased who has given away property shortly before his death without valuable consideration. The deceased's only interest was a limited interest ceasing on her death, and it is not her estate that is brought into charge. If the presence of the property in the state at the death of the deceased is lacking, every other incident, or circumstance, associated with the limited interest may also find its place, as has already been exemplified, outside New South Wales. The domicile of a deceased within New South Wales at the date of his death is, in their lordships' judgment, a quite insufficient ground by itself to make good the lack of any other connexion with the State. In the succinct language of the Supreme Court: 'The case may be exemplified as being one in which a duty is levied on or in respect of the property of A because of the domicile in the jurisdiction of B'."

The last two sentences in that passage should be understood in relation to the sub-paragraph which was there under consideration (i.e., sub-para. (g) as applied by para. (2A)) and not as necessarily applying generally in relation to all the sub-paragraphs in s. 102 (2).

There are, however, in the present case two material elements of territorial connexion in addition to the domicile of Mrs. Thompson in New South Wales. First, being so domiciled she had in respect of the property a general power of appointment and she could have exercised it for her own benefit in a number of ways. Secondly, being so domiciled, she did in fact exercise the power and thereby she made a disposition of the property.

There are numerous judgments both in Australian and in English cases explaining the position of property subject to a general power of appointment, when the power is exercised, and the reasons for including "notional" property in a dutiable estate. It will be sufficient to cite passages from one English and one Australian case.

In Comr. of Stamp Duties v. Stephen (14), LORD LINDLEY said (15):

"The distinction between a person's own property and property which is not his own, but which he can dispose of by will in any way he pleases by virtue of a power conferred upon him, is well established. Such last-mentioned property is not his own in any proper sense; and even if he executes the power by his will, no probate duty is payable upon that property unless such duty is made payable by a statute so worded as clearly to comprehend it. A statute imposing duty on a testator's property generally is not sufficient for this purpose. This was finally settled in Drake v. A.-G. (16) affirming Platt v. Routh (17).

"But it has long been settled that property appointed by will under a general power of appointment is subject to the payment of the appointor's debts: Beyfus v. Lawley (18); and if such property is personal property, it is equitable assets of the testator which his executor can claim for distribution in the proper order: see Re Hoskin's Trusts (19) and Re Lawley (20). Notwithstanding, therefore, the difference between a person's own property and property which he can dispose of as he pleases and does dispose of, although it is not his own, the distinction is one which the legislature can hardly be expected to recognise when imposing probate or other duties

A payable on the death of a person who has exercised his power of disposition. Accordingly, modern Acts imposing such duties are almost always, if not always, so framed as to include both classes of property; and this is reasonable and just."

In Grey v. Federal Comr. of Taxation (21), RICH, J., said (22):

B "A taxing Act, generally speaking, is aimed at obtaining a subvention to the treasury at the expense of the citizen either on some occasion when the citizen is found with replenished resources or in respect of his possession of property. Among such Acts those imposing death duties are usually concerned with the transmission of property on death. In order to prevent resort to gifts and dispositions inter vivos on the part of men of property who manifest more benevolence to their offspring or other claimants on their bounty than interest in the budgets of their country some provision is almost invariably included in such Acts whereby property, the subject of the gift, is treated as comprehended in the deceased's estate: cf. Horsfall v. Comr. of Taxes (Victoria) (23). Further, as a general power of appointment enables the donee of the power to dispose of property as if it were his own, it is usual to levy duty upon property subject to such power as if it were part of the estate passing upon death. Section 8 (3) (a) by the bracketed words reaches after property devolving upon the exercise of a general power."

In the same case DIXON, J., said (24):

E "It is quite clear why it was thought proper to include in the dutiable estate property over which a testator had exercised a general testamentary power of appointment. It is because the donee of a general power of appointment has a right of disposition which is in many respects the equivalent of property. The power enables him to appoint to himself or his executors. It enables him to devise or bequeath the property subject to the power as freely and effectually as if it were his own. That property becomes subject to his debts as if it were his own estate. He may release the power instead of exercising it. Further, all these things he may do for valuable consideration. A general power immediately arising, therefore, has many practical results which ordinarily flow from the ownership of property. At the same time, in point of law, property subject to a general testamentary power forms no part of the property or assets of the donee of the power and the instrument exercising the power, though in form a will operates rather as the completion of a conveyance than as a testament (In the Goods of Tomlinson (25); O'Grady v. Wilmot (26))."

H It follows from the principles stated in those judgments that the sub-paragraph (s. 102 (2) (a) as applied by para. (2A)) as affecting property outside New South Wales disposed of by the exercise of a general power of appointment by a person domiciled in New South Wales is not lacking in relevant territorial connexion and is valid.

I It is not necessary to consider the details of the definition of "general power of appointment" contained in s. 100. That is only an "including" definition, designed to bring in powers or authorities which might not be within the ordinary meaning of "general power of appointment", and it does not have any application to the present case, where there is a general power of appointment according to the ordinary meaning of the words.

Reference was made to other sections of the Act, especially s. 114, s. 115 and s. 120, relating to payment of the death duties and enforcement of the liability.

UNITED DOMINIONS CORPORATION (JAMAICA), LTD. v. SHOUCAIR. C

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Viscount Dilhorne, Lord Guest, Lord Devlin, Lord Pearce and Lord Pearson), March 20, 21, 25, 26, May 14, 1968.]

Privy Council—Jamaica—Moneylending—Mortgage—Variation of contract—Interest—Rate of interest raised—Increase accepted by mortgagor by letter—No provision in mortgage for raising rate of interest but principal repayable on demand—No written memorandum of variation complying with Moneylending Law—No memorandum in writing of original mortgage necessary—Whether mortgage enforceable without the variation in rate of interest—Moneylending Law of Jamaica (c. 254), s. 8. D

The appellants lent £55,000 to the respondent on a mortgage. The principal was repayable on demand and bore interest at nine per cent. but the mortgage did not provide for raising the rate of interest. The bank rate having been raised by two per cent., the appellants wrote to the respondent that they had to raise the mortgage interest by a corresponding amount. The respondent confirmed acceptance of the increase. By s. 8* of the Moneylending Law no contract for repayment of money lent and no security given was enforceable unless a memorandum in writing containing all the terms of the contract was signed by the borrower before the money was lent or the security was given, and unless a copy of the memorandum was delivered to the borrower. The respondent defaulted in the payment of interest and the appellants gave notice that they would exercise their powers of sale under the mortgage unless principal and interest† were paid by a certain date. On the question whether the original mortgage with interest at nine per cent. remained enforceable, the appellants not seeking on appeal interest at eleven per cent. but only at nine per cent., E

Held: the agreed variation raising the amount of mortgage interest from nine to eleven per cent. did not reveal an intention to rescind the mortgage transaction, and therefore, though the variation was not enforceable for non-compliance with s. 8 of the Moneylending Law, the original mortgage bearing interest at nine per cent. was not rescinded but remained enforceable (see p. 907, letter E, and p. 908, letter F, post). ### Appeal.

D By writ issued in 1962 the present respondent, Michael Mitri Shoucair, sought a declaration that a mortgage made between the respondent and the appellants, United Dominions Corporation (Jamaica), Ltd., dated Apr. 22, 1961, and varied in writing on July 31, 1961 (purporting to be effective as from July 26, 1961), was unenforceable having regard to s. 8 of the Moneylending Law of Jamaica, and the respondent claimed consequential relief. By order of DOUGLAS, J., in the Supreme Court of Jamaica, dated May 13, 1963, the court declared that the mortgage as varied was unenforceable and that it, and the letter of July 31, 1961, confirming the variation, should be cancelled and delivered to the respondent. By order dated Apr. 18, 1966, of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica (LEWIS and HENRIQUES, J.J.; DUFFUS, P., dissenting) the court dismissed the appellants' appeal from the order of DOUGLAS, J. By order dated Sept. 3, 1966, the Court of Appeal in Jamaica gave final leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council.

David Coore, Q.C., R. Mahfood, Q.C. (both of the Jamaica Bar) and Robert S. Alexander for the respondent.

G LORD DEVLIN: This is an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal of Jamaica upholding a decision of the Supreme Court which declared to be unenforceable by reason of s. 8 of the Moneylending Law, a mortgage made between the parties on Apr. 22, 1961, and varied on or after July 26, 1961. The respondent had borrowed £55,000 from the appellant company and this was the principal secured by the mortgage in question. It was repayable on demand and bore interest at nine per cent. The variation, which raised the rate of interest to eleven per cent., was effected by means of a circular letter dated July 31, 1961, which the appellants sent out to their borrowers, including the respondent. The letter said that because of the increase of two per cent. in the bank rate the appellants had to raise their rate by a corresponding amount. They trusted this would only be a temporary measure and requested the borrower to confirm by signing and returning an attached copy of the letter. The respondent did as requested on Sept. 7, 1961.

I There was no provision in the mortgage entitling the appellants to raise the rate of interest to correspond with bank rate. What was proposed in the letter of July 31 was therefore a variation of the mortgage terms, which the borrower might have been expected to reject if it were not for the fact that the debt was repayable on demand. Their lordships have heard argument about whether there was good consideration for the borrower's acceptance of the increased rate. Both the courts below held that there was and their lordships will, without deciding the point, assume this to be correct. On this assumption the matter to be determined by the Board is the effect on the whole transaction of s. 8 of the Moneylending Law. A Section 8 is a provision relating to the formal requirements of the contract of a sort that is well known in the moneylending laws of the Commonwealth. It is in the same terms as s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, in force in the United Kingdom and is as follows:

“ 8. (1) No contract for the repayment by a borrower of money lent to him or to any agent on his behalf after the commencement of this law or for the payment by him of interest on money so lent and no security given by the borrower or by any such agent as aforesaid in respect of any such contract shall be enforceable, unless a note or memorandum in writing of the contract containing the particulars required by this section be made and signed personally by the borrower, and unless a copy thereof be delivered or sent to the borrower within seven days of the making of the contract; and no such contract or security shall be enforceable if it is proved that the note or memorandum aforesaid was not signed by the borrower before the money was lent or before the security was given as the case may be. B

“ (2) The note or memorandum aforesaid shall contain all the terms of the contract, and in particular shall show the date on which the loan is made, the amount of the principal of the loan, and the interest charged on the loan expressed in terms of a rate per centum per annum.” C

In the application of this section to the transaction between the parties, three matters are agreed. First, the section had not on Apr. 22, 1961, any effect on the mortgage of that date because by s. 13 (1) the law does not apply to loans bearing interest at ten per cent. or less (1). Secondly, the variation agreement, if looked at by itself, is rendered unenforceable by s. 8 because it does not contain all the terms of the contract. Thirdly, the variation agreement cannot be saved by reading the letter of July 31 in conjunction with the original mortgage. Apart from any other difficulties, the provisions in s. 8 requiring the note to be signed before the lending and a copy to be sent to the borrower within seven days of the making of the contract, make it impossible for a later document to incorporate terms by reference to an earlier document. What it comes down to is that the only safe way of effectively altering a moneylending contract is to cancel it and start afresh. Accordingly the appellants make no attempt to enforce a mortgage carrying interest at eleven per cent. What they want to do is to enforce the original mortgage at nine per cent.; and whether they can do so or not depends on whether the agreement of variation, itself unenforceable, drags down with it to the same fate the agreement which it was seeking to amend. D

At the root of the problem there lies the concept of unenforceability, first introduced into English law by the Statute of Frauds (1677), and since made use of in a number of other settings, including the Moneylenders Act, 1927. If the statute made the amending contract void and of no effect, there would be no problem at all. An attempt at changing the original contract would have failed altogether and so left it quite untouched; but unenforceability creates only a procedural bar. The substance of the contract is good; yet, although the contract is alive and real, the court will not give effect to it unless its existence can be proved in the way prescribed by the statute. Thus the difficulty about enforcing the original mortgage in this case is that, although itself untouched by the statute, it is no longer the real contract between the parties. In reality, although the statute prevents reality from being proved, there is no longer a mortgage at nine per cent. but one at eleven per cent. Since however the real contract is not evidenced in the way required by the moneylending law, it cannot be enforced. This is the approach made by DOUGLAS, J., in the Supreme Court E

(1) Section 13 (1) provided: “ This law does not apply to— . . . (e) any loan or contract or security for the repayment of money lent at a rate of interest not exceeding ten per centum per annum.” F

A and by LEWIS, J., who gave the leading judgment for the majority in the Court of Appeal.

Another way of arriving at the same result is to treat a variation of a contract as something that necessarily requires the rescission of the old contract and the substitution of a new one. On this view the old contract cannot be enforced because it has been rescinded and the new contract cannot be enforced because B it is not properly evidenced. This was the conclusion reached by the Divisional Court in Williams v. Moss' Empires, Ltd. (2) and adopted by the Court of Appeal in Morris v. Baron & Co. (3). As SANKEY, J., put it in the former case (4):

"The result of varying the terms of an existing contract is to produce, not the original contract with a variation, but a new and different contract."

C The disadvantage of this view is that a minor variation may destroy the effect of the whole of the transaction between the parties. The alternative view, adopted by the House of Lords in Morris v. Baron & Co. (3) and again in British and Beningtons, Ltd. v. North-Western Cachar Tea Co., Ltd. (5) (where LORD SUMNER (6) referred to the former view as possibly correct "as a matter of formal logic") is based on the intention of the parties. They cannot have that which D presumably they wanted, that is, the old agreement as amended; so the court has to make up its mind which comes nearer to their intention—to leave them with an unamended agreement or without any agreement at all. The House answered this question by rejecting the strict view propounded by SANKEY, J. (4), and distinguishing between rescission and variation. If the new agreement reveals an intention to rescind the old, the old goes; and if it does not, the old E remains in force and unamended.

If the principle in Morris v. Baron & Co. (3) applies to this case, the mortgage of Apr. 22 remains in force. The contrary has not been and could not be argued. It would be impossible to contend that a temporary variation in the rate of interest reveals any intention to extinguish the debt and the mortgage. So the question in this appeal is whether the Board should apply to the Moneylending F Law the reasoning which Morris v. Baron & Co. (3) applied to the Statute of Frauds or whether the Board should apply the reasoning which in Morris v. Baron & Co. (3) the House rejected. There is no direct authority on the point. The point could have arisen in Eldridge and Morris v. Taylor (7), but there the lender sought to enforce only the variation and not the original agreement. The case was rightly distinguished on this ground by DUFFUS, P., in the Court G of Appeal.

In their lordships' view the problem—that is, how to handle the consequences of unenforceability—takes the same form under the Moneylending Law as it does under the Statute of Frauds and similar statutes considered in Morris v. Baron & Co. (3). Both the Statute of Frauds and the Moneylending Law are procedural statutes enacting that a contract shall not be enforced unless certain H matters can be proved. The matters are not in the two cases the same in all respects. Both statutes require the production of a note or memorandum containing all the terms of the contract, but the Moneylending Law requires also that the note must be one that was signed by the borrower before the money was lent and one of which a copy was delivered to the borrower within seven days of the making of the contract. These additional requirements do not in their lordships' view alter the nature of the problem. I

The choice before the Board lies between solving the problem by means of what LORD SUMNER (6) called formal logic or solving it by giving effect as far as possible to the intention of the parties as was done in Morris v. Baron & Co. (8). A

 The argument for the respondent assumed rightly that their lordships would accept the guidance offered in Morris v. Baron & Co. (8), unless it could be shown that despite the similarity in the operative parts of the statutes there are underlying differences between them that destroy the value of the guidance.
 There are, however, differences which counsel for the respondent has expounded. B
 Some stem from the differing attitude of the courts which have been more sympathetic to the objects of moneylending legislation than they have to those of the Statute of Frauds. Thus the rule that an estoppel cannot be set up in the face of a statute has not been applied to the Statute of Frauds, but has been applied to moneylending legislation on the ground that the latter reflects a general or social policy which the courts will assist: see Kok Hoong v. Leong
Chcong Kweng Mines, Ltd. (9) per VISCOUNT RADCLIFFE (10). C
 Other differences stem from the fact that the formal requirements of the two statutes are not precisely the same, so that what may be a good note or memorandum for one statute may not be good for the other. The missing link in counsel for the respondent's argument is the one that should connect such differences with the reasoning in Morris v. Baron & Co. (8) and the British and Beningtons' case (11). D
 It is not enough for him to show that there are differences. He must show also that they are such as to make the application of formal logic, which the House rejected as a solution of the problem when it arose out of the Statute of Frauds, appropriate as a solution of the same problem when it arises under the Money-lending Law. None of the differences suggested touch that point. The intention of the parties is just as important in moneylending contracts as in any other.
Cooper v. Zeffert (12) was usefully cited by counsel for the appellants as a case E in which the principle later applied in Morris v. Baron & Co. (8) was applied by the Court of Appeal in England in an action on a bill of sale given as security for a debt. The Board can see no reason for not following Morris v. Baron &
Co. (8).

For these reasons, which are substantially the reasons given by DUFFUS, P., in his dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal, the Board will humbly advise F
 Her Majesty to allow this appeal and to order that the costs of the proceedings in the court below should be paid by the respondent. The respondent must also pay the costs of the proceedings before the Board.

DIAMOND v. GRAHAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Danckwerts, Diplock and Sachs, L.J.J.), March 12, 1968.]

Bill of Exchange—Holder for value—Value given for cheque—Consideration not passing directly between holder and drawer—Whether drawee of cheque deemed holder for value as against drawer—Whether drawer of cheque became a party to it prior to the time when value was given—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 27 (2).

H. asked a friend, D., for the loan of £1,650 urgently. D. agreed to make the loan provided that G. made out a cheque for £1,665 in favour of D. and that this latter cheque was in D.'s possession before the cheque that D. was to draw in favour of H. was presented for payment. D. then drew a cheque in favour of H., the day being a Friday. H. was unable to obtain G.'s cheque on the following Monday, so D. stopped payment of his cheque to H. G.'s cheque for £1,665 was obtained by H. in the course of the Tuesday, and on that day was paid into D.'s bank, D. then authorising payment of his cheque to H. When G. drew the cheque for £1,665 in favour of D., H. had also drawn a cheque for the same amount in favour of G. G.'s cheque to D., and also H.'s cheque to G., were dishonoured. In an action by D. against G. on the cheque for £1,665 the question arose whether D. was deemed as against G., by virtue of s. 27 (2)* of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, to be a holder for value of the bill (viz., the cheque for £1,665), G. contending that the requirement of s. 27 (2) that value should have been given for the bill predicated that valuable consideration should have passed directly between D. and G. On appeal,

Held: there was nothing in s. 27 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which required that value for the bill should have been given directly by the holder (in this case by D.) to another party to the bill (in this case to the drawer G.), as long as value had been given for the cheque (see p. 911, letter F, and p. 912, letter E, post); consideration had been given by D. to H. for the bill, as a result of which D. acquired possession of the bill and thus became the "holder" of it within s. 2 of the Act of 1882, and accordingly D. was deemed to be a holder for value of the cheque for £1,665, G., being a party thereto (viz., the drawer) who became a party prior to the time when value was given (see p. 911, letter G, and p. 912, letters C and G, post).

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal.

By his statement of claim as amended, endorsed on a writ issued on Aug. 16, 1962, the plaintiff, H. R. Diamond, sued the defendant, J. J. Graham, on a cheque, dated July 26, 1960, and drawn by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff, for £1,665, the plaintiff claiming as the holder in due course or the holder for value of the cheque. By a re-amended defence, re-served on July 26, 1967, the defendant admitted that he was the drawer of the cheque for £1,665 and denied that there was consideration for the cheque; the defendant further denied that the plaintiff was ever a holder in due course or a holder for value of the cheque. The action was tried before MEGAW, J., who gave judgment on July 27, 1967, for the plaintiff for £1,665 with interest from July 6, 1966, at six per cent. per annum, this date being the date when leave to amend was given. On the plaintiff's contention under s. 27 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the trial judge held that value was given by the plaintiff for the defendant's cheque for £1,665 in that the plaintiff on obtaining possession of the cheque released payment of his own cheque for £1,650 in favour of a Mr. Herman which cheque, prior to that time, was stopped; and the trial judge further held that the defendant had become a party to the cheque for £1,665, which he had drawn, prior to the time when value was given, within the meaning of the words "prior to such time" in s. 27 (2), with the consequence that the plaintiff was deemed by s. 27 (2) to be a holder for value of the cheque for £1,665.

By notice dated Sept. 6, 1967, the defendant appealed against the order of MEGAW, J., dated July 27, 1967, on the following grounds—(i) that the judge was wrong in law in having held that the defendant was not an accommodation party to the cheque and that the plaintiff had given value to Mr. Herman for the cheque and was therefore holder of the cheque for value, and (ii) that the judge was wrong in law and in fact in holding that the defendant had become a party to the cheque prior to the plaintiff's giving value for it.

A. H. Tibber for the defendant.

H. Lester for the plaintiff.

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: This is an appeal against a judgment of MEGAW, J., given on July 27, 1967, in which he gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £1,665 in an action on a cheque drawn by the defendant, Mr. Graham, for that sum in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. Diamond. A cheque, of course, is just a bill of exchange drawn on a bank in favour of the named person. That is the definition, as s. 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, shows. The cheque was dishonoured, and therefore prima facie the action would not normally admit of any defence; but matters, of course, are not quite so simple as that, or the appeal would never have arisen.

The series of events was this. The date of the cheque was July 26, 1960. It had originally been dated July 22, but the date was altered to July 26. A third person, Mr. Herman, comes into the picture. Mr. Herman was a friend of the plaintiff, and had borrowed money from him from time to time, though the judge rejected a claim that the plaintiff was a moneylender, and no appeal arises on that point.

On Friday, July 22, 1960, Mr. Herman wanted a sum of £1,650 for urgent commitments that he had to meet. He went to the plaintiff and asked him to lend him the sum of £1,650, and the plaintiff said that he would lend him the sum only if on the Monday (July 25) he would procure a cheque from the defendant, Mr. Graham, for £1,665. That was the pre-condition. Two conditions were that the defendant's cheque should be made payable to the plaintiff, and that the defendant's cheque must be in the plaintiff's possession by the time that the plaintiff's cheque was presented. So the plaintiff then drew a cheque to Mr. Herman for £1,650. It turned out that Mr. Herman could not get the cheque from the defendant on the Monday (July 25) because he was not available on that day. So the cheque having been taken to the plaintiff's bank, he stopped the cheque and told the bank manager not to pay it until authorised by him, the plaintiff. On July 26, 1960, Mr. Herman got his cheque from the defendant made out to the plaintiff. The defendant had asked Mr. Herman who was the friend providing him with temporary relief, and he was told the plaintiff's name. So that the cheque was made out to the plaintiff, who then paid it into his bank. Thereupon the plaintiff authorised payment of his cheque in favour of Mr. Herman, and at the suggestion of the bank manager the date was altered to July 26, and initialled by the plaintiff. Unfortunately the defendant's cheque was returned with "effects not cleared" written on it, and it was dishonoured. Apparently the defendant had asked Mr. Herman, so he said, not to present the

A cheque to be specially cleared, but to let it go through in the ordinary manner, which would have taken two or three days, of course, before it came to be presented against the defendant's account. He was very upset to find that it had come home so quickly when the funds which he had expected to meet it apparently had not arrived.

Two points were taken before the judge. One was that the drawing of the cheque was an accommodation, so that it came within the appropriate section of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and did not require consideration. That was negatived by the judge, I think correctly, and has not really been pursued here; and I do not think that the section in question, s. 28 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, can have anything whatever to do with the present case.

Prima facie, of course, a bill of exchange is presumed to be for value, and the onus is on the drawer of the cheque to show that it was not for value; and the discussion which has taken place before us has really revolved round the provisions of s. 27 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides:

"Where value has at any time been given for a bill the holder is deemed to be a holder for value as regards the acceptor and all parties to the bill who became parties prior to such time."

The contention of counsel for the defendant is that the plaintiff was not a holder for value because no value had passed directly between him and the defendant, the drawer; I think that that was the effect of his argument. There is one thing that I have not mentioned, I think that when the defendant drew the cheque in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. Herman drew his own cheque for the amount and gave it to the defendant, but unfortunately Mr. Herman's cheque was dishonoured, and I gather that he has since become bankrupt.

It seems to me that in presenting the argument which he did, counsel for the defendant was giving a meaning to s. 27 (2) which the words do not bear and is not in accordance with the words of that subsection. There is nothing in the subsection which appears to require value to have been given by the holder as long as value has been given for the cheque. The words actually are these:

"Where value has at any time been given for a bill the holder is deemed to be a holder for value as regards the acceptor and all parties to the bill who became parties prior to such time."

In the present case it seems to me that double value was given for the cheque, first of all by Mr. Herman, who gave his own cheque to the defendant in return for the defendant drawing a cheque in favour of the plaintiff, and as it appears to me further value was given by the plaintiff when he thereupon released his cheque to Mr. Herman. Consequently there was clearly value for the cheque given, and therefore the plaintiff was a holder for value. It seems to me, therefore, that the defence fails, the plaintiff succeeds, and the appeal must be dismissed.

It appears to be a very short point, depending entirely on the words of the subsection. Counsel for the defendant founded his argument on the notes contained in BYLES ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE (22nd Edn.) at p. 203; but in my view those notes go beyond the terms of the subsection, and consequently do not produce the result for which counsel contended. Accordingly, in my view the appeal must be dismissed.

DIPLOCK, L.J.: I agree. The point in this case is a very short point which turns on the construction of s. 27 (2) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, read in conjunction with the definitions to be found elsewhere in the Act. Section 27 (2) provides:

"Value" is defined in s. 2 as meaning "valuable consideration". "Valuable consideration " is described in s. 27 (1) as including " Any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract ". Here there clearly passed between the plaintiff and Mr. Herman " consideration sufficient to support a simple contract ". Was that consideration given for a bill? A bill is defined by s. 3 (1) in these terms:

" A bill of exchange is an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer."

Plainly this was a bill, an unconditional order in writing, and it was for the bill that consideration was given to Mr. Herman. " Holder " is defined in s. 2: " ' Holder ' means the payee or indorsee of a bill or note who is in possession of it . . ." The plaintiff was plainly the payee of the bill, who acquired possession of it as the result of the consideration which he gave to Mr. Herman. It seems to me that clearly he falls within all the requirements of the section.

I should add that the defendant became a party to the bill " prior to such time ". Section 21 (3) dealing with delivery, says:

" Where a bill is no longer in the possession of a party who has signed it as drawer . . . a valid and unconditional delivery by him is presumed until the contrary is proved."

Counsel for the defendant has argued, as my lord has said, that one must not read the words of s. 27 (2) in their literal meaning, but subject to a qualification that the subsection applies only where the consideration has passed directly between one party to the bill and another party to the bill. I can see nothing in the authorities which requires that qualification, and I can see nothing in common sense or justice which requires that qualification in circumstances (though they must be rare) such as existed in this case. I too would dismiss the appeal.

SACHS, L.J.: I agree. Not only has the defendant got nowhere near establishing that he did not become a party for value to this cheque, but on the evidence it is abundantly clear to my mind that valuable consideration was given for it within the meaning of s. 27 (1) (a), and in addition that value was given for it within the meaning of s. 27 (2). Accordingly the appeal must be dismissed.

B Trade Mark—Registration—Opposition—Confusion—Contrary to morality—Mark formerly used by opponent in connexion with his business in Czechoslovakian law—No compensation paid—Opponent migrated to Canada—

C Nationalised business began exporting to United Kingdom—Such exporting continued thereafter—Opponent having established similar business in Canada began exporting to United Kingdom in 1960—Canadian exports small in comparison with exports from Czechoslovakian business—Whether Czechoslovakian business entitled to registration of mark—Trade Marks Act, 1938
(1 & 2 Geo. 6 c. 22), s. 11.

The appellants had carried on business in Czechoslovakia, marketing goods in central Europe under a mark "Nova", for some years prior to the D nationalisation of his business in 1948. He alleged that he received no compensation on nationalisation of his business. In 1948 the nationalised business began exporting to England. The appellants went to Canada where he set up a similar business, using the same mark. For the next twelve years the respondents, proprietors of the nationalised business, continued exporting substantial quantities of goods to the United Kingdom. In 1960 the appellants E began exporting goods from Canada to the United Kingdom under the same mark, but the quantity exported by him to the United Kingdom in the period October, 1960, to July, 1962, was small compared with that so exported by the respondents. The respondents applied for registration of the mark under which they exported goods. The appellants objected on the grounds (under s. 11* of the Trade Marks Act, 1938) that registration would be contrary to morality and would cause confusion.

F Held: (i) there being no evidence of the Czechoslovakian nationalisation law and no sufficient clarity concerning the position of the appellants in regard to compensation on nationalisation of his business in Czechoslovakia, the appellants had not established that registration of the mark used by the respondents would be contrary to morality (see p. 916, letter D, post);
G moreover (a) immorality in the context of s. 11 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, must be inherent in the mark itself, and (b) English trade had not been confiscated from the appellants, as his business had not exported to England before nationalisation (see p. 915, letter H, post).

Arthur Fairest, Ltd.'s Application ((1951), 68 R.P.C. 197) applied on (a) above.

H (ii) on the evidence it had not been established that the mark used by the appellants since July, 1960, had acquired a sufficiently substantial reputation to render s. 11 applicable (see p. 916, letter I, post); moreover, as it seemed that the mark had been used for years in connexion with the respondents' goods and had become distinctive of their goods, any confusion arising from the more recent use by the appellants of his similar mark was not a ground for refusing the respondents protection by registration of their
I older mark (see p. 917, letter I, to p. 918, letter A, post).

Originating Motion.

This was a motion on notice, dated Mar. 12, 1968, by way of appeal from a decision, given on Nov. 15, 1967, by assistant registrar R. L. MOORBY, acting for the Registrar of Trade Marks, directing that the application of the respondents, Stredoceska Fruta Narodni Podnik, a Czechoslovakian corporation of Mochov, Czechoslovakia, for the registration of the trade mark "Nova" in Class 29 in respect of "preserved gherkins, sauerkraut and tomato purée, all being canned" should proceed to registration. The appellant, V. J. Fejteck, who opposed the registration, was the managing director and general manager of Canada Foods Ltd., Kentville, Nova Scotia, and prior to 1948 had been the proprietor of a business in Czechoslovakia which marketed preserved pickles, vegetables, fruit and the like, using the mark "Nova". In 1948 the appellant's Czechoslovakian business had been nationalised under law of the Czechoslovak government, and thereafter was vested in the respondents, which in 1948 began exporting, and had thereafter continued to export, to the United Kingdom under the same mark "Nova". May 30. PLOWMAN, J., read the following judgment: Prior to 1948 the appellant was the proprietor of a firm in Czechoslovakia whose business consisted of marketing preserved pickles, vegetables, fruit and the like. In that business he used the mark Nova. The firm did not export to the United Kingdom. In 1948 the business was nationalised and taken over by the Czechoslovak government. The appellant says that he was paid no compensation. In the same year the nationalised firm began exporting to the United Kingdom and did so under the same mark Nova. From 1948 to 1953 the export value of the goods so exported to the United Kingdom amounted to £334,000. The retail sales price in the United Kingdom is said to be some forty per cent. more. No figures of imports are available for the years 1954, 1955 or 1956, but in the period 1957 to July 3, 1962 (the date of the respondent's application for registration) the value of sales to the United Kingdom of tinned gherkins, sauerkraut and tomato purée, based on export prices amounted to some £616,000. The mark Nova has also been brought to the public's notice in this country through G

A advertisements in trade journals, in the national press and at various exhibitions.

When his business was taken over, the appellant went to Nova Scotia and set up a pickling industry there. In October, 1960, that business began to export their products, including pickled gherkins, to the United Kingdom under the mark Nova. By then the respondents had been doing the same thing for twelve years and had exported to this country something like three-quarters of a million pounds worth of goods plus whatever amount is attributable to 1954 to 1956. From October, 1960, to July, 1962, the value of the goods exported to the United Kingdom by the appellant was £12,400, or about one per cent. of the value of the goods brought into this country by the respondents.

B From the appellant's notice of opposition it appeared that the objections to registration were based on two grounds. I quote from the registrar's decision C where he said this:

"The objections raised by the opponent are on two grounds: First, one of priority because the opponent's Canadian firm applied on Sept. 24, 1960, to register virtually the same mark for a specification covering the goods claimed under the present application and, second, because the mark is almost identical to one which the opponent was using since 1931 in connection with his ownership of the firm Nova-Jos. Novotny in Czechoslovakia and since Mar. 31, 1950, in Canada, and for exports to the United Kingdom with the exception of the interruption during the World War II period."

D Counsel for the appellant, says, however, that the registrar was misled about this and failed to appreciate what the appellant's point really was. Counsel expressly E disclaims any opposition based on priority or on s. 17 (1) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938 (1), and rests the appellant's case entirely on s. 11 of the Act of 1938. Section 11 is in these terms:

"It shall not be lawful to register as a trade mark or part of a trade mark F any matter the use of which would, by reason of its being likely to deceive or cause confusion or otherwise, be disentitled to protection in a court of justice, or would be contrary to law or morality, or any scandalous design."

The appellant now says, first, that the use of Nova as a trade mark would be likely to cause confusion; and, second, it would be contrary to morality.

Let me deal with the second point first. The argument starts with the assertion that the appellant's business was confiscated without compensation and that G this is something contrary to the principles on which the courts in this country administer justice. In those circumstances counsel for the appellant says that it would offend morality to give the respondents a monopoly in the mark for a business acquired in that way. There are certain obvious difficulties in the way of this argument, and I mention two in passing. The first is that it has been held H that the immorality must be inherent in the mark itself (see Arthur Fairest, Ltd.'s Application, (2)). The second is the fact that the appellant's English trade was not confiscated for the simple reason that it did not exist in 1948.

I In my judgment, however, the argument does not even start to get on its feet. The only evidence about the matter, in so far as it can be called evidence, is a letter which accompanied the appellant's notice of opposition. That is dated Aug. 28, 1964, and it contains the following sentences:

"My firm in 1948 was one of the largest of its kind in Central Europe and was nationalised by the communistic government in March 1948. The law which announced the nationalisation had expressed clearly that the nationalisation will be conducted against compensation. I should like to make a declaration that, for this industry—representing the value of several million dollars—I have not received any compensation whatsoever . . .

(1) For s. 17 (1) of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, see 25 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 1194.

(2) (1951), 68 R.P.C. 197.

"For the above reasons I deny to Stredoceska Fruta Narodni Podnik any right to this application, as they cannot claim any legal title to its ownership even in Czechoslovakia. When law of nationalisation was announced by the Czechoslovakian government in 1948, among conditions of nationalisation it was clearly stated that the nationalisation will be performed against compensation. As mentioned above, no compensation for my industry in Prague was offered or performed in any shape or form."

Then in the statutory declaration of Mr. Fejteck dated May 7, 1965 there is this sentence:

"In 1948 my said firm was taken over by the Czechoslovak government without my consent and I have not received any compensation."

I have no evidence of what the law under which the appellant's business was nationalised said, except that it apparently contained some provision for compensation. I have no evidence whether the appellant was entitled to compensation under that law, nor have I any evidence why the appellant has not received compensation, whether, for example, he would have received compensation if he had chosen to stay in Czechoslovakia instead of going to Canada. The whole matter is far too nebulous to justify the conclusion that some moral principle would be infringed if I allowed the application for registration to proceed. I therefore reject this ground of objection.

I turn now to the question of confusion. Counsel for the respondents, argued that the appellant cannot rely on confusion under s. 11 when the confusion, if any there be, arises solely from his use of the respondents' mark. Counsel for the appellant, submitted that there is no such doctrine in trade mark law. He submitted that the proper approach under s. 11 is this: that the initial onus is on the appellant to establish that he has acquired a reputation in the use of the mark Nova; if he succeeds in doing that, the onus then shifts to the respondents to establish that the registration proposed would not be reasonably likely to cause confusion among a substantial number of persons (see, for example, the Ovax case, Re Smith Hayden & Co., Ltd.'s Application (3), per EVERSHED, J.). This, counsel for the appellant submits, the respondents have failed to do.

The evidence about reputation and confusion is contained in a number of statutory declarations exhibiting answers to questionnaires which have been produced by both parties. The assistant registrar deals with them in his decision and I do not propose to analyse them in detail, but I will make one or two general observations. (i) The assistant registrar says this in his decision:

"Nevertheless, in this case, there is evidence of the mark having been used by [the respondents] on what I consider to be a very substantial scale. I think it is reasonable to assume from the volume of sales, despite the paucity of trade evidence, that there is a sizeable reputation attaching to the trade mark used by the applicants in the United Kingdom."

That is an inference which in my view the assistant registrar was fully justified in drawing.

(ii) The appellant has not satisfied me that at the date of the application he had acquired a sufficiently substantial reputation in this country to shift the onus of proof. In KERLY'S LAW OF TRADE MARKS AND TRADE NAMES (9th Edn.), para. 325, the following passage occurs:

"It should be noted that under s. 11 consideration must be given to the extent and character of the reputation belonging to the earlier mark. Before the section can be applied at all, it must be established that the opponents' mark is known to a substantial number of persons in the United Kingdom."

As I have said, the appellant has not satisfied me that he has passed that test. That in itself would be a sufficient reason for dismissing this appeal, but I

A would add another point, which is this. The passage in KERLY to which I have just referred goes on as follows:

“Where a trade mark has been long used by a person who is applying to register it, it will not be refused on the ground of recent use of a similar mark by another trader. The mark does not by such recent use become calculated to deceive.”

B Those words which I have just quoted, as the footnote indicates, were approved by WILBERFORCE, J., in Welsh Lady Trade Mark (4). Although this case was not cited at the Bar, I have found it of some assistance here and I would like to refer to it. The headnote is as follows (5):

C “The registered proprietors of three identical trade marks embodying a quasi-national emblem used these marks from about 1900 and registered them in 1958. Since 1954 the applicants for rectification had used a label embodying a similar device as an indication of Welsh origin. An unsuccessful application was made to the registrar for rectification on the grounds that the marks were not adapted to distinguish the proprietors’ goods, or because they were likely to cause deception or confusion. On appeal by motion to the High Court. Held: (i) that a particular version of a quasi-national emblem could become distinctive of an individuals’ goods and that as the evidence established that the proprietor’s marks were distinctive, no valid objection to their remaining on the register could be sustained under s. 9 of the Act. [That is a point with which I am not concerned here]. (ii) That such confusion as was proved in evidence had arisen from the acts of the applicants for rectification after the marks had become distinctive of the proprietors. This was not a ground for refusing the proprietors registration of their marks and therefore there was no justification for removing the marks from the register.”

In the statement of facts it was stated (5):

F “The applicants raised objections to the marks remaining on the register under s. 9 and s. 11 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, alleging under s. 9 that the marks were not adapted to distinguish the goods, and under s. 11 that the marks were likely to cause deception or confusion.”

WILBERFORCE, J., dealing with the latter point, said this (6):

G “With regard to s. 11 based on confusion, it really rests on a piece of evidence which comes from the side of the proprietors and which indicates that there has been confusion.”

He refers to the evidence on the question of confusion and continued (6):

H “That is a point of evidence of confusion between the two marks, the Holytex mark with the lady on it and the registered mark of the proprietors, but one has to relate that to the wording of the section and the section says a mark cannot be registered ‘if by reason of confusion the user of it would be disentitled to protection in a court of justice’. It seems to me, on the evidence, that this mark had been used for many years in connection with the proprietors’ goods and that it had become distinctive of their goods, and it would be quite impossible to say that they would be disentitled to protection in respect of it in a court of justice. The applicants’ use of a similar mark which, it appears, has caused the confusion is of more recent use, and it does not seem to me that a more recent use of that kind causing confusion would be a reason for disentitling the owners of the older mark to registration.”

I Then he goes on to refer to the passage in KERLY to which I have already referred. Therefore, in addition to the other matters that I have mentioned and for similar reasons to those which are mentioned in the passage from WILBERFORCE, J.'s judgment to which I have just referred, I think that the assistant registrar, although dealing with rather different points, came to the right conclusion, and I therefore dismiss this appeal.

The taxpayer company carried on the business of manufacture and sale of surgical and pharmaceutical products having glass and rubber parts, using the brand name "Ingram", but owing to the development of cheaper and more durable plastic and other substitutes for rubber it fell into difficulties and suffered serious losses. A receiver was appointed and in September, 1960, he sold the company's factory. In May, 1960, however, the taxpayer company's shares had been acquired by a public company which had many subsidiaries and diverse interests and intended to extend its interests into the field of plastics. Three-quarters of the taxpayer company's machinery was transferred by the public company to the Hainault factory of one of its subsidiaries; the rest of the machinery was sold and the taxpayer company's business was continued there. Following continued losses it was decided in March, 1961, to close the Hainault factory, but, a suitable alternative to rubber having by then been found by research there, it was decided to change the taxpayer company's products from rubber to plastics and a pilot plant to investigate their possible use commercially was installed in the premises of another subsidiary, which paid for it; the machine began operating in June, 1961, and the taxpayer company ceased the production of rubber components and all manufacturing in May, 1961, though continuing to supply customers from stocks for a short time. The taxpayer company's machine was sold and its staff was paid off, one sales representative continuing with the first subsidiary and being engaged part of his time on taxpayer company's sales. The Hainault factory closed in September, 1961. From that date the second subsidiary company manufactured plastic components for and assembled and packed the taxpayer company's products. Those products were indistinguishable from and were accepted as identical with its previous rubber products, were marketed under its brand name "Ingram" on its behalf by its long-term employee at the first subsidiary's London office, and were invoiced and delivered to the

The taxpayer company was then little more than a shell. In June, 1962, the second subsidiary's machines and raw material of the trade and the taxpayer company's issued share capital were sold for £3,500 (£375 being allocated to the purchase of the shares) to a plastics company which moved the machines and material to its own factory, rented the space for them to the taxpayer company and sold them to it. The taxpayer company thereafter manufactured plastic parts for its products, bought glass parts, assembled the products and sold them itself, the business being exactly the same as before September, 1961, except that the components which it manufactured were plastic instead of rubber. The customers throughout remained substantially the same. The taxpayer company was assessed to income tax on the basis that in September, 1961, when the Hainault factory was closed and the second subsidiary manufactured and produced the products, the taxpayer company's trade had been permanently discontinued and a new trade had commenced, as distinct from there having been a temporary suspension of the old trade followed by a continuation of it in June, 1962. - Held: (i) as the commissioners' decision that the taxpayer company's trade (or the essence of that trade) ceased in September, 1961, involved no wrong principle of law but was a decision of fact, and as there was evidence to support it, their decision on that point should stand (see p. 924, letter I, to p. 925, letter A, and p. 926, letter A, post).

Gordon & Blair, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ((1962), 40 Tax Cas. 358) followed.

- (ii) the question whether the discontinuance of the taxpayer company's trade in September, 1961, was a permanent discontinuance, was not, however, one purely of fact, but involved a question of law; having regard to the finding that the business at the end was exactly the same as the business at the beginning, the inevitable inference was that the trade was suspended and not permanently discontinued in September, 1961, that it was then followed by a period which was experimental, and that the resumption of similar activities since June, 1962, constituted a continuation of the former trade, with the consequence that permanent discontinuance of that trade was not established (see p. 928, letter F, post).

- Kirk and Randall, Ltd. v. Dunn* ((1924), 8 Tax Cas. 663) and Gladstone Development Co., Ltd. v. Strick (Inspector of Taxes), (1948), 30 Tax Cas. 131) applied.

Case Stated.

The taxpayer company appealed to the Special Commissioners of Income Tax (i) against the following assessments to income tax: 1961-62 in the sum of £6,223; 1962-63 in the sum of £8,103 less £213 capital allowances; 1963-64 in the sum of £5,930 less £36 capital allowances; and (ii) against the refusal of the inspector of taxes to allow losses previously sustained by the company to be deducted from or set off against the amount of profits assessed, under s. 342 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. The question for decision was whether, throughout the whole period covered by the assessments, the company carried on one and the same trade. In relation to the computation of the profits assessed, the question was whether the profits should be computed on the "preceding year" basis under E s. 127 (1) of the Act of 1952, or on the basis of a new trade having been set up and commenced (s. 128 of the Act of 1952). In relation to the claim to carry forward losses (s. 342), the question was whether the losses were sustained in the same trade as that in which the profits assessed were earned*. The taxpayer company contended as follows: (i) that the company's trade was not permanently discontinued at any time during the period under review, but continued throughout the period; (ii) that accordingly the taxpayer company's profits should be computed on the preceding year basis for each of the years of assessment under appeal, and (iii) that the company was entitled to carry forward losses suffered by it before 1961. The Crown contended as follows: (i) that the trade carried on by the taxpayer company ceased in September, 1961; (ii) that the company set up a new trade in September, 1961, which was a trade of merchanting; (iii) that the assessments under appeal were correctly based; and (iv) that the taxpayer company was not entitled to carry forward losses suffered before September, 1961. The commissioners found† (i) that the taxpayer company between September, 1961, and June, 1962, was not carrying on the trade which it had carried on theretofore but a new and different trade, set up and commenced in September, 1961, and discontinued in June, 1962; and H (ii) that in September, 1961, the trade previously carried on was not merely suspended but permanently discontinued, and that the company's activities after June, 1962, although very similar to those before September, 1961, constituted a new trade and not a continuation of the old trade. The claim under s. 342 of the Act of 1952 therefore failed, but the assessments were reduced to the following figures: 1961-62 nil, 1962-63 £981; and 1963-64 £1,692 (agreed capital allowances £106). The taxpayer company appealed by way of Case Stated to the High Court. I

* The facts of the case are set out at p. 921, letter A, to p. 922, letter F, post.

† The terms of the commissioners' decision are set out at p. 922, letter H, to p. 923, letter D, post.

A GOFF, J.: This is a case in which the taxpayer company, J. G. Ingram & Son, Ltd., carried on for a good many years a successful business in the manufacture and sale of surgical and pharmaceutical products having glass and rubber parts. Owing to the fact that plastics and comparable products became not only a possible substitute for the rubber, but something which was both cheaper and more durable, and therefore clearly better, the company fell into difficulties

B and suffered serious losses, so much so, that a receiver was appointed, who sold the company's factory, completion taking place in September, 1960. In the meantime, the taxpayer company's shares had been acquired in May, 1960, by Redland Holdings, Ltd. ("Redland"), a public company with many subsidiaries and diverse interests. The commissioners found that Redland intended to extend its interests into the field of plastics and had for that reason recently

C acquired a company, Tuck & Co., Ltd. There was space in Tuck & Co., Ltd.'s factory premises at Hainault, and Redland caused three-quarters of the taxpayer company's machinery to be moved to Hainault, the remainder being sold, and thereafter the taxpayer company continued its business at Hainault.

Paragraph 7 of the Case Stated is as follows:

D "7. It was the policy of Redland to find plastic substitutes for rubber in the [taxpayer company's] product. Mr. Kalepp, an expert in this field, who was employed in the Redland group, became managing director of the [taxpayer company]; he conducted experiments at the Hainault factory, and by March, 1961, a suitable alternative had been found and it was decided that the [taxpayer company's] products should change over from rubber to plastics. It was also decided to set up a pilot plant to investigate

E the possibility of using this alternative commercially and a suitable machine was ordered and eventually installed in the premises of Martindill, Ltd. ["Martindill"] another Redland subsidiary. The machine was paid for by Martindill and came into operation in June, 1961. The [taxpayer company] ceased production of rubber components in May, 1961, continuing for a short time to supply customers from stocks."

F It does not appear that Martindill or anyone else ever acquired any plant other than the pilot plant so far as the facts found are concerned, but it may be that that one pilot plant was and is sufficient.

Notwithstanding these efforts, considerable losses continued to be incurred and in March, 1961, Redland decided to close the Hainault factory and the Case

G Stated recites as follows:

"8. At the same time Martindill's factory had surplus space and accordingly the pilot plant was set up there as previously stated. The [taxpayer company's] machinery was sold, manufacturing ceased in May, and Tuck sold the Hainault factory, which closed in September, 1961. The [taxpayer company's] staff were paid off: one man, the sales representative, was employed at Tuck's London office where he was engaged partly on the [taxpayer company's] sales and partly on other duties.

H

"9. From September, 1961, until June, 1962, the position was as follows: (a) plastic components for the products were manufactured by Martindill and Martindill assembled the products and packed them; (b) these products were indistinguishable from those which the [taxpayer company] had previously been marketing and the brand name 'Ingram' was used and they were accepted as identical with the rubber products previously supplied; (c) marketing was carried out on behalf of the [taxpayer company] by a long-service employee of the company who was accommodated at the London office of Tuck; (d) the goods were invoiced and delivered to customers in the [taxpayer company's] name by Redland staff in accordance with the practice in respect of all companies in the group: deliveries made by Martindill for the [taxpayer company] were charged to the [taxpayer company] monthly by Martindill at an agreed price, designed to show a profit both to Martindill and to the [taxpayer company]—bearing in mind that the sale price charged by the company to its customers had been previously fixed by contract; (c) the [taxpayer company] itself was a little more than a shell; it was made use of by the Redland group for the purpose of selling goods produced by Martindill; the profits it made were merchanting profits on goods charged to it by Martindill.

“ 10. The products produced by Martindill were not entirely satisfactory, and in April or May, 1962, Redland decided to dispose of the [taxpayer company]; . . . ” and on June 4, 1962, they made an offer to another company called Plastage (Sussex), Ltd. (“ Plastage ”) which was accepted, and under which they agreed to sell the Losca moulding machine (which must, I think, be the pilot machine), complete with all ancillary equipment and moulds, all raw materials in stock, and to transfer the whole of the issued share capital of the taxpayer company for the sum of £3,500. It was said to be an integral part of the agreement that all orders of the taxpayer company outstanding as at May 31, 1962, would be undertaken by the purchasers and satisfied. It is indeed expressly stated that the machinery referred to was Martindill’s machinery. The part of the consideration allocated to the taxpayer company’s shares was £375. The company had no physical assets. It had its order book which was valuable to Plastage and the name Ingram was well known and was a valuable acquisition for Plastage.

Paragraph 11 of the Case Stated finds that:

“ 11. Shortly after Plastage acquired the [taxpayer company’s] shares, the machine and raw material stocks bought by Plastage from Martindill were moved to a factory at Portslade owned by Plastage, and Plastage sold them to the [taxpayer company] which rented space in Plastage’s factory and thereafter manufactured plastic parts for its products, bought glass parts, assembled the products and sold them itself. Its business thereafter was exactly the same as it had been prior to September, 1961, except that the components which it manufactured were plastic instead of rubber.”

In view of the finding in para. 9 (b) that Martindill’s products, which were made with plastic components, were accepted as identical with the rubber products previously supplied, the exception in para. 11 is of no significance.

On those facts it is material both as to the mode of assessment, and more importantly, on the question of carrying forward losses, to determine whether the taxpayer company’s business continued throughout, or whether there was a break and a change over to a new trade when Martindill took over and the taxpayer company was reduced in the manner I have described, and then again when Plastage having acquired the taxpayer company, the same business as had been in operation prior to September, 1961, was again carried on, and if there were such breaks, whether the first change amounted to a permanent discontinuance of the trade, or whether there was merely a suspension.

The commissioners’ findings, starting at para. 15 (2) are as follows:

“ 15 (2). It is common ground that the [taxpayer company] carried on a trade of manufacturers and suppliers of surgical and pharmaceutical products up to September, 1961, and incurred losses therein.”

Pausing there, it is a little surprising that that was common ground because it is clear from the findings that the taxpayer company ceased production in May, 1961, and one would have thought that that was the relevant date rather than September, but there it is. The subparagraph continues:

“ We find that from June, 1962, onwards the [taxpayer company] has been carrying on a trade which so nearly resembles the trade it was carrying on prior to September, 1961, that we would have had no doubt it was the

A same trade if we had not got the events of the intervening nine months to consider.

" (3) Looking at the [taxpayer company's] activities between September, 1961, and June, 1962, we find it was not during that period carrying on the trade it had carried on theretofore. It was not disputed that the activities amounted to trading, but in our view it was a new and different trade, set up and commenced in September, 1961, and discontinued in June, 1962."

B It is difficult to see what was set up and commenced in September, 1961. It is true that the factory at Hainault was not closed until then, but the Martindill arrangements were clearly operating before September, 1961, and, as I have before observed, it is found that the taxpayer company ceased production in May. Continuing the quotation:

C "The question, as we see it, is whether the former trade was suspended (to be continued again after June, 1962) or whether it was permanently discontinued in September, 1961, and a new trade was set up in June, 1962. We have not found this easy to decide, but looking at all the evidence we have come to the conclusion that in September, 1961, the trade previously carried on was permanently discontinued, and that its activities since June, 1962, although very similar to its activities before September, 1961, constitute a new trade and not a continuation of the old trade."

D Those conclusions were not acceptable to the taxpayer company, which has appealed to this court.

E Counsel for the taxpayer company puts his case in two ways: first he says, in order to see whether a trade has ceased when there has been a change in the mode of carrying it on, or in proprietorship, it is necessary to see what the essence of the trade was and to see whether in that essence it has been preserved, in support of which he relies on Laycock (Inspector of Taxes) v. Freeman, Hardy and Willis, Ltd. (1), and Briton Ferry Steel Co., Ltd. v. Barry (2). He submits that the essence here was selling the product, not manufacture and sale. On that basis he contends that the first trade did not cease at all. Alternatively, he says that, if the trade did cease, it was only a temporary cessation and the commissioners should have found that the trade was suspended, not permanently discontinued.

F Different considerations in my view apply to these two separate submissions. On the first it seems to me that the question involved is clearly one of fact as has been reiterated in numerous cases. In the Freeman, Hardy and Willis case (3),

G SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said:

"That, of course, does not mean that the business, regarded after the succession, must be in every respect and in every detail identical with the business which was carried on before the succession. The successor may succeed to a business, let me say, with fifty shops. He may choose to shut up some of those shops. He may make alterations in the goods that he sells. All sorts of alterations of that kind may take place. He may change his supplier. He may cut out a particular class of customer or a particular area. All questions of that kind appear to me to be really matters of fact for the determination of the commissioners, who, where matters of that kind arise, have to set themselves the question whether or not it is true and fair to say that the business in respect of which the successor is said to be making profits is the business to which he succeeded. Changes of that kind may or may not be so substantial as to make it right to say, as a matter of fact (that would be a question for the commissioners), that the business is not the same as the one to which he succeeded. The differences may be so substantial as to justify a finding to that effect."

Later SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., said (4):

"... the question which arises appears to me to be whether or not it can truly be said that the business of a wholesale manufacturing concern is being carried on by the respondents. The answer to that question seems to me to be quite clearly in the negative. Manufacture in these factories is being carried on, but the mere manufacture is not the thing which produces the profit of the business. That part of the business of the subsidiaries which was essential for the realisation of taxable profit—namely, the selling of their goods wholesale—has disappeared, and the goods are now sold and the profits realised by the respondents in their ordinary organisation and in their ordinary retail shops. It seems to me, therefore, that the Special Commissioners were amply entitled to find, and I think on the facts they were bound to find, that the businesses of the two subsidiary companies ceased..."

Then there is Gordon & Blair, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5), to which I must presently refer again, and Tryka, Ltd. v. Newall (6), where WILBERFORCE, J., said:

"Now whether the trade in question is 'that trade' or the same trade must, of course, be basically a question of fact. I have had referred to me a number of cases which [counsel for the taxpayer company] has very helpfully explained in order to illustrate how the courts have approached questions of this kind. I think it is clear that the position is the familiar one in relation to questions of this kind—questions of cessation, identity of business and so on—that it is for the commissioners to find the facts and that the court will not readily interfere with their finding; but of course the court will do so if it comes to the conclusion that they have drawn the wrong inferences from the facts or if it comes to the conclusion that reasonable men ought not to have come to the conclusion to which they did come upon the facts which they have set out."

That passage restates the well-known passage in the speech of LORD RADCLIFFE in Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) v. Bairstow (7) and I need not separately read from that report. Counsel for the taxpayer company points out that the taxpayer company never did manufacture all the components for their products, that after September, 1961, the goods were still sold under the same brand name and that there were continuing contracts, and he relies very strongly on the finding of fact that the customers remained the same. He submits that the essence of the trade was selling these particular appliances to these specialist customers. Those points are important, and I am not certain that, if I were trying the case de novo, I would have arrived at the same conclusion, though it is fair to say there are weighty considerations pointing in the opposite direction. The company ceased to manufacture any of the components and even to do the work of assembly. It had no factory. It was reduced to buying and selling and ceased to have any staff other than one part-time selling representative.

Counsel for the Crown relies very strongly on those features and he points out that the cases, a number of which he has cited to me, show that the factors which weigh in considering whether a business has been continued or discontinued are those of intention, ability to implement it, and ownership of the apparatus of trade. However, it seems to me on this part of the case, having regard to the authorities to which I have referred, that I can only go behind the commissioners' findings of fact if I can say that there was no evidence to support them or that they drew from the primary facts inferences which no reasonable person could draw, or of course, if they misdirected themselves in law.

Still dealing with the method of presentation, of counsel for the taxpayer

A company. I can see no question of any wrong principle of law and I find it quite impossible to say that there was no evidence to support the primary findings or that the inferences drawn were not at least reasonably possible in the face of the decision of the Court of Session in Gordon & Blair's case (8) which I have already mentioned. The facts of that case were in some respects very similar to those of the present, including the continued sameness of the customers. In one respect they were perhaps a little weaker, in that there was no evidence of continuing contracts, but in another stronger sense the brewery company in that case continued to bottle the purchased beers, whereas in the present case the company had, as I have observed, given up even the work of assembly. The Lord President (LORD CLYDE) said (9):

C “It appears to me that in this situation the Special Commissioners were entitled to conclude that the trade carried on by the appellants before Oct. 1, 1952, was not the same trade as that carried on afterwards. The question is primarily, if not indeed wholly, a question of fact dependent upon the special circumstances of the particular case. It was contended that it was immaterial to the appellants' trading whether they manufactured their particular brand of beer by the hands of their own workmen or arranged with some other party to manufacture it for them and to their order. In either event, their trade was the distribution and sale for profit of their own particular brand of beer. Upon such an approach to the matter, the trade both before and after Oct. 1, 1953, so it was contended, was the same. But, in my view, this contention involves a misdescription of the real nature of the appellants' trade. The essence of that trade, as I see it, prior to Oct. 1, 1953, was the manufacture for sale by the appellants of their own particular brand of beer. Their selling and distribution organisation was merely ancillary to that main trading activity. It is, in my view, quite false to suggest that their trade throughout was essentially the distribution of a special brand of beer, whoever may have been the manufacturer. After Oct. 1, 1953, what had been, in my view, their ancillary activity became the appellants' sole trading activity, and instead of being brewers of beer, they became distributors of beer which they did not brew but which another firm contracted to brew for them. In these circumstances the Special Commissioners were entitled, in my view, to reach the conclusion to which they came.”

F LORD GUTHRIE said (10):

G “Now it is true in a sense that a company's earnings are made by the disposal of its product and that the process of manufacture per se yields no financial return. That does not mean, however, that in considering what is the trade of a company one should have regard only to the distribution of the product sold. If it is of the essence of the business of a company that it is the disposal of a product manufactured by the company, then the discontinuance of manufacture and the disposal instead of a product made by another manufacturer is a change in the nature of the business of the company which can properly be held to be the cessation of the trade and the commencement of a new one. On the facts stated, I am of opinion that the Special Commissioners were entitled to hold that there had been a change in the essence of the business of the appellants in October, 1963.”

I Counsel for the taxpayer company argues that the ratio decidendi in that case was that it was there held that brewing was the essence of the trade. He distinguishes it from the Freeman, Hardy and Willis case (11) on that ground. So be it; the most that I could do, as it seems to me, would be to remit the case for the commissioners to consider further what was the essence of the trade in this case before and after September, 1961, but I do not think that even that would be justified. In my judgment the fact remains, and the case of Gordon & Blair (12) shows that clearly, that there was ample evidence on which the commissioners could find as they did. A

(8) (1962), 40 Tax Cas. 358.

I was exercised in my mind by one special feature in this case, viz., the statement in para. 15 (2) of the Case Stated (13) that it was common ground that the taxpayer company carried on a trade of manufacturers and suppliers up to September, 1961, which is a concession by the Crown, as I see it, that the original trade continued after the taxpayer company had ceased manufacture, and after the regime which operated during the nine months between September, 1961, and June, 1962, had come into being. I think, however, that it would be wrong to upset the findings of the commissioners on that ground. First, there is a finding that the taxpayer company continued for some time to sell off existing stocks, and therefore though it was then winding-up the trade it had not yet ceased, and one does not know how long that continued. Secondly, it might be said that the trade should be regarded as continuing until the factory was actually sold, but thirdly, and this to my mind is the most compelling reason, the admission is not really as I see it that the selling by the company of products manufactured and assembled by Martindill was the same business as the company carried on before the Martindill company was introduced but merely, possibly contrary to the true facts, that the company's business, if it did cease, went on to September, 1961, and not, as should have been found, some earlier date. If it were material the admission would, of course, preclude the Revenue from claiming that the succession was earlier than September, 1961, but I do not think it goes beyond that. B C D E

I turn now to the alternative proposition of counsel for the taxpayer company, which must proceed on the hypothesis that the trade during the nine months was different from that with which the taxpayer company started and with which it finished, but here it seems to me that it is not purely a question of fact. It is one of law, or at any rate partially of law, whether on the facts proved or found by the commissioners there was a permanent discontinuance within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1952. I refer to Kirk and Randall, Ltd. v. Dunn (14). The headnote reads as follows: F

"Up to the outbreak of the war in 1914 the appellant company was engaged in completing old contracts entered into by a firm of contractors whose business it had been formed to take over in 1912, but it obtained no fresh contracts. The business premises were closed down during the year 1913, and offered for sale without success until taken over and purchased by the War Office in December, 1914. From December, 1914, until February, 1920, the company had neither works nor plant, but during that period persistent efforts were made by its directors to obtain contracts. All negotiations, however, proved abortive until early in 1920 when, with the introduction of fresh capital into the company and the adoption of a different business policy, a number of profitable contracts were obtained, and fresh plant acquired. Throughout its existence the company retained a registered office and held its statutory meetings year by year, the secretary's salary and directors' fees were paid, and substantial payments made for expenses, including those incurred by the directors in connexion with their abortive efforts to obtain contracts. The Special Commissioners, on appeal held that there was no trade carried on by the company between 1914 and 1920, that the trade which was taken over by the company was discontinued in 1914, and that a fresh trade was set up and commenced in 1920." - A "I agree with the contention put forward on behalf of the appellants. I think that really it is a question of law in the sense that SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R., laid down in Bell (Surveyor of Taxes) v. National Provincial Bank of England, Ltd. (16), the finding is that upon the construction of the rule this case is not within it. It is not really a question of fact, or even of mixed law and fact. I think it is a question of law, because all the facts
- B are quite clearly stated as far as they are thought to be relevant and to have been acted upon in the Case."
- In the later case of Gladstone Development Co., Ltd. v. Strick (Inspector of Taxes) (17), where the question was whether the company had ceased trading, ATKINSON, J., said (18):
- C "It was suggested that it is really a question of law, but it is only a question of law in the sense in which that expression was used in Bell (Surveyor of Taxes) v. National Provincial Bank of England, Ltd. (19), where SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS, M.R. said: 'The finding of the commissioners upon that part of the case is this: "The commissioners were of opinion that there was no succession within the meaning of the said 4th rule." That is, as MATHEW, L.J.,
- D has pointed out, not a finding in fact that there was no succession, but that the particular kind of succession which took place in this case was not a succession within the meaning of the 4th rule. That is not a finding of fact, but a finding of law.'
- E "But the question here is not of that character, and I think that I must seek guidance from Hillerns and Fowler v. Murray (Inspector of Taxes) (20), where the question was whether the appellants had ceased trading. LORD HANWORTH, M.R.,] said this (21): 'But a declaration of an intention by the persons charged will not do to secure immunity from the Income Tax Act. The question is: what is the character to be attributed to the acts done by the partners in relation to the Income Tax Act? The quality and the characteristics to be attached to the acts are all questions of fact, because they are
- F questions of degree. They are questions for the commissioners to determine. The short point is before us: were there any materials on which the commissioners could reach the conclusion to which they have come?' GREER, L.J., has a very helpful sentence which is very appropriate when one comes to consider the effect of the resolution relied on in the present case. He says (22): 'The decision as to the quality and effect of the facts established
- G in each particular case that is binding on the court is the decision of the commissioners.'"
- Now in the present case there is an express finding of fact in para. (11) of the Case dealing with the period after June, 1962, as follows:
- H "Its business thereafter was exactly the same as it had been prior to September, 1961, except that the components which it manufactured were plastic instead of rubber."
- Then in para. 15 (2) the commissioners decide or find that from June, 1962, onwards the taxpayer company has been carrying on a trade which so nearly resembles the trade it was carrying on prior to September, 1961, that "we would have had no doubt it was the same trade if we had not got the events of the
- I intervening nine months to consider."
- The submission of counsel for the taxpayer company is that the commissioners misdirected themselves in law because they had found in para. 11 of the Case Stated (23) that the final trade was exactly the same as the first which was inconsistent with permanent discontinuance. They do not say that it was a similar business. Then in para. 15 (2) they consider themselves precluded from holding that it was the same trade because they have got the events of the intervening nine months to consider, but one must see how their judgment proceeds. Paragraph 15 (3) reads:

"Looking at the company's activities between September, 1961, and June, 1962, we find it was not during that period carrying on the trade it had carried on theretofore. It was not disputed that the activities amounted to trading, but in our view it was a new and different trade, set up and commenced in September, 1961, and discontinued in June, 1962. The question, as we see it, is whether the former trade was suspended (to be continued again after June, 1962) or whether it was permanently discontinued in September, 1961, and a new trade was set up in June, 1962. We have not found this easy to decide, but looking at all the evidence we have come to the conclusion that in September, 1961, the trade previously carried on was permanently discontinued, and that its activities since June, 1962, although very similar to its activities before September, 1961, constitute a new trade and not a continuation of the old trade."

It is to be observed that they there changed their expression and said that the activities were very similar.

If this were a pure question of fact I might well be in the same situation as on the first aspect of the matter, that I could not go behind the commissioners, but if it be a matter of law then I have to consider whether on all the facts found there was a permanent discontinuance within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1952. The facts found are that whilst there was a different trade during a not very long interim period, it was a period which was in many respects, if not wholly, experimental, and it was not like most of the cases where there was a complete or substantial disruption in identity of the trading because the same products were throughout being sold under the taxpayer's company's name to the same customers. There is the express finding in para. 11 that the business at the end was exactly the same as the business with which one began, and I find it an impossible conclusion in those circumstances that the business was permanently discontinued when this change of activity started in September, or it may be May, 1961. I hold that the facts lead inevitably to the inference that the business was suspended and not permanently discontinued. For those reasons I allow the appeal.

A bank obtained judgment in 1955 against the appellant for £34,000 odd. Early in 1956 the bank recovered £6,000 odd from others, reducing the amount of the judgment debt to £28,000 odd. In June, 1958, the bank released the appellant from the judgment debt, he covenanting to pay £3,000. The appellant was assessed under Case II of Sch. D on his profits as a solicitor for the year ending Mar. 31, 1956. No loss had been entered in the accounts of that year in respect of the judgment debt. If it had been, the amount to be entered according to normal accountancy practice would have been an estimate of the probable loss (i.e., £28,000). It was not in dispute that the accounts for the year must be re-opened. On the question whether the amount to be deducted in respect of the judgment debt on re-opening the accounts should be £28,000 or £3,000,

Held: applying the principle in matters of computation that where facts were available they were to be preferred to prophecies, the true amount of the debt (£3,000) should be included in the re-opened accounts rather than a figure (£28,000) that would be the imperfect estimate of loss that would have been made in March, 1956, when the true amount was not yet known (see p. 934, letter I, and p. 935, letters B and G, post).

Case Stated.

This was a Case Stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the opinion of the High Court on Oct. 21, 1966. The appellant, Arthur Harry Simpson, appealed against an assessment to income tax for the fiscal year 1958-59 on the profits of his profession as a solicitor, practising under the name Simpson & Co. the assessment being raised under Case II of Sch. D in the sum of £3,000 less retirement annuity payment and superannuation. The only question was the amount which should properly be deducted in computing the profits of the practice by reason of a judgment dated July 19, 1955, entered in an action by the District Bank, Ltd. against the appellant for £34,863 16s. 8d. and costs, the amount of the costs being subsequently taxed and paid by the appellant to the bank. Following the judgment the appellant's affairs were subject to prolonged investigation, which established that the appellant was as much a victim of the transactions of an associate of his as was the bank. By deed dated June 18, 1958, made between the appellant of the one part and the bank of the other part the appellant agreed to pay the bank the sum of £3,000 by quarterly instalments and in consideration thereof the bank released the appellant from any further payment on account of the judgment debt. In the accounts of the appellant's professional practice for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, which were prepared on Jan. 15, 1957, no entry was made in respect of the judgment debt to the bank. A note concerning it, and indicating that negotiations relating to a settlement were not yet completed, was made on the balance sheet of the accounts of the following year, which were prepared on June 11, 1958. In the accounts for the year ended Mar. 31, 1958, the profit and loss account was debited with a bad debt of the associate previously referred to in the sum of £34,863 16s. 8d.; and in the balance sheet at Mar. 31, 1958, the appellant's capital account was credited with abatement of the judgment debt, £31,863 16s. 8d., and the liability to the bank was shown as £3,000, these accounts being prepared on Jan. 29, 1959. C

The commissioners found that in accordance with normal accountancy practice any entry in the appellant's accounts to be made at the time when they were prepared would have been based on the loss likely to have been incurred by the appellant, having regard to such information bearing on the matter as was then available. The estimate of this loss would have taken into account not only the appellant's liability to the bank under the judgment debt but also the sums which might be recovered from two other debtors, a company and the associate previously mentioned. In so far as the bank recovered from these sources, the bank could not have enforced their claim against the appellant: if the appellant had been a wealthy man the bank might have recovered the judgment debt from him, and the appellant would then have been entitled to recover what he could from the associate or the company. This policy would, in that event, have been a factor to be taken into account in estimating the loss likely to be incurred by the appellant. Any provision for the loss likely to be incurred by the appellant which had been made in the accounts for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, would on normal accountancy practice have been corrected in later accounts when the actual loss had been ascertained. That is to say, an entry would have been made in those later accounts to correct the over or under provision which had been made in the accounts for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956. D

The commissioners gave their decision in writing on Dec. 19, 1966. They stated that the appeal was argued before them on the footing that both parties E

- A had admitted that for the purposes of computing the appellant's liability to income tax the accounts of his practice for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, were not wholly accurate in that they made no provision in respect of his liability to the bank. The issue before the commissioners, accordingly, was solely as to the amount by reference to which those accounts should be corrected for income tax purposes. Having reviewed the evidence the commissioners found that in accordance with normal accountancy practice, any entry in the accounts for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, made at the time when those accounts were prepared would have been based on the loss likely to have been incurred by the appellant, having regard to such information bearing on the matter as was then available; and thus in particular not only to the sum undoubtedly owed by him to the bank but also to sums which had been or might be recovered from the company and the associate. Any such entry in the accounts would only have been estimated and provisional. The commissioners held that such estimated and provisional entry would have been subject to correction when the actual loss incurred by the appellant could be ascertained. This loss was known at the time of their decision to have been £3,000. They held that for the purpose of computing the appellant's liability to income tax the profits shown by his account for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, should be adjusted by allowing a deduction of £3,000 for the loss finally incurred by him in respect of his liability to the bank. The amount of the assessment on that footing not being in dispute, they determined the appeal accordingly. The appellant required the commissioners on Jan. 16, 1967, to state a case for the opinion of the High Court pursuant to s. 64 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. The question so stated was whether on the facts not in dispute and further facts found by the commissioners their decision was incorrect.

MEGARRY, J.: This is a Case Stated by the Special Commissioners.

It raises a short point on accountancy in relation to the practice of a solicitor.

- F The assessment was made under Case II of Sch. D for 1958-59 on the profits of the solicitor's profession for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956. On July 19, 1955, judgment was entered in the Queen's Bench Division against the solicitor (whom I shall call "the appellant") by the District Bank, Ltd. (which I shall call "the bank") for the sum of £34,563 16s. 8d., together with a sum for costs which the appellant duly paid. This debt arose out of a series of transactions in which another solicitor (whom I shall call "X") had been engaged, together with certain companies in which X was interested. One of those companies, Sconering Estates, Ltd. (which I shall call "Sconering") was a defendant to the action, and judgment was also entered against it. X had, I understand, been the appellant's partner; but ultimately, after a number of unsuccessful business ventures, his career ended in bankruptcy and, I was told, in prison.
- H The appellant's debt to the bank resulted from his stopping the payment of uncleared cheques drawn on his clients' account in favour of Sconering. He did this in the belief that the transactions were fraudulent. After a prolonged investigation by the police and The Law Society, it was established that the appellant was not X's associate in delinquency, but was as much a victim of his transactions as was the bank. Early in 1956, the bank recovered £6,342 16s. 11d. from certain of X's associated companies, and it is common ground that this accordingly reduced the appellant's liability to £28,520 19s. 9d. For convenience, I shall refer to these two sums as £6,000 and £28,000 respectively, and to the judgment debt as £34,000.

The appellant is no longer under any liability to pay to the bank either the £34,000 or the £28,000; for after prolonged negotiations the bank executed a deed dated June 18, 1958, releasing the appellant from the judgment debt, and the appellant instead covenanted to pay the bank £3,000 by certain instalments. This release, it will be observed, was made over two years after the end of the appellant's accountancy year which ended Mar. 31, 1956; and it is in respect of this year that the dispute arises. A

Both the appellant and the Crown agree that the profit and loss account for that year should be re-opened; for it failed to contain any entry in respect of the appellant's debt to the bank, even though that had become a judgment debt during the year in question. Where they differ is that the Crown say that the amount of the debit that should be made in respect of the debt to the bank is £3,000, whereas the appellant says that it ought to be the £28,000. In other words, the Crown are contending for the amount which subsequently became established as the appellant's true liability, even though it was not known during the year in question that this would be the case. The appellant, on the other hand, is contending for the full amount of the judgment debt that was established during the year in question, minus only the sum recovered from the companies during that year, and ignoring the release by the bank, which was not made until over two years after the end of that year. The commissioners held that the Crown were right. The accounts for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, would, on normal accountancy practice, have been based on estimates of the probable loss, taking into account any sums likely to be recovered; and any such loss would have been provisional and subject to correction when the actual loss was ascertained. As the actual loss had been ascertained at £3,000, this was, in their view, the correct figure to enter. B C D

With refreshing and accustomed candour, counsel for the appellant laid claim to no merits whatever in his case. The gravamen of his argument was that the commissioners had failed to give effect to the decision of the House of Lords in the principal case cited to them, British Mexican Petroleum Co., Ltd. v. Jackson (Inspector of Taxes) (1). There, the tax-paying company incurred a large debt which was duly entered in its accounts for the year ending June 30, 1921. During the next accounting period, which was eighteen months to Dec. 31, 1922, the company obtained a release from some three-quarters of that debt. The House of Lords held, first, that the accounts for the first period ought not to be re-opened to give effect to the release; and, second, that the sum released ought not to be included in the accounts for the second period as a receipt. LORD THANKERTON (with whom VISCOUNT DUNEDIN and LORD ATKIN agreed) expressed himself succinctly. He said (2): E F

"My Lords, I am of opinion in the present case, that the account to June 30, 1921, cannot be re-opened, as the amount of the liability there stated was correctly stated as the finally agreed amount of the liability and the subsequent release of the respondents proceeds on the footing of the correctness of that statement." G

As for the second period, he said (2):

"I am unable to see how the release from a liability, which liability has been finally dealt with in the preceding account, can form a trading receipt in the account for the year in which it is granted." H

LORD MACMILLAN said (3) that the full amount of the debt

"was not entered as a sum paid, but as a trading debt admittedly incurred. That being so, the circumstance that the creditor subsequently forgave part of the debt and agreed not to exact the full amount of it affords no justification for re-opening the account for the year to June 30, 1921, and substituting for the amount then legally due the lesser amount which the creditor was subsequently content to accept. An account may be re-opened where an item has been omitted or some other error has occurred, or an account may be kept open by describing entries in it as provisional, but here it is agreed on all hands that there was no error in the accounts I

(1) (1932), 16 Tax Cas. 570.

A of the appellant company for the year to June 30, 1921, and that they were properly and finally drawn up so as to show the result of the year's trading." He also rejected (4) the claim to include the sum released as a credit item in the accounts for the second period

B "for the short and simple reason that the appellant company did not, in those eighteen months, either receive payment of that sum or acquire any right to receive payment of it. I cannot see how the extent to which a debt is forgiven can become a credit item in the trading account for the period within which the concession is made."

LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE simply expressed his agreement with both speeches.

C One obvious difference between that case and this is that the House of Lords was dealing with a case in which the loss had been correctly entered in the accounts in question at the time: the question was whether the subsequent release was a ground for re-opening accurate accounts. Here, the accounts in question say nothing of the loss. It is common ground that the accounts are inaccurate in this respect, and the question is whether, on re-opening those accounts so as to insert the loss, the amount to be inserted is what would have been entered at the time, regardless of what has happened since, or whether that amount is the amount of the true loss known at the time of the insertion. The insertion is to be made nunc pro tunc: but in quantifying it, is the basis to be tunc or nunc?

E I abstain from pursuing this matter in any detail, because counsel for the Crown has disclaimed any desire to distinguish between cases where, as in the British Mexican case (5), the question is that of disturbing a correct account, and those where, as here, the question is that of what correction is to be made to an admittedly incorrect account. Instead, the main issue has been that of the nature of the debt in relation to the use of hindsight. Counsel for the appellant accepts that hindsight may be used to quantify a mere estimated liability: F but he contends that it should be excluded where there is a fixed, final and established liability. Here, he says, there was a judgment debt for a firm £34,000 reduced by a firm £6,000 to a firm £28,000. The release that substituted the £3,000 for the £28,000 was not the quantification of some uncertainty inherent in the £28,000, but came ab extra, so that the true liability to be inserted in the accounts was nonetheless a firm £28,000.

G Counsel for the Crown was content to meet counsel for the appellant on his own ground. His contention was that there never had been a fixed, final and established liability of the appellant for any sum. True, the bank had a judgment against him for £34,000; but that judgment was against Sconering as well, and the bank had also proved in X's bankruptcy for £35,000. The bank could not, of course, recover from all the sources put together more than the £34,000 due to it, H and in so far as it recovered any part of that sum from Sconering, from X, or from anyone else, it could not recover it also against the appellant. If the bank's claims against the others had yielded nothing, the bank could enforce the judgment against the appellant for the whole of the £34,000: if those claims had yielded the whole £34,000, the bank could not enforce the judgment against the appellant at all. The ceiling was £34,000, and the floor was nil. In fact, I the bank recovered £6,000 from the others, and so the appellant's liability was admittedly reduced to £28,000. This admitted reduction, said counsel for the Crown, demonstrated per se that, unlike the British Mexican case (5), what was here involved was not a fixed, final and established liability at all: the liability was uncertain, and so fell into the category where, even on the appellant's argument, hindsight was admissible. A case where the creditor has a solitary debtor

(4) (1932), 16 Tax Cas. at p. 593.

(5) (1932), 16 Tax Cas. 570.

who alone is liable will more readily yield a fixed, final and established liability A than a case where, as here, there are two or more debtors liable for the same debt, even though some of them are insolvent or worse.

Counsel for the appellant replied that if hindsight was admissible, it was admissible only to determine what the bank was entitled to recover. He distinguished between the reduction of the £34,000 to £28,000, which he accepted, and the reduction of the £28,000 to the £3,000, which he rejected. The former B he accepted as being a proper quantification of the liability after considering its intrinsic uncertainties. The latter he rejected as being no quantification of anything intrinsic but as being a purely voluntary and extrinsic release from liability. The reduction from £34,000 to £28,000 was a reduction in what the bank was entitled to recover: the reduction from £28,000 to £3,000 was merely an independent transaction whereby the bank voluntarily agreed to forego C £25,000 out of what it was entitled to recover; and this, he said, ought not to be taken into account.

Counsel for the Crown met this point by citing Bernhard v. Gahan; Bernhard
v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6), where there was initially a debt of £22,410 to a bank, but ultimately the bank agreed to accept £8,000 in full settlement. The taxpayer contended that as at the end of the accounting period his debt was £22,410, that D was the correct amount which should appear in the accounts, and not the £8,000 to which the debt was afterwards reduced. The reduction, he said, was an entirely new and separate matter, not arising out of the original transaction, and did not affect his liability at the end of the accounting period. The Court of Appeal rejected this contention, and held that as the revenue authorities had never accepted the £22,410 as a final figure, matters remained open, and £8,000 E was the correct figure to insert. Quite plainly, that was a case in which the accounts as made up had included the £22,410, and yet it was nevertheless held right to reduce that to £8,000 as a result of the extraneous release by the bank. If it is right to alter an existing figure by reason of an extraneous release of part of the debt, I cannot see why it should be wrong to take account of such a release when the debt is for the first time being inserted into the accounts. In that respect, F at least, this case seems to be a fortiori Bernhard v. Gahan (6).

In thickets so dense and statute-laden as the law of income tax, commonsense is, I suppose, a frail guide. Certainly it cannot become the master, for then it would usurp the function of the statute book. But in territory which remains unoccupied by either statute law or case law, I do not see why commonsense should be abjured. Here I have a situation in which it is accepted on all G hands that the accounts in question must be re-opened so as to include a debt.
It is also beyond question that, although that debt was once £34,000, events have occurred which reduced it, first to £28,000 and then to £3,000. When the hand of accountancy now comes to write that debt into the accounts, counsel for the appellant tells me that what must be written is not the £3,000 that the debt truly is but the £28,000 that it has not been since June 18, 1958. If authority H tells me that for accountancy purposes I must here resurrect an extinct debt,
I shall of course obey; but so far as I am aware, there is no such authority, and certainly the British Mexican case (7) does not bind me to do so. In the absence of any such authority, I refuse to countenance the insertion into the accounts for the year ended Mar. 31, 1956, of a debt of £28,000, when that is £25,000 more than I know the true debt to be. I can understand that sometimes accounts may have to be left as they stand, despite supervening events. I can also understand that sometimes accounts may have to be re-opened so as to give effect to supervening events. But I find it difficult to appreciate a doctrine which binds an accountant who is re-opening the accounts to be selective in making corrections to a particular item, giving effect to some and rejecting others in order that he may substitute one incorrect figure for another. I am I

A not saying that hindsight is always one and indivisible. What I am saying is that once hindsight is let in, then unless there is some compelling reason to the contrary that hindsight ought to be comprehensive and not differential. In this case I have heard no such reason.

During the argument I ventured to refer to a further consideration of possible relevance. There is a general principle in the law that where facts are available
B they are to be preferred to prophecies. This is sometimes called the Bullfa principle, from the well-known case of Bullfa and Merthyr Dure Steam Collieries (1891), Ltd. v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co. (8). If, on a compulsory acquisition, compensation depends on the value of minerals, the actual value of those minerals at the time when the compensation comes to be assessed is to be preferred to the estimate of that value which would have been made when the
C notice to treat was served. Where a widow's damages under Lord Campbell's Act, 1846 (9), depends on her expectation of life, and she dies before damages come to be assessed, what is to be taken is her actual expectation of life at the time of her husband's death rather than her actuarial expectation then. If a testator's estate is insufficient to pay all the legacies in full, the abated capital sums payable in respect of testamentary annuitants who have died prior
D to the time of assessment must be based on their actual expectations of life at the date of the testator's death and not on their actuarial expectations then. The authorities on these points, and other cases, will be found collected in Re Bradberry, National Provincial Bank v. Bradberry; Re Fry, Tasker v. Gulliford (10). I do not suggest that these authorities govern the case before me; but the principle at least seems to me to be consistent with the view that I take. In E LORD MACNAGHTEN's words in the Bullfa case (11), when an arbitrator assesses compensation it is his duty to

"avail himself of all information at hand at the time of making his award which may be laid before him. Why should he listen to conjecture on a matter which has become an accomplished fact? Why should he guess when he can calculate? With the light before him, why should he shut his eyes and grope in the dark?"

F I would apply the same principle to accounts, and tell the accountant who is re-opening any accounts that unless authority compels him to the contrary he should take into consideration all the vicissitudes which have afflicted a debt, so that the accounts will show not the imperfect estimates of the amount of
G that debt which would have been made at the time but the true amount of that debt which has ultimately been established. Accountancy is difficult enough as it is, and I would deprecate a practice which might require accountants to clear their minds of today's knowledge so that they may act today on the prophecies which they would have made yesterday, if in a suitable state of ignorance of what the future then held.

H Finally, I might mention that the British Mexican case (12) no longer holds the field unchanged: for, twenty-eight years after it was decided, Parliament acted. The Finance Act, 1960, s. 36, provides that where in computing for tax purposes the profits or gains of a trade, profession or vocation "a deduction has been allowed for any debt" incurred for the purposes of the trade, profession or vocation, and after Apr. 5, 1960, the whole or any part of "that debt" is
I thereafter released, the amount released is to be treated as a receipt of that trade, profession or vocation arising in the period in which the release is effected. The wording of this provision does not, perhaps, attain the ultimate in perfection. If a deduction of £28,000 is allowed for a debt of £34,000, and then the creditor releases £31,000 out of the debt of £34,000, it may be said that literally what must be treated as a receipt is the "amount released"; and this is £31,000. On this view, what ought to be a debt of £3,000 is transformed by statute into a net receipt of £3,000. However, even if the point were ever to be taken, it is difficult to imagine that the courts would permit the section to be read so as to produce such an unfair result. If instead of being framed in relation merely to the "debt" being released, the section had been phrased so as to relate to a release in respect of the debt "so far as allowed as a deduction", or in respect of "the deduction allowed for the debt", the matter would have been beyond argument. But the point in no way arises for decision, and I say no more about it.

In the result, I consider the decision of the commissioners to be plainly right, and I dismiss the appeal.

BOWATER PAPER CORPORATION, LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Danckwerts, Salmon and Fenton Atkinson, LJJ.), May 9, 10, 13, 1968.]

Income Tax—Double taxation—Relief—Credit of foreign tax against income tax—Computation—Tax borne by the body corporate—Attributable to proportion of "relevant profits" represented by dividends—Meaning of relevant profits—Profits in accounts of foreign body corporate or as assessed for foreign tax purposes—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2 c. 10), s. 347, Sch. 16, para. 9.

The taxpayer company had a subsidiary company (the "Canadian company") which was resident in Canada and which derived its income from the dividends of other subsidiaries, some of which suffered Canadian tax and some United States tax on their respective profits. Under the double taxation conventions between the United Kingdom and Canada and the United States, having effect under the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 347 and Sch. 16, the taxpayer company was entitled to credit against United Kingdom income tax in respect of Canadian and United States taxes paid on the profits of subsidiaries in those countries. The relevant foreign tax taken into account for that purpose was "that borne by the body corporate paying the dividend upon the relevant profits in so far as it is properly attributable to the proportion of the relevant profits which is represented by the dividend" (para. 9 of Sch. 16*). The depreciation allowed by the taxing authorities abroad in computing the tax chargeable on the subsidiaries was greater than the amount actually deducted in the accounts of the companies, with the consequence that the profits computed for tax purposes were lower than those shown in the companies' accounts. Accordingly, if "relevant profits" were the lower profits as computed for foreign tax purposes and not the profits shown in the companies' accounts, a higher foreign tax credit would be obtained, as the fraction for which para. 9 provided would be larger.

- A Held: "the relevant profits" in para. 9 of Sch. 16 to the Income Tax Act, 1952, meant the profits as shown in the companies' accounts and not those on which foreign tax was charged, with the consequence that the smaller fraction of foreign tax only should be credited against United Kingdom income tax (see p. 941, letter F, and p. 942, letter F, post).

- Appeal.
- The taxpayer company appealed to the Special Commissioners of Income Tax against an objection to its claim for an allowance by way of credit for foreign tax against United Kingdom income tax for the years of assessment 1958-59 to 1961-62, under para. 13 of Sch. 16 to the Income Tax Act, 1952, and also against the following assessments to income tax: 1958-59 £1,880,000 less £617,427 16s. 2d. tax credit relief; 1959-60 £2,400,000 less £880,000 tax credit relief; 1960-61 £3,000,000 less £931,000 tax credit relief; and 1961-62 £2,041,000 less £510,000 tax credit relief. The claim arose under the double taxation conventions with the United States of America and Canada, although no question arose of the interpretation of those conventions. The relevant provisions were as follows:
- F Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (U.S.A.) Order, 1946*, Schedule, art. XIII (2):
- "Subject to such provisions (which shall not affect the general principle hereof) as may be enacted in the United Kingdom, United States tax payable in respect of income from sources within the United States shall be
- G allowed as a credit against any United Kingdom tax payable in respect of that income. Where such income is an ordinary dividend paid by an United States corporation, such credits shall take into account (in addition to any United States income tax deducted from or imposed on such dividend) the United States income tax imposed on such corporation in respect of its profits, and where it is a dividend paid on participating preference shares and representing both a dividend at the fixed rate to which the shares are entitled and an additional participation in profits, such tax on profits shall likewise be taken into account in so far as the dividend exceeds such fixed rate."
- H Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Canada) Order, 1946†, Schedule, art. XIII (1):
- I "Subject to the provisions of the law of the United Kingdom regarding the allowance as a credit against United Kingdom tax of tax payable in a territory outside the United Kingdom, Canadian tax payable in respect of income from sources within Canada shall be allowed as a credit against any United Kingdom tax payable in respect of that income. Where such income is an ordinary dividend paid by a Canadian debtor, the credit shall take into account (in addition to any Canadian income tax chargeable directly or by deduction in respect of the dividend) the Canadian income tax payable in respect of its profits by the company paying the dividend . . ."

The relevant legislation was contained in the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 347 and Sch. 16, paras. 1-3, 7, 8 and 9.

It was common ground (being so stated in para. 7 of the Case Stated) that in computing the credit which might be claimed against United Kingdom income tax under art. XIII (1) of the Double Taxation Agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada, the Canadian and United States taxes paid on the profits or income of subsidiary companies (viz., of the North America company) in Canada and the United States of America, from which the North America company received dividends, might be taken into account in addition to the tax suffered by the North America company by direct assessment or as a result of the withholding tax deducted from the dividends received from United States subsidiaries. The North America company itself suffered tax only to a small extent as it was primarily a holding company. Paragraphs 8-10 of the Case Stated were as follows:

"8. In computing their respective profits liable to Canadian or United States tax there was deducted the depreciation allowance made under the relevant tax legislation to the various subsidiaries. Those depreciation allowances differed from the provisions which these subsidiaries made for depreciation in their own books of account. The reasons for this divergence between tax and book depreciation are explained below.

"9. When the paper mill owned by Bowaters Southern Paper Corpn. came into operation in 1954, that company elected to amortise the cost of certain plant facilities over a sixty month period for U.S. Federal income tax purposes, under what is known as a certificate of necessity. The remaining fixed assets were depreciated for tax purposes on a reducing balance method. For accounts purposes however, the company has depreciated its fixed assets on a straight-line basis. Under U.S. tax law, a company which provides for depreciation on the straight-line basis, so as to write off the assets over their useful working life, is entitled to claim, tax depreciation on the reducing balance basis at twice the rate used in its accounts; this is known as the 'double declining balance' method. As a result of claiming this accelerated depreciation, the profit of Bowaters Southern Paper Corpn. assessable to U.S. tax in the relevant years has been substantially lower than the profit shown in the company's accounts. In accordance with recognised U.S. accounting practice, the company has charged the resultant tax saving against its profits and has set aside a corresponding amount for equalisation of future taxation. Bowaters Southern Paper Corpn. could not have shown the same rate of depreciation in its accounts as it was allowed to claim for United States tax purposes in the years in question, without showing very substantial losses which would not have been commercially true.

"10. In the case of the Canadian subsidiaries the difference between accounts and tax depreciation is due to the fact that tax allowances are computed on a reducing balance basis whereas, for accounts purposes, depreciation is charged on the straight-line method."

The taxpayer company contended before the commissioners as follows:

"(i) On the true construction of para. 9 of Sch. 16 'profits', in the expression 'relevant profits' means profits as computed for the purposes of foreign tax. (ii) In the alternative: on the principle of the decision in Sterling Trust, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.* the taxpayer [company] was entitled to claim that any dividend paid [by the North America company] should be deemed to have been paid primarily out of taxed profits, and * (1925), 12 Tax Cas. 868.

A not rateably out of taxed and untaxed profits. (iii) In the further alternative: 'profits' in the expression 'relevant profits' means profits as computed for the purposes of United Kingdom taxation."

The Crown contended before the commissioners as follows:

B "(i) On the true construction of para. 9 of Sch. 16, 'the relevant profits' means the profits shown by the [taxpayer] company's accounts to be available for distribution, before liability to the foreign tax; or in the case of sub-para. (b) of para. 9, the specified profits out of which the dividend in question is declared to be paid. (ii) There are no words in para. 9 to justify the construction contended for on behalf of the appellant and the view that 'profits' in this paragraph mean 'profits as computed for the purposes of foreign tax' is wholly inconsistent with the express provision of sub-para. (b), under which 'the relevant profits' may be a part of the total profits which has borne no tax at all. (iii) The expression 'the profits available for distribution' in the proviso to para. 9, means 'the relevant profits' referred to in sub-para. (a) or (c), less the amount of the foreign tax and any part of the net profits, after such tax, applied in some other way so as to reduce the amount remaining available for distribution. (iv) The effective rate of foreign tax for the purposes of calculating the credit due under para. 9 is arrived at by applying a fraction, the denominator of which is 'the relevant profits', as construed in contention (i) above, and the numerator of which is the tax properly attributable to those profits, bearing in mind that an assessment is the measure of what is taxed and not necessarily the actual amount of the profits charged to tax (Neumann v. Inland Revenue Comrs.*). (v) Where the total amount of the foreign tax is paid on an assessment exceeding in amount 'relevant profits' as construed in (i) above, the amount of tax in respect of which credit may be given must be limited to the part of the foreign tax properly attributable to such 'relevant profits'. (vi) The provisions of sub-paras. (a), (b) and (c) of para. 9 make the principle of Sterling Trust, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.† inapplicable to the ascertainment of 'the relevant profits' for the purposes of the paragraph."

The commissioners rejected‡ the contentions of the taxpayer company and dismissed its appeal. They determined the appeals on agreed figures as follows: 1958-59 assessment reduced to £1,700,104 (agreed tax credit relief £425,032 5s.); 1959-60 assessment reduced to £1,821,804 (agreed tax credit relief £391,500 7s. 8d.); 1960-61 assessment increased to £3,815,522 (agreed tax credit relief £1,043,291 3s.); 1961-62 assessment reduced to £1,991,064 (agreed tax credit relief £660,575 9s. 6d.).

G On Dec. 13, 1967, as reported at [1968] 1 All E.R. 868, Cross, J., dismissed the taxpayer company's appeal against that decision, holding that the "relevant profits" in para. 9 of Sch. 16 to the Income Tax Act, 1952, meant profits available for distribution as dividend, which were the profits shown in the accounts. H The taxpayer company appealed to the Court of Appeal.

(1) [1968] 1 All E.R. 868.

May 16, 1967. It is a case which involves the question of relief against double taxation. A

The taxpayer company has a Canadian subsidiary called Bowater Corp'n. of North America, Ltd. ("the Canadian company"). The matter arises originally, of course, under the order in council, the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (U.S.A.) Order, 1946 (2). The question which we have to decide depends on the Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 347, but more particularly on Sch. 16 thereto, and entirely on para. 9 of that schedule. Indeed, it turns really on three words—"the relevant profits". Unfortunately, the legislators (as sometimes happens) have not expressed their intention very clearly, and the matter of solution gives a considerable amount of trouble. B

The parties have put forward four different possible constructions of the words in question. I had better read the paragraph in question. Paragraph 9 provides: C

"Where, in the case of any dividend, foreign tax not chargeable directly or by deduction in respect of the dividend is, under the arrangements, to be taken into account in considering whether any, and if so what, credit is to be allowed against the United Kingdom taxes in respect of the dividend, the foreign tax not so chargeable which is to be taken into account shall be that borne by the body corporate paying the dividend upon the relevant profits in so far as it is properly attributable to the proportion of the relevant profits which is represented by the dividend . . ." D

Then it proceeds with certain definitions which turn out not so helpful as one might expect:

"The relevant profits are—(a) if the dividend is paid for a specified period, the profits of that period; (b) if the dividend is not paid for a specified period, but is paid out of specified profits, those profits; (c) if the dividend is paid neither for a specified period nor out of specified profits, the profits of the last period for which accounts of the body corporate were made up which ended before the dividend became payable E

"Provided that if, in a case falling under sub-para. (a) or sub-para. (c) of this paragraph, the total dividend exceeds the profits available for distribution of the period mentioned in the said sub-para. (a) or the said sub-para. (c), as the case may be, the relevant profits shall be the profits of that period plus so much of the profits available for distribution of preceding periods (other than profits previously distributed or previously treated as relevant for the purposes of this paragraph) as is equal to the excess; and for the purposes of this proviso the profits of the most recent preceding period shall first be taken into account, then the profits of the next most recent preceding period . . ." F

Then there is another paragraph which I think I am right in saying did not make any difference to what we had to consider. G

The Canadian company had a number of subsidiaries both in Canada and in the United States. In making up the companies' accounts (i.e., the Canadian companies' accounts) in regard to depreciation, they adopted what is called the straight-line basis; i.e., a reduction in the value of the assets concerned was taken so that they would be exhausted (if I may use that phrase) in accordance with their useful working life. The United States and Canada in their taxation provisions, however, pursued a different course. The United States pursued a course called the double declining basis, which was about twice the rate of depreciation of that adopted by the company and would in fact work at such a rate that it was capable of producing, I gather, in the present case, or in certain circumstances perhaps, not a profit at all but a loss. The Canadian statutes also adopted the reducing balance basis. Consequently, it makes a considerable H

A difference whether the basis used by the United States and the Canadian legislation is adopted or whether the basis on which accounts were drawn up for the purpose of the Canadian company was adopted. Indeed, the matter is of great importance, obviously, not only because of the difficulty of the statutory provision which we have to consider, but also because the difference in the amount of the taxation which the taxpayer company may have to pay is over

Four different possible solutions have been put forward, if I understand the arguments correctly. Counsel for the taxpayer company has put forward three, I think, altogether. The first, he says, is that profits, for the purpose of this paragraph, should be treated as for foreign tax. The second which he puts forward is that the dividend should be deemed to be paid primarily out of taxed

C profits, and he bases his contention on Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Sterling Trust, Ltd. (3), a decision of the Court of Appeal, given in 1925. I would say at once that I find it difficult to apply that decision to the circumstances of the present case, and I find, therefore, that it is not really the right one to apply.

The third solution was to adopt the basis used for computation for United Kingdom tax. That was, I think, rather a third choice by counsel for the D taxpayer company, and not one which he favoured. The remaining construction is the one which is put forward on behalf of the Crown, and that is that the dividend should be taken from the profits shown by the taxpayer company's accounts as available for distribution.

Now, I do not propose to go into the facts because very little turns on the facts. It is simply a question, as I have said, of construing those three words "the relevant profits". Anyhow, the case is already reported (4) and I do not think

E it is necessary for me to repeat the Special Case (5).

The first contention on behalf of the taxpayer company has a certain appeal. It seems a natural and logical argument that, if one is calculating relief in respect of a foreign tax and the amount thereof one should take the basis on which those calculations, computations and so forth are made, producing, I suppose

F one might say, like to like. There is, therefore, something to be said for that view, and indeed I thought that the arguments of counsel for the taxpayer company had considerable force. On the whole I have come to the conclusion, however, that it will not really fit in in the present case, and the point which strikes me as of great importance is in sub-para. (c), where there is a reference to "the last period for which accounts of the body corporate were made up".

G If one is going to refer to the period of the accounts for the purpose of computing the allowances under this paragraph, it seems to me that it is logical to take the figures which were given by those accounts. Consequently, I think that that is the right basis. The matter has been very well stated by the Special Commissioners in their Case, where they say:

"In our view we have to decide what are 'relevant profits' [actually, it is

H 'the relevant profits'] for these are the profits with which para. 9 deals, and they are defined later in the same paragraph. We do not think we can pay little or no attention to the word 'relevant' where it occurs in the first paragraph of para. 9. We preface our consideration of the definition of relevant profits by noting that nowhere in para. 9 is there any qualification, 'as computed for the purposes of the foreign tax'; and that dividends are

I in fact paid out of profits available for distribution and not out of a notional figure of assessment. [Sub-paragraph] (a) of the definition provides that if the dividend is paid for a specified period, the relevant profits are the profits of that period. 'Specified period' must mean an accounting period, and in many cases such a period will not be an assessment period. There is no provision for apportioning the figure of assessment to an accounting period. In our view the 'relevant profits' in this clause must be the profits available for distribution as shown by the accounts. [Sub-paragraph] (b) of the definition provides that if a dividend is not paid for a specified period, but out of specified profits, the relevant profits are the specified profits. We think 'the specified profits' must again be the profits available for distribution as shown by the accounts."

I consider sub-para. (c) to be a very important provision. The commissioners say:

"[Sub-paragraph] (c) provides that if the dividend is paid neither for a specified period nor out of specified profits, the relevant profits are those of the last period for which accounts were made up ended before the dividend became payable. In this case it seems to us inescapable that the relevant profits are those we have described above. The proviso refers to 'profits available for distribution' for the first time in para. 9. We do not think that the appearance of this phrase in this place creates any difficulty about our views of the definition of 'relevant profits'."

Then they rejected the taxpayer company's contention.

Cross, J., in his judgment adopted very much the same lines, and I think that he came to the right conclusion. At the conclusion of his judgment he said (6):

"There are not, as I see it, two funds of profits here, the accounts profits, only part of which are taxed, and the assessed profits, all of which bear tax. What are taxed are, I think, the company's profits for the year, whatever they may be; but they are taxed according to a yardstick which may compute them at less or more than they appear in the taxpayer company's accounts."

He concludes that it is the taxpayer company's accounts that is the appropriate figure to go by. I think that the Special Commissioners and the judge (7) have reached the right conclusion, and therefore I would dismiss the appeal.

Case Stated.

G

This was an appeal by way of Case Stated by justices for the county borough of Bournemouth in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court at Bournemouth on Nov. 9, 1967. On Oct. 21, 1967, informations were preferred by the appellant, Arthur Hambleton, against the respondents Michael Anthony Callinan and Michael Robert Farrier that they had in their possession a substance specified in the Schedule to the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964, to wit seventy-one Durophet tablets, and a quantity of amphetamine powder without being duly authorised. On Nov. 9, 1967, an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent Terrence Christopher Graham, that the respondent had in his possession a substance specified in the Schedule to the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964, to wit, a quantity of amphetamine powder without being authorised. The offence in each case was charged as contravention of s. 1 of the Act of 1964. On Oct. 20, 1967, the respondents, Callinan, Farrier and Graham, were arrested by the police on suspicion of being in unlawful possession of drugs. They were asked for and gave to the police samples of urine which were placed in bottles, and immediately were sealed and labelled. The samples were not divided, nor were parts offered to the respondents. The respondents were not cautioned. The samples together with the seventy-one Durophet tablets were analysed. The tablets were found to be in the amphetamine group. Each of the samples was found to contain amphetamine powder and barbiturate. The tablets had a release period of twelve to fourteen hours, no trace being left after twenty-four hours, but the metabolism in individuals was different, making time estimates speculative. The justices found that subject to that element of speculation, the amphetamine could have entered the body some twelve to fourteen hours earlier and that, although the estimated quantity found was in the milligram range in all three cases, it was not possible to say what quantity was at any time in the body or how the amphetamine came into the body. A

* The effect and terms of s. 1 (1), so far as material, are stated at p. 944, letter I, post.

The appellants contended before the justices that Callinan and Farrier were both in possession of the seventy-one Durophet tablets and also of the amphetamine powder found in their urine samples, and that the respondent Graham was in possession of amphetamine by virtue of amphetamine powder having been found in his urine sample. It was contended before the justices for the respondent Farrier that he was not in possession of the tablets, and that he could not be said to be in possession of the amphetamine powder. B

The justices found that the respondents Farrier and Callinan were both in possession of amphetamine, so far as the Durophet tablets were concerned, but that, with regard to the part of the charge relating to amphetamine powder in the urine samples, that powder was not in their possession within the context of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1964 because, among other reasons, once a capsule or tablet entered the blood stream it substantially changed its form, and subsequent urine analysis could deal only with traces of the original capsule or tablet, the amphetamine substance being isolated in the urine by the introduction of an oxalate and recovered as a salt. The justices accordingly found that there was no case to answer on that part of the charge against Farrier and Callinan relating to possession of amphetamine powder in their urine samples and directed that the words "and a quantity of amphetamine powder" be deleted from the charge. The respondent Graham had pleaded guilty, but the justices, having advised him to change his plea to one of "not guilty" found that he had no case to answer and dismissed the charge. C D E

The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the justices were right in law in holding that the finding of amphetamine powder in a urine sample did not amount to possession, as that expression was used in s. 1 (1) of the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964.

LORD PARKER, C.J., having stated the nature of the appeal and referred to the justices' decision, continued: On Oct. 20, 1967, the respondents were arrested by the police on suspicion of being in unlawful possession of drugs. They were asked for and gave urine samples, and on analysis it was found that the urine samples contained traces of this amphetamine powder. It was also found that the Durophet tablets were in the amphetamine group. The prosecution's case was clearly that the amphetamine powder, traces of which were found in the urine, had come from consuming Durophet tablets. It is to be observed that, so far as this Case Stated is concerned, the prosecution's contention was that when there is found in a man's urine traces of amphetamine powder, he is in possession of that powder, contrary to s. 1 (1) of the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act of 1964. That subsection provides that it shall not be lawful for a person to have in his possession a substance for the time being specified in the Schedule to the Act of 1964 G H I

"unless (a) it is in his possession by virtue of the issue of a prescription . . . for its administration by way of treatment to him, or to a person under his care; . . ."

and so on. It was contended by the prosecution, and it has been contended here, that a man can be in possession of a prohibited substance within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act of 1964 if he has traces of it in his urine, in his intestines or any other part of his body in which it can be found. The justices felt that that was a

A wholly artificial conception and that, once one had consumed something and its whole character had altered and no further use could be made of it, as in this case, a man could not be said to be in possession of the prohibited substance.

B For my part, there is little, I think, that can be said in the matter. I am quite satisfied that the justices were right. Counsel for the appellant has said that the may be cases where a man, as it were, consumes something, puts it in his mouth or swallows it, such as a diamond or a gold ring, in order to conceal it, when he may well be in possession of it. I entirely agree but when, as here, something is literally consumed and changed in character, it seems to me impossible to say that a man is in possession of it within the meaning of this Act, and accordingly I would dismiss this appeal.

C But before leaving the matter, I confess that I myself can see no reason why in another case the time when the possession is said to have taken place should not be a time prior to the consumption, because as it seems to me the traces of, in this case, amphetamine powder in the urine is at any rate prima facie evidence—which is all that the prosecution need—that the man concerned must have had it in his possession, if only in his hand prior to raising his hand to his mouth and consuming it. Accordingly, it seems to me that the possible difficulty that the decision in this case raises for the police does not arise in practice because the date of his possession can always be laid prior to the consumption.

E The court is in addition asked to indicate whether in cases such as this there ought to be a caution; whether there ought to be a provision for the splitting of samples and the giving of part to the arrested person; and generally the procedure to be employed. For my part I do not propose to give a ruling. I would only say, quite generally, that the police must act fairly in this and in my judgment that would entail enabling the accused, if he desired it, to have a part of the sample taken. I prefer, in a case which does not directly raise the matter, not to decide whether the absence of a caution or the absence of the giving of a sample would in any way vitiate a conviction.

F WALLER, J.: I agree.

FISHER, J.: I agree. In the recent case of Warner v. Metropolitan Police Comr. (1) decided by the House of Lords, LORD PEARCE said (2):

G “Again LORD PARKER, C.J., in Towers & Co., Ltd. v. Gray (3) after observing that the term ‘possession’ is always giving rise to trouble, and after considering various cases there cited, concluded, rightly as I think, that in each case its meaning must depend on the context in which it was used.”

H The context in the present case, as in Warner’s case (1), is the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964, and it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the word “possess” in that Act is not used in a sense which could cover the present case. One only has to look at s. 1, the list of exceptions, s. 3, the power to search for scheduled substances, and s. 4, the provisions for the disposal of substances in respect of possession of which offences have been committed.

F. v. F.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Danckwerts, Salmon and Fenton Atkinson, L.JJ.), April 25, 26, 1968.]

Divorce—Custody—Estoppel—Adultery—Husband's allegation of adultery by wife with M. at holiday camp rejected at trial of divorce suit—Decree granted to husband on other grounds—Trial judge favourably impressed by M.'s evidence, unfavourably impressed by other witnesses, including husband and wife—Wife intending to marry M.—Subsequent custody proceedings concerning the child of the marriage, a boy aged nearly seven—Husband adduced in these further evidence of wife's adultery with M. at holiday camp—Whether this further evidence admissible notwithstanding doctrine of estoppel or res judicata.

In a defended divorce action brought by the wife the trial judge, in the exercise of her discretion, granted the husband a decree of divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, including one admitted act of adultery with M. The husband also alleged that other adultery occurred between the wife and M., at a holiday camp between July 16 and 23, 1966, but both the wife and M. denied this other adultery in evidence at the trial and the trial judge expressly found that it did not occur. The trial judge stated that she was very favourably impressed by M., and very unfavourably impressed by the husband, the wife and the woman whom the husband later married, and exercised her discretion in favour of the husband in order to enable the wife to marry M. In subsequent proceedings (which were heard by the trial judge) for the custody, care and control of the six year old son of the marriage, the husband sought to adduce further evidence of the alleged adultery at the holiday camp which the trial judge had expressly found did not occur, and of conspiracy by the wife and M. (who had married each other) to deceive the court about this adultery. On appeal by the wife against rejection of her plea of estoppel by res judicata and against a decision to admit this further evidence,

Held: the trial judge had a discretion to admit the further evidence, and had exercised that discretion properly, because—

(i) the further evidence was of a character likely to have a substantial effect on the decision as to custody (see p. 948, letter I, p. 949, letters A, B and I, and p. 950, letters A and I, post).

(ii) if the evidence of the alleged adultery at the holiday camp were true, there had been a deliberate attempt by the wife and M. to deceive the trial judge about this adultery, and evidence of it should not be excluded by estoppel or res judicata (see p. 948, letter I, and p. 950, letters G and I, post).

Quaere (per SALMON and FENTON ATKINSON, L.JJ.) whether or how far the principle of estoppel by res judicata applied in custody proceedings (see p. 950, letters D and I, post).

Interlocutory Appeal.

This was an appeal, by a wife, whose marriage had been dissolved, against the decision of LANE, J., given on Mar. 15, 1968, to allow her former husband to adduce certain further evidence in proceedings between them for the custody, care and control of their son, aged nearly seven; the evidence was directed to establishing adultery by the wife with a Mr. Mason at a holiday camp, and was sought to be adduced notwithstanding that, at the trial of the divorce suit, the allegations of adultery on this occasion had been rejected. The facts are stated in the judgment of DANCKWERTS, L.J.

- B N. Lerron, Q.C. and Margaret Booth for the wife.
C Eric Myers, Q.C. and A. B. Ewbank for the husband.

DANCKWERTS, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of LANE, J., in interlocutory proceedings regarding custody, care and control, of a child who was born on July 20, 1961, and so is now a little under seven, and it arises as an aftermath of a decree nisi obtained in divorce proceedings which were started by the wife, Mrs. Frost, against her husband, Mr. Frost. They were married on Aug. 21, 1960, and the petition was filed on Sept. 20, 1965, in which it was alleged by the wife that the husband had committed adultery with a Mrs. Payne from 1964 inwards.

Originally as the petition was drafted the wife was not asking for discretion, but subsequently her petition was amended after the husband had put in his answer, and she did ask for discretion in respect of a single act of adultery with one of the three parties cited, Mr. Mason. Subsequently the husband put in a supplemental answer. Eventually, on Jan. 25, 1968, the divorce hearing was ended, after nine days. The judge made an order for a decree nisi on the husband's answer, and rejected the petition of the wife, for certain reasons which will appear so far as it is necessary to state them.

- F The judgment delivered by the judge was some thirty-three pages long. I have read it, and I do not propose to go into it more than is absolutely necessary. Of the general atmosphere it could be said that the persons who appear, and who were involved in matters which arose, were most of them members of an amateur dramatic society, and the sort of general atmosphere could be sufficiently indicated if I say that it was difficult to know who was in whose bed at any particular moment.

- G The judge made certain findings. She found that the husband left his wife in February, 1965, with a desire to live with Mrs. Payne. The husband, for his part, had said that the marriage had already broken up before that occurred. The second thing which the judge held was that the wife did in fact commit adultery with one of the parties cited, called Beverley, and that the husband had connived at it. She also held that the charge of adultery with one Vadim, another of the parties cited, was true, and the fourth point is that the judge found that there was one act of adultery by the wife with Mr. Mason, which appeared in the wife's discretion statement, but she rejected the allegation of adultery between Mr. Mason and the wife between July 16 and July 23, 1966, at a holiday camp somewhere near Chichester. Fifthly, the judge considered that Mr. Mason was a truthful witness, and formed, it appears, rather a good opinion of him. Sixthly, she held that the husband was morally responsible for the indiscretions of the wife, but gave him a decree and exercised discretion in his favour with the object of enabling Mr. Mason and the wife to marry, which was a rather unusual result, I would suppose, in divorce proceedings.

I That was the situation, and the judgment of the judge of Mar. 15, 1968, which was the judgment with which we were concerned, arose in the course of proceedings in regard to the custody, care and control, of Mark, the child of the marriage, to whom I have referred. We are not concerned with the outcome, or with deciding the question of custody or care and control, but we are concerned with a certain matter which arose in the course of those proceedings. It was an unusual matter that arose. Affidavits were filed on behalf of the husband, suggesting that Mr. Mason had in fact committed adultery with the wife at the holiday camp in July, 1966, and, further, that there had been a deliberate conspiracy between Mr. Mason and the wife to deceive the judge into deciding as she did, that the adultery had not taken place in any way at the holiday camp.

On the question whether evidence of this should be admitted in the course of what I will call, for short, the custody proceedings, LANE, J., decided, on Mar. 15, 1968, that the evidence was not absolutely barred by res judicata or estoppel, and that it should be admitted because it was fresh evidence which could not have been discovered at the time of the hearing of the divorce petition and might affect her decision in regard to which of the two parties should have the custody or care and control of the child in question.

Two well-known authorities on this subject were cited to us; they were Corbett v. Corbett (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal, and Hull v. Hull (2), a decision of SACHS, J., in which he went very fully into this sort of question. The general result of those decisions is that if a matter has been decided in the divorce proceedings it is res judicata and cannot be reopened, except in very exceptional circumstances. The general rule about the admission of further evidence by the Court of Appeal, which is well recognised, requires also that two conditions shall be satisfied before further evidence shall be admitted, viz., first, that the evidence could not reasonably have been available at the time of the trial, and, secondly, that it must be of a character which would be likely to have a substantial effect on the decision of the relevant appeal.

The judge was satisfied that the evidence was fresh evidence in that sense, and, although I had some doubt about the matter, I am not prepared to disagree with her. She held that she had a discretion, and she exercised it in favour of admitting these affidavits, and gave certain consequential directions as a result of them.

The first point one has to consider is: was the matter res judicata? That is to say, was it an issue which had been decided in the divorce proceedings and not merely a matter which had been raised but not decided; and then, was it proper in the circumstances to consider the admission at all? If so, of course, the second question arises, whether it was right to admit it in the present case.

In this case it was quite clear that the question of whether or not adultery had been committed by the wife with Mr. Mason at the holiday camp was decided by the judge. She decided, adversely to the husband and in favour of the wife and Mr. Mason, that adultery had not taken place. This was in no way a basis for her decision in the divorce proceedings, for she decided to grant a decree nisi on other grounds. As it was not a ground for her decision, the husband could not have based an appeal on her decision on this point, because the decision had no result at all in regard to the outcome of the divorce suit. The question whether any estoppel or res judicata arose in the present case, is, therefore, rather a difficult question, but I find, for a reason which convinces me, that the evidence ought to be admitted. If the evidence which has been put forward is true, it would appear that there was a deliberate attempt by Mr. Mason, and I suppose on the part of the wife, to deceive the judge, and if in fact adultery had been committed at the holiday camp then it was a successful conspiracy to deceive the judge. Therefore it seems to me that the pleas of res judicata or estoppel are not effective in the present case.

I reach the conclusion that it is open to the court to admit this further evidence because, in particular, it might have—I put it no higher than that—important

(1) [1953] 2 All E.R. 69; [1953] P. 205.

(2) [1960] 1 All E.R. 378; [1960] P. 118.

- A results on the decision to which parent the little boy should go. It is important because Mr. Mason's character was so favourably considered by the judge in her judgment, and a somewhat unusual order was made, because she thought that Mr. Mason had the best character—I put it no higher than that—and would be likely to provide a good home and be a good husband to the wife, and to provide an atmosphere in which there might be a happy family in which the little child
- B was to be brought up. If that attitude was not correct, then, of course, the matter requires consideration, and I think that the learned judge was right in exercising her discretion to admit this evidence. Of course it is no indication as to what the ultimate result of the admission might be, but it seems to me not proper to exclude from the proceedings with regard to custody of the child, evidence which may have some importance in the circumstances.
- C I, therefore, would dismiss the appeal.

- SALMON, L.J.: I agree. The divorce case out of which these custody proceedings arise was of a most unsavoury character. The judge took a very unfavourable view of the husband and of the wife, and of Mrs. Payne, the husband's paramour. She thought that both the husband and the wife had
- D committed perjury, and as far as they were concerned, and Mrs. Payne was concerned, the judge thought—and I am not surprised having regard to the very careful judgment which I have read—that there really was nothing to choose between them. The one person who came out with flying colours was Mr. Mason, whom the wife wishes to marry. The judge really regarded him as a knight in shining armour. It is true that his armour was discarded on one occasion, under
- E the most extenuating circumstances; there was a single candidly admitted act of adultery committed between him and the wife.

- The question which faced the judge in the custody proceedings was, in reality, whether this little boy, the only child of the marriage, who was nearly seven years old and had lived most of his life with the wife, his mother—and no criticism was made of her as a mother—should go on living with his mother and with
- F Mr. Mason, after she married him, or whether the boy should be given into the care and control of his father—of whom no criticism could be made as a father—married to the former Mrs. Payne.

- One of the questions which a judge has to consider in deciding a troublesome, difficult, and most important, point of this kind is the character of the parties. On the matter as it stands, unless the judge is entitled to look at the
- G fresh evidence which the father desires to call, she would have to approach the problem on the basis that the one person of impeccable character is Mr. Mason; and this might have some effect on her mind. If everything else were nicely balanced, the scale might just be turned by the consideration that it is in the interests of the child to come under the influence of at least one person who is truthful and honest, and in every way a man of high character. If the evidence
- H which the father now wishes to produce is true it does show that Mr. Mason is far from a truthful witness. During the divorce proceedings he denied on oath that he had committed adultery at the holiday camp in the summer of 1966. He swore positively, as did the mother, that he had not been sleeping there with her during that period. If that evidence was untrue, it had obviously been concocted between them. This would mean that as far as truthfulness was
- I concerned Mr. Mason was very much in the same boat as the mother and father, and possibly Mrs. Payne, so instead of having three people, between whom there is nothing to choose, and one man of impeccable character, there would be four people between whom there is nothing to choose. Since the character of the parties is always an important matter in deciding issues of custody, and care and control, it would be quite wrong, in my view, for the judge to be forced to approach this case, as FENTON ATKINSON, L.J., said in the course of argument, in blinkers.

It is right that the fresh evidence should be before the judge unless there is any legal ground for excluding it. I want to make it quite plain that I am not in the slightest expressing the view that, even if the evidence is true, it will determine the issue. If it is true it shows that the mother and Mr. Mason have behaved quite disgracefully, in committing perjury, but the father and Mrs. Payne have little to commend them from the moral point of view, and it by no means follows that this little boy of nearly seven, who has lived with his mother for most of his life, should now be transferred to his father's care and control. The fresh evidence however is a factor which is relevant, and which the judge thought she ought to consider, and I agree with DANCKWERTS, L.J., that it would be wrong for us to prevent her from doing so.

I wish to reserve the question whether the doctrine of res judicata can apply in any circumstances in custody proceedings. There is the authority of Hull v. Hull (3) in which, in a very careful judgment, the judge who decided that case came to the conclusion that it did apply to custody proceedings, in the sense that if an issue had been decided in the divorce suit between the father and mother, on which the judge decided either to grant a decree or to reject it, then both the father and the mother were bound by that decision even in the custody proceedings, and could not be heard to give any evidence to show that that decision was wrong.

All I desire to say is that I must not be taken as agreeing with that view. It may be right but I am inclined to doubt it. The paramount duty of the court in custody proceedings is to consider what is in the best interests of the child. Of course, in a sense it is a fight between the father and the mother, but the court does not decide it on the basis of whether the mother ought to win or the father ought to win, but chiefly on the basis of what is best for the child. If in such cases the court were to be precluded by the somewhat artificial doctrine of estoppel from considering all the relevant evidence, I think it would be a great pity. I do not think that the child's interests should be sacrificed on the altar of an estoppel existing between the father and mother, nor am I persuaded that the law calls for any such sacrifice.

I doubt whether the principles of public policy, on which the doctrine of res judicata is founded, have any real application in custody proceedings. I am however prepared to approach this case on the assumption that there is such an estoppel. I think that even if there is an estoppel the evidence which the father now seeks to adduce is admissible fresh evidence because it tends to show that the decision in relation to the alleged adultery at the holiday camp was procured by perjury and probably by a conspiracy to deceive the court. It was not available by reasonable diligence at the trial, and should now be admitted.

I repeat that even if the evidence is true, as the judge herself pointed out, it by no means decides this case in favour of sending the child away from his mother, but it is evidence which the judge is entitled to take into account. In her discretion she has considered that it is material and ought to be heard. I certainly would not disagree with her.

I would dismiss the appeal.

FENTON ATKINSON, L.J.: I agree with my lords and I would only add this, that, like SALMON, L.J., I would not at this stage wish to express any firm view as to how far the res judicata principle would apply in the custody proceedings.

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Section 157 (1) (c)* of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, creates an absolute offence (see p. 955, letter E, post), viz., failure by a bankrupt, after being required in accordance with s. 157 (1) (c) to account for the loss of any substantial part of his estate within the statutory period, to give a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the loss was incurred.

Accordingly in summing-up to a jury on a charge under s. 157 (1) (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the jury should be directed that, if they are satisfied as regards the total sum of money constituting "the loss of any substantial part of" the bankrupt's estate that he had not at the time of the alleged failure given, with such reasonable detail as was appropriate in the circumstances, an explanation which was both reasonably clear and true of how that sum was made up, or of how it came to be lost, and where the money had gone, then the offence had been committed (see p. 958, letter G, post). Moreover, reasons for the failure to make explanation and the motive leading to the failure are irrelevant to the question whether the offence has been committed (see p. 958, letter I, post).

Appeal.

This was an appeal by Percy Horace Salter, a bankrupt, against his conviction on a majority verdict at Bedfordshire quarter sessions on Nov. 24, 1967, before the deputy chairman (H. W. SABIN, Esq.) and a jury of an offence contrary to s. 157 (1) (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The count charged that between June 1 and Dec. 2, 1966, the appellant, being a person who had been adjudged bankrupt and having been engaged in trade or business in the firm of Phoenix Heating and having outstanding at the date of the receiving order debts contracted in the course of and for the purposes of such trade or business, on being required by the Official Receiver and in the course of public examination by the court to account for loss of any substantial part of the appellant's estate, incurred within the period of a year next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition and between that date and the date of the receiving order, failed to give a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which such a loss was incurred, namely, the net loss of £10,569 5s. 10d. arising from carrying on business from Feb. 28, 1965, to Jan. 6, 1966. The appellant was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, against which he also appealed. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court (see p. 957, letter A, post).

The case noted below* was cited during the argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment of the court.

May 6. SACHS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court in which, after stating the appellant's conviction and the nature of the appeal, he continued: The essence of the prosecution case—to which fuller reference will be made in a later part of this judgment—was that the appellant had incurred a trading loss of some £10,500 in the short space of the six or seven months preceding September, 1965: that attempts were made on several occasions, including the various hearings of the appellant's public examination (the last being on Dec. 1, 1966) to obtain an explanation of how that loss was incurred; and that no explanation—or at least no satisfactory explanation—was furnished by the appellant in any account or narrative statement supplied by him. The defence in brief, as appears from the transcript of the summing-up, was that, whilst he realised

“it was my duty to do everything that Mr. Stephenson [the examiner] required of me and to show him how the loss of £10,500 had been sustained,”

he had a full time job that made it very difficult to produce the explanations and figures, and that he had done the best that he could to give accurate information.

Those being the respective cases for the prosecution and the defence, the learned deputy chairman directed the jury on the law as follows:

“The first matter that you might decide about is whether you are satisfied or not that he did fail, within this period, of course, between June 1 and Dec. 2, 1966, to give a satisfactory explanation. If you decide that he did, then you must go on to consider if [the appellant's] failure to provide a satisfactory explanation was with intent to deceive or in order to evade the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. [Counsel for the prosecution] yesterday in his speech, and he confirmed it again to me this morning you remember, indicated that the prosecution was not suggesting [the appellant] had been guilty of an intention to deceive here and they were relying on the second leg of that and they say he was evading the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act—trying to evade the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act. So leave out any question of intent to deceive, don't trouble about that, and if you do find there was a failure to give a satisfactory explanation, then go on to consider whether he was trying to evade the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, and whether that was his intention.”

* Sherras v. de Rutzen, [1895-99] All E.R. Rep. 1167; [1895] 1 Q.B. 918.

- A In giving that direction as to the need to find either an intent to deceive or an intent to evade the provisions of the Act of 1914 before they could convict, the deputy chairman was adopting the direction given to a jury by the common serjeant in R. v. Phillips (1) as cited in para. 3666 of ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE (36th Edn., 1966). He next went on to explain the words "trying to evade the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act" by giving as an example the man who said in effect to the official receiver: "I don't care a fig for your Act; I'm not going to comply with it." He continued:

"But if you thought the reason was not that, but that it was just due to inadvertence, carelessness and not bothering, then, members of the jury, the prosecution would not have proved it in that case and you would find him not guilty."

- C The jury having convicted the appellant after being thus directed, he now appeals on a number of grounds, one of which is that there was no evidence of an attempt to evade the provisions of the Act, and another that, if he had done his best, then no offence had been committed.

- D [HIS LORDSHIP then briefly disposed of two points not material to this report, concluding that they were without substance, and continued:] It is now convenient to turn to the two main points of law which fall to be considered. The first is whether, in order to establish that an offence has been committed under s. 157 (1) (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the prosecution has to prove that the accused had an intent to deceive, or to evade the provisions of the Act; or whether that subsection creates an absolute offence which is complete once it is shown that there has been no satisfactory explanation. The second is as to the correct meaning of the words "satisfactory explanation"; counsel for the appellant having submitted that an explanation is "satisfactory" if the accused has done his best, even if that best does not in fact result in there being an explanation. Section 157 (1) (c) provides:

- F "Any person who has been adjudged bankrupt, or in respect of whose estate a receiving order has been made, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, if, having been engaged in any trade or business, and having outstanding at the date of the receiving order any debts contracted in the course and for the purposes of such trade or business, . . . (c) on being required by the official receiver at any time, or in the course of his public examination by the court, to account for the loss of any substantial part of his estate incurred within a period of a year next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, or between that date and the date of the receiving order, he fails to give a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which such loss was incurred . . ."

- G The principles on which a court determines whether or not an absolute offence has been created by a statute have been much canvassed of recent years and are plain. Generally speaking there is a presumption (cf., Lim Chin Aik v. Reginam (2), in the Privy Council) against the creation of such an offence and in favour of some form of mens rea being required to be an ingredient of the offence. The court has to look, however, at the particular field of activity with which the statute is concerned, at the mischief which that statute seeks to prevent, at the language of the relevant section and, in many cases, at the language of adjacent sections—in other words at the structure of that part of the statute which is under interpretation. From a consideration of such of those matters as are in the particular case relevant the court may find it clear that an absolute offence has been created. As regards the first and second of those considerations, it is not necessary or practicable to list all the objectives with which the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, is concerned. Suffice it to mention that, amongst other things, it seeks to gather in to the bankrupt's estate certain of the assets disposed of by him shortly before the bankruptcy (the sections dealing with fraudulent preferences and setting aside settlements are in point), to facilitate the tracing of those assets, to deter those who trade from so carrying on their business or from so dealing with its assets that creditors are deprived of the benefit of assets which in justice should have been available to them, and to ensure that the bankrupt co-operates fully and effectively with those concerned with the administration of his estate. A

It is against that background that Part 7 of the Act of 1914, "Bankruptcy Offences", which commences with s. 154, falls to be interpreted. That section and those which follow it, up to and including s. 160, are in the main devoted to creating a very considerable number of offences with a view to inflicting penalties on those who have acted in a way which has tended to defeat one or other of the objectives of the statute. It is relevant to examine the general structure and language of those seven sections. Section 154 (1)—"Fraudulent debtors"—contains sixteen paragraphs, each creating an offence or offences. Seven paragraphs, after setting out the ingredient of the offences, end "unless he proves that he had no intent to defraud", e.g., para. (6): B

"If he makes any material omission in any statement relating to his affairs, unless he proves that he had no intent to defraud:" D

Three paragraphs, after setting out the ingredients of the offence, end "unless he proves that he had no intent to conceal the state of his affairs or to defeat the law". The remainder, except for para. (7), contain provisions which clearly show that one form or another of mens rea is an ingredient in the offence.

Section 155 contains two paragraphs neither of which provides expressly for any form of mens rea, neither have a proviso of the types contained in some of the paragraphs of s. 154 (1), and one of which (s. 155 (a)) (obtaining credit to the extent of £10 or upwards) has been the subject of the well-known decision in R. v. Duke of Leinster (3), to which further references will be made. Section 156 ("Frauds by bankrupts, etc.") specifically refers in each paragraph to fraud or intent to defraud. Section 157 is the one under consideration by this court. Section 158 ("Bankrupt failing to keep proper accounts") (4) provides, in sub-s. (1) (b) for exculpation "if he proves that in the circumstances in which he traded or carried on business the omission was honest and excusable", and in R. v. Dandridge (5), it was held that to prove the omission was "honest" was not of itself enough if it was not shown to be also "excusable". Section 159 and s. 160 refer to absconding and false claims in terms which clearly show that mens rea is an essential ingredient in the offences they constitute. E

It is thus apparent that the legislature has exercised considerable care to specify the instances where mens rea is an ingredient of the offence and to make plain the instances where a bankrupt by discharging an onus laid on him can exculpate himself from what might otherwise be held to be an absolute offence. In R. v. Duke of Leinster (3), it was held that s. 155 (a) created an absolute offence and thus that, if the person giving credit to an undischarged bankrupt had not in fact received the information that he was giving credit to such a bankrupt, it was no defence for the bankrupt to show that he had told his agent to give that information to the person concerned and had reasonable cause to believe that this had been done. Counsel for the appellant submitted that that case was wrongly decided—or, alternatively, that it could be distinguished on the ground that s. 155 (a) imposed an affirmative duty to do an act, whilst s. 157 (1) (c) was concerned with a failure to do an act; in the latter behalf, he relied on passages in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in Harding v. Price (6), which, however, have found no favour in the speech of LORD REID in the very recently decided case of F

A Warner v. Metropolitan Police Comr. (7). He further submitted that the following directions given by the common serjeant in R. v. Phillips (8) were correct. In the report it is stated:

B “He [the common serjeant] thought it really came to this—the jury had still to consider whether this man knowingly and with intent to deceive or to evade the Act either made statements which were unsatisfactory in the sense that they were untrue or grossly exaggerated or intentionally evasive or statements which he made not caring one way or the other whether they were true or not. He further said he thought that this view of the section was correct because it was clear from s. 164 that a guilty intent was made a necessary ingredient in all misdemeanours under this Act.”

C It is at this stage convenient to note that s. 157 (1) has three paragraphs, of which para. (a) and para. (b) make it an offence for a bankrupt to have materially contributed to or increased the extent of the insolvency by gambling or by rash and hazardous speculations (unconnected with the bankrupt's trade) before the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, or thus to lose “any part of his estate” afterwards. In neither is there any language importing mens rea.

D Having examined the language of s. 157 (1) (c) in the light of the objectives of the Act of 1914 and the adjacent sections of Part 7 thereof, this court is unable to accept counsel for the appellant's submissions, considers it to be clear that R. v. Duke of Leinster (9) was correctly decided, and that the directions given in R. v. Phillips (8) (which has long been treated in more than one text book as of doubtful authority) were wrong. Section 157 (1) (c) creates an absolute offence, and to hold otherwise would result in introducing a proviso to this paragraph of a type which the legislature has carefully refrained from enacting. If the submissions of counsel for the appellant were correct, there would have been added words to the effect that the bankrupt could exculpate himself by showing that his failure was “honest and excusable”. That would, moreover, incidentally defeat the obvious intent of the paragraph and leave a glaring gap in the provisions of the Act, which are concerned with ensuring that no-one can go bankrupt and then fail without penalty to give some satisfactory explanation of what he has done with a substantial part of his assets.

E In relation to the absolute offence created by s. 157 (1) (c), it is to be observed that the bankrupt is fully protected against oppressive or officious prosecutions by the combined effects of s. 157 (2), which makes an order of the court a condition precedent to proceedings being taken; by the introduction into s. 161 (see s. 8 of the Bankruptcy (Amendment) Act, 1926) of the provision that, before an order issues, it must appear to the court, inter alia, “that the circumstances are such as to render a prosecution desirable”; and by s. 165, which designates and limits the potential prosecutors. There are thus ample safeguards against proceedings being taken by vindictive or over-eager creditors or being initiated when they would not be appropriate, e.g., if the failure flowed from loss of memory supervening as the result of some accident. Indeed, the court has learnt that prosecutions under this subsection are rare.

H At this point, it is convenient to mention that counsel for the appellant relied on s. 164 (3) of the Act of 1914. This, in its amended form, after the deletion (10) in 1933 of the obsolete provision relating to the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, somewhat oddly reads:

I “Every misdemeanour under this Act . . . and when any person is charged with any such misdemeanour before a court of summary jurisdiction the court shall take into consideration any evidence adduced before them tending to show that the act charged was not committed with a guilty intent.”

(10) By the Administration of Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1933, s. 10 (3) and Sch. 3.

This subsection was cited to the common serjeant in R. v. Phillips (11), and also to the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Dandridge (12), as showing that some guilty intent was an ingredient in all the offences created by the various provisions of Part 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. That point caused the common serjeant to give the directions referred to in this judgment. It does not seem to have affected the judgment in R. v. Dandridge (12) it is to be noted that no attempt was made in R. v. Duke of Leinster (13) by counsel very experienced in the criminal law to place that subsection before the court as being relevant to the point there is issue.

Counsel for the appellant submitted that this subsection should be construed in the same way as if it did not contain the words "before a court of summary jurisdiction", and thus as if it provided that a guilty intent should be an ingredient in all offences created by the Act—contending that it could not be tenable that a guilty intent should be relevant in the magistrates' court but not in the court where the accused came to trial. This court, however, considers that there is a clear explanation for the apparently curious wording of that subsection which reads so oddly in its present truncated form. As counsel for the Crown pointed out in his careful and lucid argument, s. 164 (3) of the Act of 1914 is the lineal successor of s. 18 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

The Act of 1869 contained a series of provisions which, save for minor changes in language, are substantially the same as those of s. 154 of the Act of 1914 and the relevant offences could, by virtue of s. 20 of the Act of 1869, be tried at quarter sessions—but not by courts of summary jurisdiction. Section 18 of the Act of 1869 commenced with the same provision as was later embodied in s. 164 (3) of the Act of 1914, viz., that all the offences were subject to the provisions of the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859. Thus, the latter part of s. 18 was clearly an admonition or reminder to magistrates that already at the stage of committal proceedings they should take into account any evidence tendered on behalf of the defence under those provisos which enabled a bankrupt to exculpate himself. When a number of the provisions of the Act of 1869 came to be replaced first by provisions of the Bankruptcy and Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1913, and then by provisions of the Act of 1914, no material change was made in what had originally been s. 18 of the Act of 1869 to meet the fact that the relevant offences became in 1913 triable summarily—but the meaning of s. 164 (3) on a correct interpretation did not alter. Later, the excision from s. 164 (3) of the provisions relating to the Vexatious Indictments Act, 1859, on the abolition of grand juries, served further to confuse anyone who was unaware of the previous history of the matter. It became an odd and superfluous remnant—but its meaning remained unaltered.

It is in those circumstances that this court has come to the clear conclusion that s. 164 (3) remains no more than an admonition or reminder—which would not be necessary in a modern statute—to magistrates to take into account already at committal proceedings any evidence tendered on behalf of the bankrupt under the numerous exculpatory provisos to be found in Part 7 of the Act of 1914. The subsection should thus be read as if the words "shall take into consideration" were followed by "where relevant". It thus has no effect on the correct interpretation of s. 157 (1) (c), any more than it had on s. 155 (a) in the Leinster case (13).

In view of the conclusion that the offence created by s. 157 (1) (c) is absolute, it is not necessary to consider the appellant's contention that there was no evidence on which the jury could reasonably conclude that he had an intention to evade the Act of 1914. How difficult it would have been for him to succeed on that point will, however, be plain from the recital of those facts which are relevant to the issue whether there was a failure to give a satisfactory explanation.

A Those facts now fall to be considered before dealing with counsel for the appellant's submission on the second main issue of law.

The appellant's bankruptcy arose out of his trading in partnership under the name of Phoenix Heating. That trading ceased about September, 1965; a receiving order was made on Jan. 6, 1966, and the adjudication was made on Jan. 17, 1966. The last full trading accounts of the business were prepared up to B Feb. 28, 1965, and showed a net profit. That the loss of about £10,500 occurred in the succeeding six or seven months was conceded by the appellant in the course of his public examination.

The preliminary examination took place on Jan. 10 and 11, 1966, and this was supplemented by narrative statements compiled by the appellant and dated Jan. 11 and Feb. 7. These latter documents accounted for the C failure of the business in very general terms. There followed the public examination, and this commenced on Mar. 24, 1966. The appellant and his partner were then ordered to lodge a statement of affairs within fourteen days, were offered assistance, and were warned to avoid delay, to reply to letters and they were warned also of the risks of not complying with the requirements of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. After an unsatisfactory statement of affairs (disclosing the loss of more D than £10,000) which needed amendment had been lodged on Apr. 4, 1966, there was an adjourned public examination on June 2. On this occasion the appellant accepted that an explanation was required of the trading loss (by then found to be about £10,500) and that his co-operation and initiative was required for this purpose. Up to that date he had done no more in effect than blame the insolvency on the departure of the partners and a salesman, and to suggest that much of the E financial loss was due to his having in kindness retained too long in his service canvassers and others (a point much stressed by his counsel on the hearing of this appeal).

It is not necessary to embark in detail on the course of the subsequent proceedings which included adjourned public examinations on Aug. 18, Oct. 27 and Dec. 1, 1966. Suffice it to say that, despite further directions given to the F appellant on June 2, 1966, he did not between June 2 and Aug. 18, 1966, reply to letters and did not during that period, apart from going to see the trustee on Aug. 4, do anything as he put it beyond "scratching his head and scratching about with bits of papers". Despite his assertions that he had been unable to conform to the directions, he was warned on Aug. 18, 1966, that he was running a risk of being prosecuted under s. 157. Although an order for a cash account was in effect withdrawn, a stern warning was given against lack of industry and laziness in complying to the order to produce satisfactory material which it was G recommended should include this cash account.

October 27, 1966, was an occasion when there was an adjournment after an amended statement of affairs had been lodged and a cash account has been received on Oct. 26, which, however, went no further than June 23, H 1965, and showed that, at that date, so far as the cash account was concerned, the receipts had exceeded the outgoings. On Oct. 27, reference was made to the fact that, despite the incompleteness of the cash account there had been something of a change of heart and that it appeared that some attempts were then being made to lodge some account which supported the enormous trading loss; it was for this reason that the further adjournment to I Dec. 1, 1966, was given to enable them to put things in order. Advice was given to get immediately into touch with the examiners. On Nov. 16, 1966, the appellant was sent a letter reminding him of his obligations, fixing an appointment for Nov. 24, 1966, and offering an earlier appointment if he so wished. The appellant, however, did not reply to the letter though a franked envelope had been enclosed, nor did he keep the appointment, though on the last-mentioned date he did telephone and suggest a later meeting. At the further adjourned public examination of Dec. 1, 1966, the appellant admitted that all that he had done since the last hearing was to write to the trustee for some cancelled cheques and to obtain a statement from the bank for the period June 23 to July 23, 1965—something which he could well have done very much earlier. In fact, on Dec. 1, 1966, he had supplied no further information to the official receiver or the court. A

The position on Dec. 1, 1966, can thus be summarised as follows. Despite the lengthy period during which the appellant's affairs had been under examination, despite the appellant having been repeatedly reminded of the requirement to given an explanation of the loss of the £10,500, and despite having been from time to time offered the assistance of officials in the matter, the only account which he had produced was a cash account that did not cover an important part of the relevant period and which, moreover (to the limited extent that a cash account can go), showed that, despite the inclusion in it of all disbursements to salesmen and canvassers, there was some surplus at the end of the period covered; there was no account showing how the loss was composed or where the money had gone to; and no material had been produced on which it could be checked whether the suggestion that the continued employment of an excessive number of salesmen and canvassers might account for some part of the loss—and at best that excessive employment could not on the figures available have constituted more than a partial explanation of the loss. There was thus on Dec. 1, 1966, in substance no real explanation at all of how the loss was composed and had been incurred, or of where the money had gone—and there was ample material on which a jury could find that the appellant had been, at least, extremely lacking in diligence despite his contention that he had made every effort to comply with the requirements of the registrar. B C D

Counsel for the appellant, however, drew attention to the absence from the summing-up of any precise direction as to how far the jury might take into account the fact that the appellant might well have been "doing his best" as a defence to a charge of having failed to give an explanation. He submitted that, in connexion with the issue whether the appellant had given a satisfactory explanation, the jury should have been directed that they could apply the test previously mentioned, viz., that, if the bankrupt has done his best to supply an explanation but has been unable to provide one, then he has not failed to give a satisfactory explanation even if, in the result, he has given no explanation at all. The court rejects that submission. A jury should be directed that, if they are satisfied as regards the total sum of money constituting "the loss of any substantial part of his estate" that the bankrupt had not at the time of the alleged failure given, with such reasonable detail as was appropriate in the circumstances, an explanation which is both reasonably clear and true of how that sum was made up (for the loss may be composed of more than one component), of how it came to be lost, and of where the money has gone, then the offence has been committed. The degree of particularity required of the bankrupt may vary greatly according to the facts of the case; sums which are really small in relation to "the substantial part of the estate" need not of course be traced, but an explanation unsupported by sufficient detail can be very unsatisfactory indeed. E F G H

Section 157 (1) (c) intends to and does, in the interests of the business community as a whole, put in peril the man who goes bankrupt without having so conducted his affairs as to be able satisfactorily to explain why some substantial loss has been incurred. It is as well to make it plain that, as the offence is absolute, it follows that, once a prosecution has been initiated, no issue arises before verdict as to the reasons why the failure has occurred or as to any motive which led to that failure. Thus, questions such as whether the failure was due to lack of diligence or occurred despite diligence or whether at the material time the bankrupt was simply being stupid when dealing with the inquiry, or on the other hand had an intention to conceal something or was motivated by a desire to flout the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, only arise after verdict when sentence is under consideration. Passages in the summing-up by the common serjeant in I

A R. v. Phillips (14) which express a contrary view stem from his erroneous conclusion as to the effect of s. 164 (3) of the Act of 1914; they should not be followed.

In conclusion, there is one further point to be noted. On the one hand counsel for the Crown rightly submitted that s. 157 as a homogeneous whole was clearly designed to protect the interests of the business community, and called the attention of the court to the fact that sub-s. (1) (a) in effect created a "retrospective offence" (by causing that which was not criminal at the time it was done to become criminal if it so happened that the person who did it became bankrupt within the next two years). He put the point in issue under sub-s. (1) (c) in lay terms: "If you lose a substantial part of your estate and go bankrupt you had better have and give a satisfactory explanation." As against that, he disclaimed any suggestion that, sub-s. (1) (c) should be interpreted as eiusdem generis with sub-ss. (1) (a) and (b) to the extent that the true explanation would not be "satisfactory" if the loss was due to unsatisfactory conduct parallel to that of gambling and hazardous speculation, e.g., wanton extravagance when he knew he was going bankrupt, or wilful destruction of assets to prevent them from falling into the hands of some disliked creditor. That point, of course, is one that does not arise in the present case and the court is thus not concerned to consider it.

I
In the upshot, this court considers for the reasons already given that the summing-up was wrong in law in so far as it followed a long-standing precedent based on an erroneous view of s. 164 (3); but for that very reason the summing-up was unduly favourable to the appellant and, had it been correct in law, the jury must have even more inevitably returned a verdict of guilty. There is, accordingly, no good ground for disturbing that verdict and the appeal against conviction was thus dismissed on Apr. 9, 1968.

The appeal having been dismissed and the reasons for so doing having been formulated before the decision of the House of Lords in Warner v. Metropolitan Police Comrs. (15), it is as well to add that this court, having considered the speeches delivered in that case, finds nothing in them that is inconsistent with the above reasons and much that supports them. It has, moreover, been noted that LORD REID cited (16) R. v. Duke of Leinster (17) without any indication of adverse comment (16).

As regards the application for leave to appeal against sentence, if a court comes to the conclusion that the bankrupt's failure to give a satisfactory explanation is due to his deliberately flouting the Act of 1914, there is nothing wrong in principle with imposing a custodial sentence. In the present case, however, the appellant, who had been allowed bail which took effect just over a month after his conviction, must have suffered prolonged anxiety during the pendency and hearing of this appeal. It was for this reason that the court decided that the application be granted; and that the hearing having by consent been treated as the appeal, it would be clement to reduce the sentence to one month's imprisonment.

Appeal dismissed. Sentence varied. The court refused to certify under s. 1 of the Administration of Justice Act 1965, that a point of law of general public importance was involved.

HANYET SECURITIES, LTD. v. MALLETT AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION (Harman, Russell and Widgery, L.JJ.),
May 21, 22, 1968.]

Moneylender—Memorandum Contents—Element of machinery for effecting transaction, not essential term of contract—Loan to be secured on lease—Borrower to pay premium for lease—Part of loan intended to be used, and used, to meet premium—Premium in fact paid, and lease obtained, by lender's solicitor as agent for borrower's solicitor before loan completed—Memorandum not stating that premium to be met out of loan—Whether memorandum complied with Moneylenders Act, 1927 (17 & 18 Geo. 5 c. 21), s. 6 (2).

Although the memorandum required by s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, must "contain all the terms of the contract" for the repayment of the money lent, it need not specify mere matters of machinery by which those terms are to be carried into effect (see p. 965, letter E, and p. 967, letters B and I, post).

A borrower who wished to purchase a lease for a premium of £500, to be paid to the lessor, arranged a loan of £2,000 from a registered moneylender, to be secured on the lease. It was contemplated by the parties that part of the £2,000 would be used by the borrower to pay the £500 for the lease, and the borrower's solicitor's costs on the lease, and it was eventually arranged by their solicitors that the moneylenders' solicitor should, as agent for the borrower's solicitor, pay the £500 and obtain the lease. The moneylenders' solicitor did this, and then completed the loan by completing the necessary documents and paying the balance of the £2,000 as directed by the borrower. The memorandum of the contract signed by the borrower*, as required by s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, stated the borrower's willingness to execute a legal charge of the property comprised in the lease as security for the loan, but did not state that part of the loan was to be used to pay the premium on the lease. In an action by the moneylenders for repayment of the loan and interest, and possession of the leasehold property charged as security, the trial judge held that the whole contract was unenforceable because the memorandum did not state that part of the loan was to be used to pay the premium, and so did not "contain all the terms of the contract" as required by s. 6 (2)† of the Act of 1927. On appeal by the moneylenders,

Held: although the use of part of the loan to pay the premium enured for the moneylenders' benefit, it was not on the facts a term of the contract (payment of the premium out of the loan not having been insisted on by the moneylenders) but was merely part of the machinery used to enable the borrower to charge the lease as security, and so did not need to be specified in the memorandum (see p. 966, letter E, and p. 967, letters C and I, post).

A Appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff moneylenders, Hanyot Securities, Ltd., against the judgment of PENNYCUICK, J., dated Oct. 26, 1967, and reported [1967] 3 All E.R. 943, dismissing their action for £2,000 money lent, and interest thereon, and for possession of leasehold premises charged as security for the loan, against the borrower, Mrs. Olga Mallett, and the guarantor of the loan, Robert Winston Dawson. The facts are set out in the judgment of WIDGERY, L.J.

B. Finlay, Q.C., and Guy Seward for the plaintiff moneylenders.

A. Garfitt for the defendants, the borrower and the guarantor.

WIDGERY, L.J., delivered the first judgment at the invitation of HARMAN, L.J.: The plaintiff company are registered moneylenders and by the originating summons in this matter they claim, against the first defendant, the borrower, as principal debtor and the second defendant as guarantor, the repayment of a loan consisting of a principal sum of £2,000 and interest. Further, they claim against the borrower possession of leasehold premises known as 22, Albion Street, Westminster, which were charged as security for the loan. In the court below (1) a variety of defences was raised by the defendants against this claim, but of those defences only one succeeded. The successful defence was that the whole contract was unenforceable against the defendants by virtue of s. 6 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, owing, it was said, to the absence from the memorandum of agreement of one of the terms of the contract. The term of the contract alleged to be missing was a term to the effect that of the £2,000 advanced part should be applied in paying a premium on the acquisition of the leasehold property at 22, Albion Street which was the security for the loan.

I look briefly at s. 6 before going further. Subsection (1) provides that no contract for the repayment by a borrower of money lent by a moneylender and no security in respect of the loan shall be enforceable unless a note or memorandum in writing is duly prepared and signed. Subsection (2) provides:

“The note or memorandum aforesaid shall contain all the terms of the contract, and in particular shall show the date on which the loan is made, the amount of the principal of the loan, and, either the interest charged on the loan expressed in terms of a rate per cent. per annum . . .”

or otherwise as there provided.

The judge below, with some reluctance, accepted (2) the submission that the term to which I have referred was a term of the contract, and it being not within the terms of the memorandum he dismissed the moneylenders' claim. It is from that order that the moneylenders now appeal.

The borrower, the first defendant, is the former wife of a Mr. George Dawson, who is also the father of the second defendant, the guarantor. In November, 1965, Mr. George Dawson, who at all material times was an undischarged bankrupt, required a loan of money (and £2,000 seems to have been the figure which he had in mind), and since he was an undischarged bankrupt he required some other nominee to act as (as it has been said) a “front” for him. It is clear that the borrower had no interest in this matter except to be a nominee for Mr. George Dawson. She did as he told her; she signed documents that he put before her; but it was Mr. George Dawson who carried out all the negotiations on her behalf. First of all it seems that he approached a Mr. Halsall for this loan. Mr. Halsall was a man to whom he already owed £550. Mr. Halsall declined to make a further loan to Mr. George Dawson, but put him in touch with the plaintiff moneylenders. It is not, I think, necessary to go in any detail into the part which Mr. Halsall played in this affair, but as the hearing continued and as the court was told more and more about Mr. Halsall it became apparent that he had had a very close interest in the matter. Indeed, not only did he approach the moneylenders asking them as a favour to him to make this loan to Mr. George Dawson, or to the borrower on Mr. George Dawson's behalf, but it seems quite clear that he saw in this a means of being repaid the £550 which he was already owed, and apparently at some stage at any rate he put up some collateral security for the moneylenders to secure this loan. However that may be, it is quite evident that an agreement was made between Mr. George Dawson and the moneylenders for the making of the loan in question. One of the reasons, undoubtedly, why Mr. George Dawson wanted money was because he sought to complete a transaction with the Church Commissioners under which he was to be granted a lease of 22, Albion Street for a period of 10 $\frac{3}{4}$  years at a rack rent and in consideration of a premium of £500. It seems quite clear that Mr. George Dawson had not got £500, nor had the borrower, and that one of the objects in trying to secure this loan was to put Mr. George Dawson in funds to pay this premium. In the outcome, and largely as a result of a oral negotiations between Mr. George Dawson and Mr. Halsall, an agreement was made. The substance of that agreement was that the moneylenders would lend the borrower £2,000 at forty-five per cent. interest, that sum being secured in three ways: first by a charge on the lease of No. 22, Albion Street, secondly by a post-dated cheque which the borrower was to provide on the making of the loan, and thirdly by a guarantee by the guarantor, Mr. R. W. Dawson.

(1) [1967] 3 All E.R. 943.

(2) [1967] 3 All E.R. at p. 950.

For the purposes of this judgment I assume without hesitation that it was at all times known by all persons concerned that Mr. George Dawson required to use £500 out of this loan for the purpose of paying the premium on the lease. That that was a factor known to everyone, whether it strictly concerned them or not, I think is clearly established by the evidence to which we have been referred. The initial negotiations were conducted orally. The first written record of the progress of the transaction is contained in a letter dated Nov. 24, 1965, written by Mr. Greene—who was the solicitor for the moneylenders and also, incidentally, for Mr. Halsall—to a Mr. Martelli, who was acting as solicitor for the borrower. The letter is headed “22, Albion Street, W.2”, and the material paragraphs read as follows:

“Our clients [the moneylenders] have arranged, subject to contract, to advance to your client [the borrower] the sum of £2,000 on the security of the above property and at the specific request of Mr. George Dawson we have today forwarded to him the legal charge for execution by [the borrower] together with memorandum under the Moneylenders Act and authorisation as to the proceeds of the advance. We enclose copies of all three documents for you . . . You will see that on completion of the advance the sum of £537 9s. 6d. will be payable to you to enable you to complete the grant of the lease of the property and the payment of your costs and disbursements. We shall of course wish to attend on completion and will provide a banker's draft payable to the Church Commissioners for England or to whoever else will require the purchase monies and a separate cheque for your costs.”

The point is understandably made that when Mr. Greene wrote that letter he was clearly fully informed as to the need which the borrower had to pay the premium for the lease out of the £2,000 proposed to be advanced.

The documents sent with that letter were three in number. The legal charge requires no further comment, because it was in common form. The memorandum under the Moneylenders Act, 1927, was subsequently amended in some particulars, and I will refer to its finally amended form as it was signed by the borrower on Dec. 7, 1965. It is addressed to the moneylenders. It reads:

“I, Olga Mallett of 24, Spring Gardens, Rayleigh, Essex, feme sole, am willing to borrow from you on Dec. 9, 1965, the principal sum of £2,000 to be repaid on Apr. 9, 1966. Interest will be charged at the rate of forty-five per centum per annum and shall be payable on Apr. 9, Aug. 9, and Dec. 9 in each year commencing on Apr. 9, 1966. As security for the said principal

A sum and interest I am willing to execute under seal in your favour a legal charge of my leasehold property known as 22, Albion Street, London, W.2. As further security for the said principal sum and interest I have today handed to you a post-dated cheque for £2,300 dated Apr. 9, 1966, being as to £2,000 in respect of the principal monies and £300 in respect of interest for the period from the date of the loan to Apr. 9, 1966. As further security B for the said principal sum and interest Robert Winston Dawson will enter into a guarantee in the terms of the document annexed hereto for repayment by me of the said principal sum and interest. The said legal charge shall contain a covenant for repayment of the principal sum aforesaid and shall also contain the terms and be in the form annexed hereto. Signed by Olga Mallett Dec. 7, 1965, before the loan is made and before the security is given."

C The third document, which is the authorisation, is quite short, and it is in these terms. It is signed by the borrower; it is addressed to the moneylenders.

"With reference to the loan being made to me upon the security of 22, Albion Street, London, W.2, I hereby authorise you to pay the said loan to the following persons in the sums hereinafter mentioned: £550 to Stephen D Anderton Halsall; £537 9s. 6d. to B. A. Martelli my solicitor of 90, Oakeley Street, S.W.3; £912 10s. 6d. to George Dawson: total £2,000."

It is, I think, clear that that last document on its face does not appear to be a contractual document at all. The moneylenders having agreed to lend this money to the borrower, would naturally not be prepared to pay it to anyone else without her authority, and on the face of it this document is merely an authorisation to E the moneylenders to pay the £2,000 as directed therein. The sum of £537 9s. 6d. to be paid to Mr. Martelli in fact represents £500 paid for premium on the lease and £37 9s. 6d. for his costs.

It cannot, in my judgment, be said in this case that the whole of this authorisation is in any sense incorporated in the contract of loan; nor, I think, in fairness to counsel for the defendants, did he attempt so to argue. It has never been contended that the direction for payment of £912 10s. 6d. to Mr. George Dawson F was in any sense a term of the contract of loan, and although an attempt was made in the court below to say that the payment of £550 to Mr. Halsall was a contractual term, the judge found otherwise (3), and there is no appeal to this court on that point. Accordingly, the question is whether the payment of £537 9s. 6d. to Mr. Martelli, for the purposes to which I have referred, was a term of the G contract of loan, and, therefore, a term which should have found its place in the memorandum. The defendants say that it was a term of the agreement, and the judge found (3), as I understand his judgment, that that was so, on the footing that it had been incorporated into the contract of loan by oral discussions between Mr. George Dawson and Mr. Halsall. The possibility of its being an implied term does not appear to have been raised, and the decision below, as I understand it, H was on the footing of an express oral term.

So far as evidence of that express oral term is concerned, there is a startling lack of it. This is not a reflection on counsel who conducted the case below, because they were no doubt somewhat preoccupied with the many other issues which concerned the court at that stage. In fact it is, however, a startling thing, as counsel for the moneylenders submits, if the defendants rely on an oral agreement I made between Mr. George Dawson and Mr. Halsall, or indeed any other of the moneylenders' witnesses, that no attempt was sought to be made to elucidate that fact in the evidence. It was not suggested to Mr. Greene or Mr. Forland, the director of the moneylenders, that any specific oral agreement making this a term of the contract had been reached; and Mr. George Dawson, who would have been a party to any such agreement, was not invited to give evidence on it when examined in chief. Indeed, after a meticulous consideration of such evidence as there was, it is clear that the only oral evidence which really touches on this point at all and which has been described as the high-water mark of the defendants' case so far as the existence of an oral agreement is concerned, is a passage from the evidence of Mr. Greene, the moneylenders' solicitor. He was asked:

"You did not think it was your duty on behalf of the [moneylenders] to find out something about these borrowers? A.—My capacity was purely to complete a loan which had been negotiated before I was ever instructed—to do the conveyancing. Q.—Was it within your knowledge that for the purpose of this loan it was important that the loan of £2,000 should be applied in a certain manner? A.—Certainly. Q.—For instance, that Mr. Halsall should get his £550 back? A.—Yes. Q.—And also that the premium on the lease held by [the borrower], £500, should be paid out of that? A.—That was inherent in the whole transaction. We could not have a mortgage unless the lease was granted, because the mortgage was on the lease. Q.—It was important that the £2,000 was applied in a certain manner, was it not? A.—Yes. Q.—You never thought of embodying anything to that effect—how the £2,000 was to be applied—in the memorandum? A.—It is not necessary to do that, in my opinion."

There was, of course, affidavit evidence in addition to the oral evidence, and in Mr. George Dawson's affidavit he does canvass the possibility that this was a term of the contract which should have appeared in the memorandum, but he does no more than draw attention to the letter of Nov. 24, 1965, which I have read, and does not, therefore, in any sense, himself set up the existence of an oral agreement.

The judge was reluctant to find for the defendants on this point but felt compelled to do so, and his conclusions were in these words (4):

"The memorandum does not, however, contain any reference to the application of part of the loan in payment of £550 to Mr. Halsall and in payment of £500 to the Church Commissioners on the grant of the lease of 22, Albion Street. That is dealt with by the authorisation, which admittedly did not form part of the memorandum. Counsel for the defendants says that these are terms of the contract of loan and should have been included in the memorandum. So far as concerns the £550 paid to Mr. Halsall, that payment represented, I think, a simple application by [the borrower] of part of the free proceeds of the loan, the payment being made directly by the lender to Mr. Halsall, not by virtue of any term of the contract alone, but under a mandate by [the borrower]. I do not see any reason why the memorandum should have included any reference to this application.

"The £500 paid on the grant of the lease is in quite a different position. The purpose and effect of this payment was to acquire for [the borrower] the leasehold property which was to constitute the security for the entire £2,000 loan. This was an essential term of the arrangement between [the borrower] and the [moneylenders], operating for the benefit of the [moneylenders] as well as that of [the borrower]. The payment cannot, it seems to me, be regarded as a simple application of part of the free proceeds of the loan."

It is in those words that the judge distinguished between the payment to Mr. Halsall and the payment of the amount of the premium to secure the lease of 22, Albion Street. Later in his judgment (I need not refer to the words in detail) he pointed out (5) that a distinction between these two payments lies in the fact that the payment representing the premium on the lease enured (as he put it) for the benefit of the moneylenders.

I ought, for completeness, to say a word or two about the method by which this

(4) [1967] 3 All E.R. at pp. 949, 950.

(5) [1967] 3 All E.R. at p. 951, letter B.

A contract was completed, because it has been referred to at some length in the argument. Following the letter from Mr. Greene to Mr. Martelli which I have already read, it was necessary to complete as quickly as possible, because the Church Commissioners were anxious to complete the transaction for the grant of the lease. It is, I think, of interest to note that Mr. Martelli, on behalf of the defendants, on Nov. 27, 1965, wrote to Mr. Greene making suggestions as to the manner in which completion should take place. Without reading the letter in full, he was suggesting that he should be given £500 out of the loan in advance so that he might complete the transaction with the Church Commissioners through the post and on his undertaking to deliver the completed lease to Mr. Greene within a period of fourteen days. Mr. Martelli is not making that suggestion as a matter of right but is canvassing it as a sensible and convenient possible way of completing the transaction. Mr. Greene originally was minded to fall in with some such arrangement, but in the end, for reasons which do not matter, Mr. Martelli appointed Mr. Greene as his agent for the purpose of completing this transaction, and then Mr. Greene, having obtained a banker's draft for £500 payable to the Church Commissioners, sent his clerk with that draft to the Church Commissioners' solicitors, picked up the lease, and then completed the remaining documents and drew the appropriate cheques in favour of Mr. Martelli, Mr. Halsall and Mr. George Dawson, strictly in accordance with the terms of the authorisation. As a matter of fact, therefore, the transaction was completed by a direct payment from the moneylenders' solicitors to the solicitors for the Church Commissioners in order to obtain delivery up of the lease.

Now, in my judgment, although the memorandum under the Act of 1927 must contain all the terms of the contract, it need not specify mere matters of machinery by which those terms are to be carried into effect. The question here, as I see it, is whether the common understanding that the premium should be paid out of the money advanced was a term of the contract in the sense that it involved obligations which the parties were bound to perform, or whether it was mere machinery invoked for the defendants' convenience. As a matter of first impression the arrangement does not strike me as one which was a term of the contract. The moneylenders were prepared to lend £2,000 on the security set out in the memorandum, and if that security was duly furnished to them it was a matter of no concern to them what the borrower or Mr. George Dawson did with the money when it was received. If the borrower had been able to borrow £500 from some other source in order to pay the premium and had then repaid this loan on receipt of the £2,000 advanced by the moneylenders, the moneylenders could have had no possible objection, because the matter would have been of no concern to them. Of course, the moneylenders would not part with that money, the £2,000, until the lease had been acquired and the charge executed, and the Church Commissioners would not hand over the lease until the premium had been paid; but this apparent difficulty is merely an administrative problem with which solicitors are entirely familiar and a problem which they constantly solve when required to effect the simultaneous completion of two related transactions. The parties to an arrangement of this kind do not bargain with one another as to the manner in which their solicitors will complete the transaction. Having agreed on the essential terms of the bargain itself, they know full well that their solicitors are skilled in effecting the necessary administrative arrangements and they leave it to their solicitors. In an ordinary case of this kind it would, in my judgment, not be a matter on which the parties would contract: that is to say, they would not contract to determine the method or machinery by which their intentions were to be carried into effect. I cannot see anything in this case which makes it differ from the normal. It seems to me that, in the absence of any special oral agreement, as to which there is absolutely no evidence at all, this is the normal case, and on the face of it the arrangement as to how the transaction was to be completed was not a matter of bargain at all. Mr. Greene, I know, in his evidence which I have read, described the payment of the premium as coming from the advance and said that this was "inherent in the transaction". As far as he was concerned, so it was; he was the conveyancer and was responsible for carrying the transaction through. The fact that he had to arrange that the money coming from the advance could be used to finance payment of the premium was clearly the preoccupation which affected him; but I can see nothing in Mr. Greene's evidence, strongly relied on as it is, to suggest that this was other than the normal case that I have endeavoured to describe. I do not see any reason to suppose that the borrower could not have resiled from the understanding which existed if she had wanted to and paid the premium from another source if some happy chance had made another source available to her.

The case must be distinguished sharply from those where the lender has an interest in the disposal of the money which he lends and where the lender imposes stipulations on the borrower accordingly. Thus, if the lender requires part of the loan to be employed in payment of a pre-existing debt the payment of which he cannot otherwise secure, this may well be a term of the contract of loan itself (6). In the present case, however, the lender was fully protected, as long as the lease and the charge were executed before he lost control of the money to be loaned. It mattered not to him whether the premium came out of the loan or from another source, as long as there was no risk of his being deprived of both the loan and the security.

Counsel, who has taken every point that is available on behalf of the defendants in this case, has stressed the undoubted fact that the arrangement whereby the premium was to be financed out of the loan was in the minds of the parties throughout, but, as I have endeavoured to show, this does not avail him if, as I think, it was not a part of the bargain or contract between the parties but a mere conveyancing device to suit the convenience of the defendants, who could not raise the amount of the premium elsewhere.

The judge thought (7) that the payment of the premium differed from the payment of the debt to Mr. Halsall because it enured to the benefit of the moneylenders. With respect to his view, I do not agree. It seems to me that the fact that the premium was paid in this way did not affect the rights of the moneylenders under the contract in any way at all. The moneylenders were entitled at the end of the day to have their loan secured in accordance with the terms of the memorandum, and they could retain the payment of the loan unless and until suitable mechanism had been devised to enable that to be done.

Accordingly, as it seems to me, the evidence in this case discloses no defect in the memorandum; and I would allow the appeal.

HARMAN, L.J.: It seems to me to be the essence of this transaction that the appellant moneylenders would lend to the borrower £2,000 on having as security, first, a charge on the lease of the house of which she was then negotiating the purchase from the Church Commissioners, namely 22, Albion Street, Westminster, second, a post-dated cheque signed by herself, and third, a guarantee of the loan by the second defendant, her son. It seems probable that the borrower had not any other resources from which she could find the £500 necessary to acquire the lease than the money that she was borrowing from the moneylenders. At least it was assumed on all hands that it was in that way that she would be able to put herself into a position to get the loan. It was an essential term of the contract of borrowing that she should be the owner of a leasehold interest which she should charge, but it does not seem to me to have been a contractual term imposed by the moneylenders that the money must be found out of the £2,000 and from no other source. It was a matter of indifference to the moneylenders how the borrower acquired the lease so long as she did acquire it in time to give an

(6) As in Egan v. Langham Investments, Ltd., [1938] 1 All E.R. 193; [1938] 1 K.B. 667.

A unencumbered charge to secure the loan. The judge started (8) his judgment by stating at the outset that it was a basic term of the loan that the moneylenders should out of the money advanced pay the premium on the lease. This, with respect to him, is to beg the whole question. If it was such a basic term, then it is conceded here, as it was below, that the moneylenders cannot succeed because one of the terms of the contract does not appear in the memorandum. Whether

B it is such a term is the question to be decided, and I conclude that it is not. It seems to me to have been part of the conveyancing machinery by which the tripartite transaction, namely the acquisition of the lease, the charge on it to the moneylenders and the loan by them was carried into effect. In my opinion the utilisation of £500 part of the loan in paying the premium on the lease was only a part of the contract if it was a term insisted on by the moneylenders. If this

C were so the case would be parallel to that of Egan v. Langham Investments, Ltd. (9), on which the judge relied, but there was no evidence here to support this proposition. It was hardly mentioned by Mr. George Dawson, who negotiated the loan, and its only support came from Mr. Greene, the moneylenders' solicitor, who did say in his evidence, in answer to a question, what WIDGERY, L.J., has read out (10). Mr. Green was, as he said there, in charge of the conveyancing machinery but he

D had nothing to do with settling the contract. His answer was that he only knew that this was the way in which it was proposed that the transaction should be carried out. To a similar effect is the letter of Nov. 24, 1965, which WIDGERY, L.J., has also read (11). I do not think that these two statements show that this was a contractual term insisted on by the moneylenders as a condition of the loan: they are merely part of the machinery devised and it was not necessary that they

E should be mentioned in the memorandum. Indeed if that were so it seems to me that the whole of the contents of the authorisation ought to have appeared there, and although it was rather faintly suggested below that the repayment to Mr. Halsall was part of the contract it was nowhere there suggested that the payment of the balance to Mr. George Dawson stood on the same footing.

In this court counsel for the defendants did suggest that the whole of the terms

F of the authorisation should be in the memorandum—that is to say that they were all part of the contractual terms between the parties. I do not take that view. I think that they all stand on the same footing: none of them is meant to be contractual and none of them needs to be in the memorandum, which was therefore perfect and there is no obstacle to the success of the moneylenders in this action.

RUSSELL, L.J.: The only question in this court is whether there was a

G term of the contract for the loan that £500 part of the loan must be used to acquire the leasehold interest that was to be charged, or that the lender was obliged to advance the money in a manner or by a method which would enable the borrower to use it to acquire the lease. It is quite plain that there was no written contract to that effect. It is equally plain that there was no express oral agreement to that effect: neither the defendants nor Mr. George Dawson suggested it:

H it was not suggested in cross-examination, either to Mr. Forland or to Mr. Halsall. What can be left? Is there an implied agreement? It would be quite impossible to imply an agreement by the borrower that she should not use any other money she might have available to acquire the lease. Of course, a term of the loan was security of the leasehold: but the fact that the borrower would or might have to spend money in acquiring it is not an additional term. Nor do I think that it

I can possibly be said that there was an implied agreement by the lender that he would advance the money in such a manner as would enable the borrower to acquire the leasehold therewith. It may have been assumed that the mechanics that would in fact be adopted in the completion of the contract would probably be those that were adopted; but that is not the same thing as a tacit contractual term. Suppose that the borrower's solicitor had at the completion produced his own banker's draft for the amount of the premium to hand to the lessor, and the lender's solicitor had immediately handed £500 (as was authorised by the borrower) to the borrower's solicitor in exchange for the lease and the charge, no one could dream of saying that the parties had departed from the terms of the contract.

I too would allow the appeal.

GABLE CONSTRUCTION CO., LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Goff, J.), March 7, 8, April 10, 1968.]

Stamp Duty—Bond, covenant or instrument—Deed varying rent reserved by a lease—Deed not itself a lease or tack for the purposes of charge to stamp duty—Chargeable as bond, covenant etc.—Amount chargeable nevertheless limited to what would be chargeable if deed of variation were a lease or tack—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 77 (5), Sch. 1.

A deed of variation of two long leases, each granted in consideration of a substantial premium and a large rent, provided that each premium should be varied and that for the reddendum in each lease there be substituted: "Paying therefor in respect of the ending on Jan. 20, 1963, the rent of one peppercorn if demanded and in respect of the period ending on Dec. 25, 1963, the yearly rent of £1,500 (£500 in the case of the second lease), and in respect of the period ending on Dec. 25, 2013, the yearly rent of £2,700 (£800), the said yearly rent rising by a further £960 (£240) at the expiration of each fifty years thereafter...". The deed was assessed to stamp duty by charging ad valorem lease duty (amounting to £3,096 10s.) on the amount of the increase in the average rents, on the basis that it operated as a surrender of the two leases and a grant of new leases for terms equal to the unexpired residues of the original terms. On appeal,

Held: (i) (a) the deed of variation operated to increase the rents but not as a surrender of the original leases, whose demises remained subsisting; accordingly the deed of variation was not a "lease or tack" (see p. 973, letter F, post).

Donellan v. Read ([1824-34] All E.R. Rep. 639) distinguished.

(b) the deed of variation was, however, chargeable under the heading "Bond, Covenant etc." in Sch. 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891, because the exception from that charge in respect of a "rent reserved by a lease or tack" did not extend to the rent increased by virtue of the deed of variation, as that deed was not a lease or tack and the words of exception referred to the document (viz., the deed of variation) not to the transaction of increasing the rent (see p. 973, letter G, post).

Dictum of MACNAGHTEN, J., in Associated London Properties, Ltd. v. Williams (Inspector of Taxes) ([1947] 2 All E.R. at p. 475) applied and the decision on appeal ([1948] 1 All E.R. 442) considered.

(ii) the amount prima facie chargeable under the heading "Bond, Covenant etc." (£37,006) was limited by s. 77 (5) of the Stamp Act, 1891, to the amount

- A that would be payable on the deed of variation if it were a lease or tack (viz., £3,096 10s.), as s. 77 (5) was a relieving provision and the reference in it to rent reserved "by a lease or tack" referred to rent that could be reserved if the instrument were a lease or tack (see p. 974, letter B, post); alternatively the reference in s. 77 (5) to rent reserved by a lease or tack applied to the rent reserved by the original leases as varied by the deed of variation (see p. 974, letter D, post).

Case Stated.

The appellant presented a deed of variation of two leases* to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for adjudication of the amount of stamp duty chargeable thereon under Sch. 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891. The appellant submitted that the deed was not chargeable as a lease or tack under Sch. 1 or by virtue of s. 77 (5) and should bear a stamp duty of 10s. only. The commissioners were of opinion† that the deed operated as a surrender of the leases and a grant of new leases for terms equal to the unexpired residue of the original terms and accordingly that the deed of variation was a lease. If it was not a lease, they were of opinion that it fell within the heading "bond covenant or instrument", being the only or principal or primary security for sums of money at stated intervals, in Sch. 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891, not being rent reserved by a lease or tack. On that view s. 77 (5) of the Act of 1891 would be inapplicable; alternatively s. 77 (5) applied to limit the duty to that which would have been chargeable had it been a lease. The duty chargeable under the heading "Bond" etc. would amount to £37,006. The commissioners assessed the deed to duty ad valorem as a lease at a total amount of £3,096 10s..

Apr. 10. GOFF, J., read the following judgment: In this case the appellant holds certain properties under two long leases, each of which was granted in consideration of a substantial premium and at a large rent, and duly stamped accordingly. Each lease was made between the lessor of the one part, certain sureties (the same persons in each case) of the second part, and the appellant of the third part. Between the two leases the freehold reversion changed hands, but nothing turns on that.

By a instrument dated July 1, 1963, described as a deed of variation made between the landlords of the first part, the sureties of the second part and the appellant of the third part, and expressed to be supplemental to the two leases, it was provided as follows. Recital (2):

"The parties hereto have agreed to enter into this deed to vary the terms of the first and second leases in manner hereinafter appearing. Now this deed witnesseth as follows."

Then, para. 1 varied the premium under the first lease. Paragraph 2:

"In lieu of the reddendum in the first lease there shall be substituted the following words 'Paying therefor in respect of the period ending on Jan. 20, 1963, the rent of one peppercorn if demanded and in respect of the period ending on Dec. 25, 1963, the yearly rent of £1,500 and in respect of the period ending on Dec. 25, 2013, the yearly rent of £2,700 the said yearly rent rising by a further £960 at the expiration of each fifty years thereafter to be paid by two equal half yearly payments . . .'"

Then, para. 3 varied the premium under the second lease. Paragraph 4:

"In lieu of the reddendum in the second lease there shall be substituted the following words 'Paying therefor in respect of the period ending on Jan. 20, 1963, the rent of one peppercorn if demanded and in respect of the period ending on Dec. 20, 1963, the yearly rent of £500 and in respect of the period ending on Dec. 25, 2013, the yearly rent of £800 the said yearly rent rising by a further £240 at the expiration of each fifty years thereafter to be paid by two equal half yearly payments . . .'"

Paragraph 5 provided:

"The said substituted considerations in the first and second leases totalling £68,000 shall (subject to the provisions of the first and second leases) be payable by the tenant to the landlord in sixty-eight equal instalments of £10,000 each of which shall be payable "

as therein mentioned.

Finally, by para. 6:

"The landlord hereby covenants with the tenant and the sureties and the sureties and the tenant hereby covenant with the landlord that they will respectively perform and observe the several covenants agreements and conditions contained in the first and second lease as if the same covenants agreements and conditions had been herein repeated in full with such modifications only as are necessary to give effect to this deed."

This deed of variation was submitted for adjudication, and, as appears from para. 8 of the Case Stated:

"The commissioners were of the opinion that the adjudicated instrument, on its true construction, operated as a surrender of the first and second leases and a grant of new leases for terms equal to the unexpired residue of the original terms. They were accordingly of the opinion that the adjudicated instrument was a lease and that s. 77 (5) [of the Stamp Act, 1891] applied. If, on its true construction, the adjudicated instrument was not a lease, it was, in the commissioners' opinion, chargeable under the heading 'Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever' in Sch. 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891, being the only or principal or primary security for sums of money

A at stated periods, not being rent reserved by a lease or tack. On this view s. 77 (5) was inapplicable because the sums of money so secured were not rent within the meaning of that word in that subsection. Alternatively s. 77 (5) applied to limit the duty on the adjudicated instrument to that with which it would have been chargeable had it been a lease."

B Paragraphs 9 to 12 of the Case Stated read as follows:

C "9. The commissioners accordingly assessed the adjudicated instrument to duty as follows: Ad valorem lease duty on the amount of the increase in the average rents . . . [this was calculated and totalled £3,096 10s.]. 10. The amount of the duty with which the adjudicated instrument was chargeable if it was chargeable under the heading 'Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever', and s. 77 (5) did not apply, was £37,006. 11. The appellant being dissatisfied with the assessments made and having paid the stamp duty in accordance therewith has required the commissioners to state and sign a Case setting out the questions on which their opinion was required and the assessments made by them, and the commissioners do hereby state and sign this Case accordingly. 12. The question for the opinion of the court is (a) whether the adjudicated instrument is chargeable with the duty assessed by the commissioners. (b) if not, with what duty is it chargeable."

D Counsel for the appellant submitted that s. 77 (5) is not a charging but a relieving section, and that it does not say that an instrument coming within the description in the opening words of that subsection is to be charged as if it were a lease or tack though it be not such, but only if it be. He said, further, that the deed of variation was not a lease or tack because it did not increase the term or demise any further land. Then he said that it was not within the heading, "Bond, covenant, or instrument", etc., because that expressly excluded "rent reserved by a lease or tack". It followed, so he submitted, that the only stamp duty exigible on this deed was the ordinary 10s. duty.

E F Counsel for the Crown, on the other hand, submitted that the deed of variation must be either a new lease, causing a surrender of the old leases by operation of law, or a collateral contract, for which he relied on the old case of Donellan v. Read (1) and in particular this passage in the judgment of the court (2):

G "The only way in which it could be taken to be rent would be that this contract creates a new demise at an increased rent and that therefore, by operation of law, the old lease is surrendered by such a new demise."

H Founding himself on that premise, he said that, if it be a new lease, cadit quaestio, and if it be a collateral contract then duty is exigible under the heading, "Bond, covenant, or instrument", etc., possibly without the benefit of s. 77 (5) but at worst for him back in the same position under that subsection as if the true view were that the deed of variation was a lease.

I I do not think that the position is quite as simple as counsel for the Crown would have it, but nevertheless I have reached the conclusion that the adjudication was right. In Donellan v. Read (1) the tenant held under a lease for the residue of a term of twenty years, which could not be varied by a parol agreement, which was all that the agreement for the increased rent was in that case. Therefore, as the court said, the only way in which it could be taken to be rent was if it created a new tenancy. Where, however, the tenancy is one which does not require to be in writing so that it can be varied by parol, or where, as here, the variation is itself effected by deed, then in my judgment it is possible to create additional rent in the strict technical sense without a surrender of the old tenancy explicitly or by operation of law and a new lease. There is in my view ample authority for this proposition. First, I find this in FOA ON LANDLORD AND TENANT (8th Edn.) at p. 635: A

"Moreover, the mere fact of payment and acceptance of a diminished rent will not amount to a surrender, where it does not of itself imply a new demise; and the same holds good of an increased rent payable upon alteration or improvements. But in both cases such payment may be evidence of a surrender and new tenancy."

Then, in Associated London Properties, Ltd. v. Williams (Inspector of Taxes) (3) MACNAGHTEN, J., had said in the court below (4): B

"There is no difficulty about the parties to a lease, after the lease has been executed, agreeing that the rent should be increased or reduced."

It is true that SOMERVELL, L.J., said (5): C

"I understand that the cases with regard to the meaning of 'rent', under common law or in a statute, unless there is some definition or some special wording in the statute which gives it a different meaning, were not cited to the General Commissioners or to MACNAGHTEN, J. If they had been, I feel that there are certain observations in the latter's judgment which he probably would not have made", D

but I think that that must be regarded as a criticism of the generality of MACNAGHTEN, J.'s words, for there is both English and Irish authority for the limited proposition which I have stated.

In Fenner v. Blake, (6) CHANNELL, J., said:

"It is by no means uncommon for a landlord and tenant to agree by parol to a variation of the terms of an existing tenancy, such as an alteration in the amount of the rent, and at all events in cases where the tenancy was such that the contract creating it was not required by law to be in writing, as in the case of a tenancy from year to year, a parol variation of the terms as to the rent would be perfectly good and sufficient in point of law."

Again, in Lord Inchiquin v. Lyons (7), where there had been a notice to quit following an increase of rent, which notice was sufficient if the original tenancy remained but bad if it had been surrendered and replaced by a new one, SIR MICHAEL MORRIS, C.J., (8): E

"The second argument put forward, and which was the principal one relied on by the Exchequer Division, was that founded on the increase of rent. That raises the net question, does an increase of rent by an arrangement during the year of tenancy per se operate as the creation of a new tenancy? Now, in the textbook cited, which I refer to as showing what is the opinion of the profession on the subject, and which, when I was at the Bar, was considered a standard work—ADAMS ON EJECTMENT, p. 106—it is laid down that 'No new tenancy is created by a mere agreement between landlord and tenant for an increase of rent in the middle of the year of a tenancy'. That is the exact state of facts here: there was an arrangement in the middle of the year of tenancy that the rent should be increased; and here there is this additional element, that the increase of rent was to relate back to the previous gale-day, and was not to begin only on Nov. 1, which was the first gale-day after the arrangement was entered into. G

"I am not aware of any case deciding, as an abstract proposition, that in no case can a landlord and tenant agree to raise the rent without creating a new tenancy. That would lead to extraordinary consequences. More generally there is a reduction of rent; and suppose a reduction is made to a tenant, and an arrangement that he is to hold on at the reduced rate, and H

A that such reduced rate is to relate back to a previous period, would that create a new tenancy? I presume that if an arrangement to increase the rent would ipso facto create a new tenancy, an agreement for a reduction would have the same effect. The consequences of that are, at all events, worthy of consideration. I am not aware that such proposition has ever been decided, and I think it is contrary to the ordinary right that two persons are to be prevented from entering into an agreement, which is not immoral or against public policy, viz., that the rent is to be increased or diminished, without putting an end to the old tenancy."

In the same case, FITZGIBBON, L.J., said (9):

C "One circumstance pressed the Lord Chief Baron in favour of the defendant, from which I draw a different conclusion. As the increase of rent related back to the previous gale-day, the Lord Chief Baron treated the increase as not rent at all; but I cannot distinguish between the £22 10s. and the original rent of £168 10s. I think the increase was rent accruing by contract under the old tenancy running back, as is frequently the case in leases, to a previous gale-day; in all respects the old tenancy was continued, except that each half-yearly gale of rent was, from and after the day when the increase was agreed on, £22 10s. more than the amount reserved under the previous contract. I concur in the verdict of the jury as the true conclusion. The question when the new tenancy commenced was incapable of any answer consistently with the facts, because there was, in truth, no new tenancy at all, but only the old one, with an alteration in the amount of the rent, calculated from the gale-day before the date at which the increase was agreed on."
